

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

IN presenting to the Christian public the "CYCLOPEDIA OF MISSIONS," it becomes me, first of all, to acknowledge the good Providence of God, which has enabled me to accomplish a work of such difficulty and magnitude, in so short a time. The enterprise was entered upon with much misgiving ; but every obstacle has been removed out of the way, as the work has proceeded. The preparation of the manuscript was commenced on the 12th of January last. On the 10th of June, we commenced the process of stereotyping, having about half the manuscript in hand. The work of printing has progressed as rapidly as it could conveniently be done ; and we have not been delayed a single day for want of copy, though the manuscripts have often been received by mail the very day they were wanted. The whole will be completed a little before the first of November, making more than four months occupied in printing. If it be asked how such a work could be thoroughly prepared, in so short a time, we answer, by division of labor. There have been more than twenty different persons engaged upon it. It has been a work of immense labor ; but the labor has been so divided that each one has had ample time to do his part thoroughly. At the same time, a general unity of plan and design has been secured, an outline of every article having been furnished by the Editor. And here I would acknowledge my great obligations to those gentlemen who have kindly consented, at my request, to aid me in this important undertaking ; as, without such aid, it would have required years to accomplish it. Their names appear at the close of their several articles, and will afford a sufficient guaranty of thoroughness and accuracy. The articles which appear without a name have been prepared, either in whole or in part, by the Editor. The portions relating to the missions of the American Baptist Union have been furnished by the author of the valuable and interesting "History of American Baptist Missions ;" and those of the Methodists in this country and England, by a respected clergyman of that denomination, whose name was mentioned to me by the Secretary of the Methodist Missionary Society, as the most suitable person to undertake it. The missions of the Presbyterian Board, have been chiefly taken (by permission,) from Rev. J. C. Lowrie's "Manual of Missions." The article on the church of Rome and its missions was prepared by a Roman Catholic layman.

We have aimed to make the entire work truly catholic in its character and spirit, giving to every mission the degree of prominence to which it is properly entitled by its age, importance, and success, without respect to the denomination of Christians which supports it ; and nothing can present a brighter or more cheering view of the essential unity of the different denominations of evangelical Protestants, than their operations on missionary ground, where they are found adopting the same general measures, preaching the same Christ, and receiving the seal of the same Holy Spirit upon their labors. But, while I hold myself responsible for the general character of the work, I would not be understood as adopting every opinion expressed, or of vouching for every statement made by my respected contributors.

The consonants are generally sounded as they are in the English alphabet.

II. HAWAIIAN.—The missionaries at the Sandwich Islands, in reducing the language to writing, have adopted a portion of the Roman alphabet, giving the vowels the following sounds :

a as in father ;

i as in machine, or as long e ;

e as in they, or as long a in pale ;

o as in no ;

u as oo in too.

The full accent is usually on the last vowel but one, and a secondary accent two syllables before the full. In the diphthongal combinations, ae, ai, ao, and au, each letter retains its original sound, but when spoken in quick succession, combine together in a diphthong. Consonants are not doubled, and never end a word or syllable.—Bingham's History of the Sandwich Islands a as in far.

III. ARMENIAN AND TURKISH.—1. Sounds of Vowels.

û as in but.

e as a in fate.

oo as in moon.

i as in machine.

ai as i in ivy.

o as in note.

eu as the French eu in pou.

u as in unit.

NOTE.—Some of the above are but approximations to the vowel sounds designed to be expressed. E and o, for example, are not quite so broad and open as the corresponding English sounds. Ai is strictly a diphthong, the elements of which are indeed the same as our long i, but not so closely united in pronunciation. U in Armenian names is best represented as above ; but in Turkish words it corresponds more exactly with the French u as in une. The sound represented by û is more exactly that of the French e in le, me, &c.

2. Sounds of Consonants.

g always hard, as in good.

ch as in chain.

zh as in pleasure.

Gh and kh are guttural sounds, having no corresponding sounds or characters in English or French. The former resembles the modern Greek γ , and the latter χ , but both are deeper.

C to be used only in connection with h, except in words that have become anglicized with c in them.

J, sh, and in general the consonants not mentioned above, to be sounded as in English. The combination th does not occur ; when, therefore, the letters occur together, they are to be regarded as belonging to different syllables, and each to have its own proper sound ; e. g. Fethi, pronounced Fet-hi.

3. Accent.—The accent, which is slight, is uniformly on the last syllable in Armenian proper names, and nearly so in Turkish. All the other syllables should be uttered fully, and with equal stress of voice.

4. Anglicized Proper Names.—Names which have been long familiar to English and American readers, and have thus become anglicized, not to be changed. Such are Constantinople, Smyrna, Scio, Mitylene, Nicomedia, Philadelphia, &c. In fact, being for the most part Greek names, they do not strictly fall within the rules above given.

Monthly Concert.—One object which I have had in view, in the preparation of this work, has been to provide the means of adding interest and value to the Monthly Concert. The practice of appointing committees to report at this meeting on the various portions of the Missionary Field, is extending in the churches ; and where it is well carried out, it adds greatly to the interest of the meeting, and by engaging the leading minds in the church in the personal examination of the field, it tends greatly to extend and deepen the missionary spirit. But, whenever this is attempted, those engaged in it are met with the insurmountable difficulty of not having access to the materials for giving a complete view of scarcely a single mission in the world. This book will obviate this difficulty, not only by giving a complete, though brief historical sketch of almost every existing mission in the world ; but it will generally point out where further information can be obtained. It also provides the means of examining the localities on the maps. And from these maps, rough ones may be constructed for use in the lecture room, (in addition to Bidwell's large maps,) with very little labor, and no other expense than a few sheets of cartridge paper, some India ink, and a little carmine. And besides what is strictly missionary, the work contains a great amount of information respecting the resources of Christendom and the religious movements of the age, which may be made the basis of effective remark.

With these explanations of the author's views, this work, which has cost him so great an amount of thought, labor, and anxiety, is commended to the kind consideration of the Christian public, in the humble yet confident hope that it may be useful.

sionary operations, the condition of the heathen, &c., which contain valuable information. The Missionary Societies are treated under their several titles, giving an account of their origin, the number of their missions, missionaries, converts, amount of receipts, &c. Thus, a greater amount of valuable information, in regard to the movements of the age, is compressed within these pages than was ever before comprised in a single volume, or any one series of volumes. And the matter here given to the public is not a mere compilation, but almost the whole of it has been written anew expressly for this work. As the materials have been collected from a very wide range, and to a great extent from original sources, I have not thought it necessary always to give specific credit, except where the reference might be of advantage, in a more full examination of the subject.

Maps.—The various maps, which accompany the work, will be found to cover nearly all the ground occupied by foreign missions. They will generally be placed near the descriptions of missionary operations in the countries which they describe. But, sometimes, a place described will be found on a map placed at a distance from the matter which relates to it. For instance, some of the stations of the Baptist Mission in Assam will be found on the map of Bengal. The following is a list of the maps, arranged according to location: ON AFRICA, 7, viz.: Africa South of the Equator, Southern Africa, Western Africa, Liberia, Cape Palmas, Sherbro & Mendi Yoruba; ON INDIA, 5: India, Southern India and Ceylon, Western India, Bengal, and Northern India; Burmah, Siam, &c. 1; China, 1; Fuhchau, 1; Sandwich Islands, 1; Other Pacific Iles, 2; New-Zealand and Van Dieman's Land, 1; Australia, 1; WEST INDIES, 4, viz.: St. Kitts and Antigua, Jamaica, St. Thomas and St. Croix and Surinam; Indian Territory, 1; Labrador and Greenland, 1; WESTERN ASIA, 6, viz.: Armenia, Aintab and vicinity, Nestorians, Constantinople and vicinity, Syria, Thessalonica; making 32 in all. These maps are some of them original, having been drawn by missionaries who have been on the ground. Others have been compiled with much labor. They may not contain all the stations; but where any are lacking, they can easily be located from a description, and with the aid of the scale of miles.

• Spelling and Pronunciation of Proper Names.—I have been requested to give the accurate spelling and pronunciation of the foreign names, which occur in Missionary intelligence; and at first I designed to do so; but I soon found that it was utterly impracticable. The diversity of spelling is so great that it would be impossible to follow any rule; and as the missionaries, in spelling, use the Roman letters to express as nearly as possible the sound of a foreign tongue, it would be presumptuous in me to attempt, by any other combination of the same letters, to express more perfectly sounds that I have never heard. What leads to the diversity of spelling is, the attempts of different persons to express, by different combinations of the Roman characters, sounds that have no corresponding utterances in our language. The most that I can do, is to give a few simple rules, and endeavor to be consistent with myself in spelling the same words alike in different parts of the book; in which last particular, however, I am not confident that, in every instance, I have succeeded. The following systems have been adopted by missionaries in different parts of the world:

I. CHINESE.—The following system of spelling and pronouncing Chinese names is that adopted by Williams, in his "Middle Kingdom."

The gentlemen who have furnished these contributions have been induced to undertake the work, from the interest which they have felt in the cause of missions, and their belief of the importance of this enterprise to that cause. They have fulfilled their engagements faithfully, and with great promptness ; and I have the satisfaction of believing that the work is much more valuable than it would have been, if I had done the whole myself. They will accept this public expression of my thanks, as well as of my high appreciation of their labors. I would also, in this place, return my sincere thanks to the officers of the several Missionary Societies, for the kind encouragement which they have given me, in the prosecution of this work, and especially to the American Board, who have granted me the free use of their extensive and valuable library, and also encouraged the enterprise by subscribing for 100 copies of the work. I return thanks, also, to those numerous friends of the cause, who have given me kind words of encouragement, and subscribed for copies of the work.

In the preparation of the matter and in the supervision of the press, no pains have been spared to secure accuracy ; and yet it would be strange, if, in so large a work, consisting, to so great an extent, of statements of facts and numbers, no mistakes should occur. Yet, if an error should be occasionally discovered, we think it should not, in the mind of a reasonable man, impair confidence in the general accuracy of the whole.

This volume brings down the history and results of missionary operations to the present time. It contains a large amount of valuable information that is generally inaccessible, and only to be found in a few missionary libraries, spread out in series of volumes, extending through a period of half a century.

It is here presented in a convenient form for reading, consultation, and reference. It is, however, not only a book to be consulted for reference, but a book to be read ; many of the sketches and narratives being of thrilling interest. No future revision or alteration is contemplated in this volume, beyond the correction of errors. It will always be as valuable a record of the past, as it is now. But if anything further shall be called for, to bring up the history of missions and the progress of Christianity, to any future time, other volumes may be added, either periodically or occasionally, according to the demand.

It will readily be perceived that the copyright of this work has cost me no inconsiderable outlay of means, in addition to my own time and labor ; as such contributions as appear in this book could not be expected without compensation. It will require a sale of ten thousand copies to remunerate me. It has, likewise, been a very expensive work to my publisher ; and the price of the book has been put so low, in order to secure a general circulation, that his profits will be very small, and it will require a large sale to repay what he has already advanced. But, knowing the value of the book, and having confidence in the disposition of the Christian public to patronize a good object, we have ventured upon the undertaking, with the confident expectation that we should be sustained by a remunerative sale.

Explanations, &c.—The sketches of missionary operations are chiefly given under geographical heads. For example, full accounts of the missions of the several societies in India are given under the head of HINDOSTAN. Other geographical articles relate to Christian lands, as Europe, United States, &c., showing the religious condition and resources of the Christian world. There are several articles, however, which derive their title from the people, as Armenians, Nestorians, &c. There are likewise a number of articles relating to the work of affiliated societies, which have an indirect bearing upon missionary operations. All the missions to the ancient people of God, are comprised under the head of Jews. The notices of missionary stations are designed chiefly as a guide to finding them on the maps. But, when any interesting information respecting the places occupied as missionary stations, not contained in the accounts of the mission, has come to hand, it has been inserted under the head of the station. From the very nature of the case, however, these notices are incomplete, as new stations are being occupied continually ; and concerning many old ones, it has been impossible to find any information that would be of any value even in finding them on the maps. There are also many articles on miscellaneous topics, connected with mis-

CYCLOPEDIA OF MISSIONS.

ABBEOKUTA : The capital town of the Yorubas, in West Africa, and the principal station of the Church Missionary Society in that country. It is situated 100 miles inland North of Badagry in the Bight of Benin, and contains 30,000 inhabitants. (See Yoruba, and Africa West.)

ABENAQUIS : A tribe of Indians in Lower Canada, among whom the American Board support a native missionary.

ABYSSINIA : A rich, mountainous district of Eastern Africa, known to the ancients as Ethiopia. It is bounded on the northwest by Nubia, on the northeast by the Red Sea, on the south by the country of the Gallas, and on the west by countries almost unknown. Its extent is estimated at about 245,000 geographical miles. The country rises in terraces from the shores of the Red Sea, till it swells into lofty pyramids and abrupt peaks, whose heads are crowned with imperishable snows. Pasture lands almost entirely destitute of trees, though well watered, stretch themselves before the eye in the perspective, through a great part of the more elevated regions, some portions of which are cultivated with care. They are richly stocked with flocks and herds. The country is plentifully supplied with streams.

For about 1400 miles from its mouth, the Nile receives no tributary. Here, in latitude 15° N. flows in the Takkazie, from Abyssinia, around whose head-waters is the modern kingdom of Tigre. The Blue Nile unites with this at Khartûm, in latitude 15° 37' N.; and around its sources and to the North, is Amhara. The country, encircled by its spiral course, is Gojam. In latitude 9° 35' N., at the verge of the table land, which terminates the watershed from the East, is Ankobar the capital of the kingdom of Shoa, the most important and best known of the kingdoms into which modern Abyssinia is divided. There is every variety of climate, from the stifled and intense heat of the narrow valleys, to the delicious and exhilarating atmosphere of the elevated table lands, and even to the perpetual frosts of the snow-capt mountains. The year divides itself into two seasons—the one of storms and inundations, and the other of drought and burning heat. Every tree and every bush in Abyssinia not only retains its verdure, but bears blossoms and fruit at all seasons of the year. This region is rich in iron and gold, the latter being found in the sands on the shores and in the bed of the streams. The entrance to Abyssinia for Europeans is the town of Massowah, built on an island in the Red Sea. The place of greatest note, at present, is Adowa, which contains about 6000 people. Till Abyssinia was overrun by the Gallas, Amhara was the residence of the sovereign, who now makes Gondar his capital.

Inhabitants.—The population is estimated at 4,000,000 to 5,000,000. The color of the Abyssinians varies from black to transparent copper color. They are well made and active, and distinguished from the negro by the regularity of their features. They are not deficient in the capacities of the understanding or the affections of the heart. In the southwestern part of the country they are better informed and more civilized than the people of Tigre, who are rude and uncultivated, passionate and violent. The Abyssinians, in their high mountain-home, have been able to maintain their liberty and independence, never having been subdued by the Turks; but the Gallas have recently made inroads upon their territory. The country is covered with cities and villages, and isolated habitations are here and there seen clinging to the sides of the mountains. The houses are mostly composed of mud, straw, and rushes. Caves are also sometimes used for human habitations. The dwellings of the superior families consist of a number of rooms, arranged around an open court. The clothing of the poorer classes is very simple, consisting of skins or pieces of cotton. Their food is principally milk and bread, butter, honey, beef, mutton, and fowls.

In Abyssinia the women are charged with the most oppressive and irksome labors, both in the house and in the field. They cultivate the ground, gather the harvest, grind the corn, and procure provisions and water for the families, and that often with their infants in their arms. But the education of the children is better attended to than in most eastern countries, and they are distinguished for filial affection and obedience, and respect for the aged. The common people generally marry, the sons at 18, and the daughters at 14. When arrived at an advanced age most of them become monks or nuns. If sick, they deliver over their property to their children, who support them till their death, with much filial piety. About half the young people enter into service at 15 or 16, mostly for the remainder of their lives. The servants are kindly treated. The Christians do not sell their slaves; but sometimes give them away.

Language.—The ancient language of Ethiopia, called the Gheez, was, down to the 14th century, spoken throughout Ethiopia; and all the ancient records are in this language; but it has generally fallen into disuse, and the present spoken language is the Amharic.

Government.—The old Abyssinian, or Ethiopic empire, is now broken into fragments, each constituting a petty kingdom, the governments of which are, so far as our information extends, arbitrary and despotic.

Religion.—The fragments of the old empire still profess Christianity, though both Mohammedans and Pagans have broken in and settled among them. Among these, the Gallas are the most remarkable. About the year 1500 they poured into the country in multitudes, and seized many of its fairest portions; and they have kept up a perpetual and harassing warfare; but many of their tribes have been made tributary to the modern kingdom of Shoa, and not a few of them have been reduced to slavery.

The best writers consider the conversion of the Abyssinians to Christianity to have taken place about the year 330, when Athanasius was Bishop of Alexandria. Meropius, a gentleman of Tyre, a Greek and a Christian, being cast away on the rocks of Abyssinia, was slain by the barbarous natives. Two young men, Frumentius and Edesius, his companions, on whom he had bestowed a liberal education, being carried to the king, he, on account of their diligence and industry, gave them their liberty. They afterwards rose into favor with the court, and were appointed to important offices, that of Frumentius being the charge of the young prince's education. And besides instructing him in the learning of the times, he inspired him with a love and veneration for the Christian religion. After the king's death, Frumentius, thinking it his duty to take advantage of the position in which Providence had placed him, to propagate the faith among the Abyssinians, procured ordination as Bishop of Ethiopia, from Athanasius, Bishop of Alexandria, and returning, baptized a great number of the people, ordained a regular clergy, and built churches. Ever since their conversion, the Abyssinians have received their Patriarchs from Alexandria, and their creed has always been the same as that of the Copts. (See Copts.)

The first discovery of the existence of this church appears to have been made by some adventurers sent out by John II., king of Portugal. The king was so much interested in the account which they gave of these Christians that he sent out Pedro Cavilham, to ascertain the state of the people, who entered Abyssinia in 1490. After this, several embassies passed between the two courts, and at length a sort of alliance was entered into between the two countries, which excited the jealousy of their Mohammedan neighbors, and brought upon Abyssinia a ruinous and destructive war. Zagba Zaba, the ambassador sent by Abyssinia, in 1527, having published his creed, was, at the instance of Bermudas, thrown into prison for heresy. The emperor of Abyssinia, finding himself engaged in a war, in consequence of his alliance with Portugal, sent Bermudas, a Portuguese then in Abyssinia, to Rome and Lisbon for succors. But before Bermudas started on his embassy, the Abuna or Patriarch of Abyssinia, was ordered to consecrate him bishop, and nominate him his successor. Bermudas first went to Rome, and was consecrated Patriarch of Ethiopia by the Pope, and recommended to the king of Portugal to solicit succors for Ethiopia. In the mean time, the emperor died, and his son Claudius gained some advantages over the Mohammedans before any Portuguese arrived, but was afterwards driven to the mountains. Bermudas, on his return, succeeded in joining the young emperor, with a few Portuguese; and in an encounter, the Mohammedan chief lost his life, and Claudius was put in quiet possession of his throne. The Portuguese now demanded that the emperor should embrace the Catholic faith, and give up one-third of his kingdom to the Portuguese. And this demand was accompanied with a threat of excommunication, and the loss of the service of the Portuguese. The emperor replied to Bermudas, declaring that he, as Patriarch, had no authority in the empire, and that the Pope himself was a heretic. He also ordered Bermudas to be seized and put in prison, and sent immediately to Alexandria for an Abuna for the Abyssinian church.

Soon after this, Ignatius Loyola sent a Patriarch, two bishops, and ten Jesuits to convert Abyssinia to Rome. Claudius was by no means pleased with this new arrival. Oviedo, the bishop, soon after his arrival, haughtily demanded his submission to Rome, which demand was promptly resisted. Yet, Oviedo persevered, growing more insolent in his demands. The matter was submitted to a Council, in which the emperor entered into a public debate with the Jesuit, and afterwards wrote an answer to a tract published by the bishop. Being foiled in this way, Oviedo resorted to the terrors of excommunication, and meanwhile sent a request to Goa for some Portuguese soldiers to aid in the conversion of the Abyssinians. But this wise king was soon after slain in battle, in defending his dominions from the invasion of the Mohammedan king of Adel. Oviedo still plied his arts with the successors of Claudius, but with no better success; in the midst of which, he was recalled by the Pope, and sent to Japan; not, however, without assuring the Pope that, "with the assistance of 500 or 600 good Portuguese soldiers, he could at any time reduce the empire of Abyssinia to the obedience of the Pontificate," and intimating that it was a region abounding with the finest gold.

But, notwithstanding the failure of these attempts, the Jesuits sent another mission to Abyssinia in 1588, one of whom was Peter Pava, who arrived in Ethiopia in 1603. Finding Za Dangel, a weak prince, on the throne, these Jesuits succeeded in ingratiating themselves into his favor, inducing him not only to embrace the Romish faith, but to order all his subjects to follow his example. In this, the emperor was strongly opposed by the Patriarch, his son-in-law, viceroy of the Tigre, and a majority of the people. Yet, in spite of all entreaty, and after being warned of the ruin he was bringing upon his country, he persisted in adhering to the policy set on foot by the Jesuits. The result was, a civil war, which raged with great violence for a number of years; the emperor, for some time being victorious, and pursuing the Romish plan of burning heretics, drenched his dominions in blood, his subjects rising in all quarters, and in one instance, 20,000 peasants coming against him from the mountains. At length, he was so far brought to his senses as to proclaim an act of toleration; and on his death, his son re-established the religion of his fathers, and drove from his dominions those execrable Jesuits, who for more than 25 years had been sowing discord, and stirring up a weak prince to massacre his people, and even to call in the aid of Mohammedans to butcher his own Christian subjects!

In the beginning of the 18th century, a French Jesuit, Brevdent, attempted a mission to Abyssinia, accompanied by a physician named Poncet; but the former died on the way. The latter visited Abyssinia, and afterwards published a book containing valuable information respecting the state of the country at that time. In 1714, Pope Clement XI. sent out four German monks as missionaries to Abyssinia, who got in favor with the emperor; but as soon as the Abyssinian monks got wind of it, they raised a rebellion, dethroned the emperor, and placed a youthful prince on the throne, who condemned the missionaries to be stoned. A reprieve was offered them, if they would abjure the faith of Rome. They recoiled with horror at the suggestion, and the punishment was commuted to exile. But the monks urged the execution of the original sentence, and the emperor yielded. This event, though by no means to be palliated, shows how intense was the hatred excited by the intrigues of the Jesuits, against Rome; and how the persecuting spirit, which they introduced, recoiled upon their own heads.

Thus it appears that the Abyssinians have preserved their ancient faith, both against the sword of Mohammed and the more insidious and dangerous arts of the Jesuits. Yet, whether there remains any vitality or spiritual life among them, may be questioned. The Edinburgh Encyclopedia says: "The religion of Abyssinia consists of a motley collection of traditions, tenets, and ceremonies, derived from the Jewish and Christian churches. In their form of worship, Judaism seems to predominate. The rites of Moses are strictly observed. Both sexes are circumcised; meats prohibited by the Jews are abstained from; brothers marry the wives of their deceased brothers; women observe the legal purifications; Saturday and Sunday are held sacred as sabbaths; and persons under Jewish disqualifications are prohibited from entering the church. They have festivals and saints innumerable. One day is consecrated to Balaam's ass; another to Pontius Pilate and his wife, because he washed his hands before pronouncing sentence on Christ, and because she warned him to have nothing to do with that just person. The Epiphany is celebrated with peculiar festivity, and they have four seasons of lent, in which many abstain even from fish. They so abound in legends and miracles, that the Jesuits were obliged to deny that miracles are a sufficient proof of the truth of a religion. Images they abhor, but have their churches hung round with pictures, to which they pay the highest veneration. Their canon of Scripture is the same as ours. Upon the whole, it may be said that the religion of the Abyssinians is a monstrous heap of superstitions, giving rise to disputes and persecutions, without producing any salutary effect upon the sentiments and conduct of its professors."

Bishop Gobat, however, says that, "Although the Christian religion in Abyssinia has entirely degenerated into superstition, yet there is still sufficient of it to attach us to the Christians of that country, and to engage us to consider them as brethren." He thinks their religion exerts some good effects upon them; yet he says, "They have no idea of the salutary doctrines of Christianity; such as justification by faith; the work of grace; and the sanctifying influences of the Holy Spirit;" and that "their morals are exceedingly corrupt. But, in the midst of the chaos of corruption, there are some traces of goodness, which, like precious stones, have remained dispersed among the moral ruins of Abyssinia."

Mohammedans.—The Mohammedans appear to have lately multiplied in Abyssinia. They live on friendly terms with the Christians. They are engaged principally in trade, and have the exclusive traffic in slaves, the Christians never engaging in it. They are ignorant of their own creed, and pay little attention to the rites of Islamism; and in morals, they are, in every respect, inferior to the Christians.

Falashas or Jews.—The Falashas live entirely separate from the Christians, and are much more ignorant. They are chiefly found in the neighborhood of Gondar and Shelga, and to the northwest of the Lake Tsana. They have the same superstitions, a little modified after the Jewish fashion.

The Camaountes are a people few in number, inhabiting the mountains about Gondar, principally engaged in agriculture. Bishop Gobat regards them as Deists. They, however, have priests, and assemble in private houses, where they have a repast, which they call "Corban," communion or Eucharist.

The Zalantes are a migratory people, who are said to believe in the existence of one God, but to have no other religion.

MISSION.

Church Missionary Society.—The attention of this Society has been, for many years, directed to this interesting country. In 1815, the Society's missionaries at Malta learned that a native of Abyssinia had been engaged for some years at Cairo in translating the Scriptures into Amharic, the principal vernacular Abyssinian language. This Amharic version of the entire Bible was purchased for the British and Foreign Bible Society in 1820, by Rev. W. Jowett. In 1826, Rev. Samuel Gobat and Rev. Christian Kugler, were sent to Egypt, with the view of entering on a mission to Abyssinia; and after various hindrances, they arrived at Massowah on the 28th of December, 1829, where they were received in a friendly manner. They carried with them portions of the Amharic Scriptures, which had been printed by the British and Foreign Bible Society, and which the people gladly received. They obtained permission to fix their residence at Adowah; while Mr. Gobat proceeded further into the interior, and remained some time at Gondar, the capital, distributing the Scriptures and conversing with the people. But war breaking out, and the whole country being thrown into disturbance, he was detained at that place till October, 1830, when he joined Mr. Kugler at Adowah, in the province of Tigre. On the 29th of December, Mr. Kugler was called to his rest; and his peaceful death made a strong impression upon the natives, who said they had never seen a man die in such full confidence of the Saviour. Soon after this, the chief Sebagdis, who had shown himself very friendly to the mission, and who refused to go out to battle on the Sabbath, was attacked and slain. After his death, each of the chiefs contended for the mastery, and the country was kept in a state of civil war. Mr. Gobat soon after left the country, and arrived at Cairo. In 1833, he visited England, where he published his Journal, containing a full account of his residence in Abyssinia; and several other missionaries were preparing to return with him to that country. On the 20th of December, 1834, Messrs. Gobat and Isenberg arrived at Massowah, in Abyssinia, where they were received by the governor, with much civility. In 1836, Mr. Gobat was visited with a protracted illness, which obliged him to withdraw from his labors. Rev. J. H. Knox died at Cairo on his way to Abyssinia; and the mission was reinforced by the arrival of Rev. C. H. Blumhardt. Opposition began to manifest itself, on the part of the ecclesiastics, on learning that the missionaries rejected some of the rites of their church, and set up worship of their own; but the governor refused to listen to their complaints.

In 1837, Rev. L. Krapf joined the mission, at Adowah; and in March of the following year, a Frenchman and an Italian priest arrived at the same place, their object being to revive the Roman Catholic Mission in Abyssinia. The people having had enough of Romanism, were aroused by their appearance; and this contributed to raise the clamor against the Protestant mission, so that the governor could no longer resist it, and they were obliged to leave the country; which they did with sorrowful hearts, reaching Cairo on the 24th of June. But the Papists penetrated to Gondar, and were active in endeavoring to re-establish their mission. Messrs. Isenberg and Krapf, having received an invitation from the king of Shoa to visit his country, determined to attempt an entrance into Abyssinia by the way of Zeila, south of the straits of Babel Mandel. Shoa lies to the southward of Amhara, the province where the mission was located. They left Suez on this enterprize January 27, 1839, and after encountering many difficulties, reached Shoa on the 31st of May, and met with a favorable reception from the king. They remained there, continually occupied in discussion and preaching, till November 6th, when Mr. Isenberg returned to England. Mr. Krapf continued in Shoa, laboring among the Abyssinian Christians, having secured the confidence of the king of Shoa to a very remarkable degree, so that the king assured him of his protection as long as he should live. Mr. Krapf had made an expedition, with the King of Shoa, among the Galla tribes, by whom the slave trade was carried on to a considerable extent; but it was considered a favorable time to labor for its abolition. The Committee were so impressed with the providential openings, not merely as regarded Abyssinia itself, but also the heathen Galla tribes, that they resolved to form the Abyssinian into a new mission, to be called the East African Mission, and Messrs. Müllheisen and Müller were sent out to reinforce it. As this mission will, hereafter, extend beyond the bounds of Abyssinia, it will be treated under the head c

AFRICA: The continent of Africa is a vast peninsula, in the form of an irregular triangle, of which the north is its base. "Africa," says the learned Prof. Guizot, "is the most singular in its form of all the continents. Its mass, nearly round, or ellipsoidal, is concentrated upon itself. It projects into the ocean no important peninsula, nor anywhere lets into its bosom the waters of the ocean. It seems to close itself against every influence from without. Thus the extension of the line of coasts is only 14,000 geographical miles, for a surface of 8,720,000 square miles; so that Africa has only one mile of coast for 623 miles of surface."

Africa is separated from Europe on the north by the Mediterranean Sea, and from Asia on the east, by the Isthmus of Suez, the Red Sea, and the Indian Ocean. On the south is the Southern Ocean, and on the west, the Atlantic. The equinoctial line divides it into two parts of nearly equal length. It extends from Cape Blanco, opposite Sicily, in lat. $37^{\circ} 21' N.$, to the extreme point of the Cape of Good Hope, (Cape Needles,) in $34^{\circ} 52' S.$, being nearly 72 degrees, or 5,000 English miles in length. Its breadth at the Equator is computed at 4,760 English miles. Its superficial extent has never been accurately determined. It is estimated in the Encyclopedia Britannica, which is among the latest authorities, at 8,550,000 geographical square miles, which does not vary materially from that of Prof. Guizot, as above. It is larger than either Europe or Australia, but smaller than Asia and America.

Progress of Discovery.—The ancients have transmitted to us very little knowledge of this great continent. We derive the first information concerning the interior of Northern Africa from the Arabs, who, by means of the camel, were able to penetrate across the great desert to the very centre of the continent, along the two coasts as far as the Senegal and the Gambia on the west, and to Sofala on the east. On this latter coast, they not only explored to an extent far beyond any supposed limits of ancient discovery, but planted colonies at Sofala, Mombas, Melinda, and at various other places. But the Portuguese were the first to give any thing like an accurate outline of the two coasts, and to complete the circumnavigation of Africa. The discovery of America and the West Indies gave rise to the horrid traffic in African slaves; but this traffic has been the means of a more extended knowledge of the coast between the Senegal and Cameroons, and of the manners and customs of the people. With the English and French settlements in Africa began a systematic survey of the coast, and portions of the interior.

In 1788, a society was formed in London for promoting the exploration of Inner Africa. Under its auspices, important additions were made to the geography of Africa by Houghton, Mungo Park, Hornemann and Burckhardt. In 1831, this association was merged in the Royal Geographical Society.

During the last sixty years, more has been done to make us acquainted with the geography of Africa than during the whole of the 1700 years since Ptolemy. Mungo Park commences the era of unceasing endeavors to explore the Interior. He proceeded in 1795 from the river Gambia on the west coast to the Joliba, or Niger, traced this river as far as Silla, explored the intervening countries, determined the southern confines of the Sahara, and returned in 1797. In 1805, he embarked on a second journey, with the intention of following this river to its mouth. He passed Timbuktu, and reached Bonsee, where he was killed by the natives.

Hornemann, in 1799, penetrated from Cairo to Murzuk, and transmitted from that place valuable information respecting the countries to the south, especially Bornu; but no intelligence was received from him, and it is supposed that he soon after perished.

In 1822, Denham, Clapperton, and Oudney crossed the Great Desert, and reached the great Lake Tsad, Feb. 4, 1823. The surrounding country was explored as far as Sakatu in the west, and Mandara in the south. Oudney died in Bornu. Clapperton crossed the Kawara, from the coast of Guinea, and arrived at Sakatu, at which place he also died. His servant, Richard Lander, returned to England after having explored a part of the adjoining regions. Major Laing succeeded in reaching Timbuktu from Tripoli, but was murdered on his return, in the desert. In 1827 and 1828, Caillié set out from the Rio Nunez on the western coast, reached Timbuktu, and returned from that place through the Great Desert to Marocco.

The termination of the Joliba, Kawara, or Niger, remained in obscurity till 1830, when it was ascertained by Lander and his brother, who succeeded in tracing the river from Yaouri down to its mouth. The great Niger expedition, consisting of three large steam vessels, was despatched by the British Government in 1845, under Captain Trotter; but it proved a failure, and resulted in a melancholy loss of life. Mr. Duncan, one of the survivors of the expedition, made some additions to our geographical knowledge, between the Kawara and the coast, by his journey to Adasfoodiah, in 1845-6; but, in a second journey, in attempting to reach Timbuktu, he met with an untimely death.

A much greater number of travelers have explored the region of the Nile, among the most distinguished of whom are, Bruce, Brown, Burckhardt, Cailliaud, Rüppell, Russeger, Beke, and the Egyptian expeditions up the Nile.

Though the Dutch settlement in South Africa was founded as early as 1650, not much information concerning the interior of that portion of the continent was gained till the end of the 18th century, when a series of journeys was commenced by Sparrmann, and followed up by Vaillant, Barrow, Trotter, Somerville, Lichtenstein, Bruchell, Campbell, Thomson, Smith, Alexander, and Harris.

Within the last five or six years, a number of important discoveries have been made in various parts of Inner Africa, and the present time bids fair to outstrip all previous periods in lifting the veil that has hitherto enveloped Central Africa in impenetrable mystery. Rev. Messrs. Krapf and Rebmann, missionaries of the Church Missionary Society in East Africa, have explored the interior, from that direction, with untiring perseverance, since 1847. (See Africa, Eastern.) At several hundred miles from the coast, they have discovered high mountains, covered with perpetual snow, which is the more interesting from the position being so near the equator.

In South Africa, also, missionaries have been pioneers of geographical discovery. (See Africa, Southern.)

A caravan of native traders recently made a journey across the whole continent, from the coast of Zanzibar to Benguela, in which they crossed Nyassa, the great lake of South Africa.

To the north of the equator, the mission to Lake Tsad, originated by Mr. James Richardson, promises to exceed in importance all previous expeditions to Central Africa. He left England in 1849, for the purpose of concluding commercial treaties with the chiefs of Northern Africa, as far as Lake Tsad, by which legitimate trade might be extended, and the slave trade abolished. Drs. Barth and Overweg accompanied Mr. Richardson, for the purpose of making scientific observations. The party started from Tripoli, March 23, 1850, after having minutely surveyed the mountainous region to the south of that place. The first year, they successfully crossed the whole of Sahara, in a very circuitous westerly direction, and thus explored a great portion of Northern Africa, which had never before been visited by any European. Their route from Ghat to Kano, leading them through the powerful kingdom of Air, or Asben, was highly interesting. The second year, they explored a large portion of Sudan, in different directions. Messrs. Barth and Overweg reached Kuka, the capital of Bornu, but Richardson died on the way, in March, 1851. Dr. Barth penetrated 350 miles to the south, as far as Yola, the capital of the kingdom of Adamana; and Overweg navigated Lake Tsad in a boat, which had been conveyed in pieces across the Sahara, on the backs of camels. In September, 1851, they set out together on a journey to Borgu, a mountainous country lying to the northeast of Lake Tsad, about midway between it and Egypt. They went in company with a sheikh of Bornu, with a large army; but the party were attacked and put to flight, and Barth and Overweg saved their lives by a quick retreat. Returning to Kuka, they set out to the southward, accompanied by about 10,000 horse and the same number of foot soldiers. They explored the country beyond Mandara, the farthest point of Denham's journey, and found it to be one of great fertility. The third year, Dr. Barth made a journey to Maseña, the capital of the kingdom of Baghermi, to the southeast of Lake Tsad; while Overweg traveled in a southwesterly direction, and reached within 150 miles of Yacoba, the great town of the Fellatahs. But on his return to Kuka, he was seized with a fever, of which he died after a short illness. Dr. Barth was about to start for Timbuku; and a reinforcement, consisting of Dr. Vogel and two sappers and miners, was sent to his assistance on the 20th of February, 1852. The latest information obtained by these expeditions is summed up in a valuable article, in the new edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica, now in course of publication, of which free use has been made in the preparation of this article.

Topography.—The physical configuration of Africa may be considered under two heads: the great Plain of Northern Africa; and the great Table Lands, with their mountain ranges and groups, of Central and Southern Africa. The great Plain comprises the Sahara, the Lake Tsad region, and the valley of the Lower Nile. The Sahara is by no means a plain throughout, but for the greater part it rises into table-lands, interspersed with mountain groups of 6,000 feet elevation, and probably more; and the term plain can only be applied to it in a general way, to distinguish it from the more elevated region to the south. The Sahara has often been pictured as an immense and monotonous expanse of sand. But nothing could be more erroneous, as the greatest variety exists in the physical configuration of its surface, as well as in its geological features. The western half is surrounded by a broad belt of plains and depressions, the central parts being formed by extensive table-lands and mountainous regions, comprising the kingdom of Air or Asben, lately explored by Messrs. Richardson, Barth, and Overweg. The route of Dr. Barth, in his journey to Agadez, the capital of that kingdom, was girded by mountain ranges and groups, rising to 3,000 and 4,000 feet; and Mount Dogem, the culminating point in that region, is even between 4,000 and 5,000 feet high. The eastern portion of Sahara appears for the greater part to be a considerably elevated table-land, comprising the mountainous country of Borgu. The narrow valley of the Nile forms the eastern boundary of the Great Desert.

To the south of the Desert, Africa may be considered as one connected mass of elevated land, rising more or less above the sea, and comprising the most extensive table-lands, as well as high mountain groups and chains. Commencing at the Cape of Good Hope, and traversing the three terraces which rise one above another from the coast, an almost uninterrupted table-land has recently been ascertained to extend to the north for at least 1,000 geographical miles. The southern portion is formed by the basin of the Orange river, followed by the desert of Kalihari, which is again succeeded by the basin of the river Sesheké and Lake Ngami, with many other rivers, traversing a region which presents a dead level, its elevation at Lake Ngami being 2,525 feet. That region probably is in connection with the basin of Zambezi. Farther north the ground ascends to the line of water-parting with the basins of Congo river and Lake Nyassa. In this region are supposed to be the celebrated Mountains of the Moon, running, not as formerly supposed, east and west, but having a direction from north to south, and running parallel to the eastern coast, forming the southern continuation of the Abyssinian table-land. It is a remarkable feature that the most elevated peaks rise on the outer edge of this table-land, and even between it and the coast, as isolated cones. One of them, the Abba Yared, rises out of the northern edge of the Abyssinian table-land to the height of 15,000 feet. The system of the Atlas mountains is quite distinct from either of these two divisions. It occupies the northwestern region of Africa, consisting of several ranges, and its highest summits are said to reach an altitude of 15,000 feet.

Rivers.—Africa is emphatically a land of deserts, resulting, of course, in a scarcity of rivers. Many of the smaller rivers and lakes, and not a few of the larger ones, present only dry water-courses during certain periods of the year. Even Lake Tsad is said at times to be nearly dry. With the rains, floods are prevalent all over the country, even in the desert, as the recent observations made by the expedition under Richardson testify. That traveler relates that, when on the borders of the kingdom of Air, on the 30th of Sep. 1850, rain had been seen in the south, and black clouds covering the zone in the heavens; and in an hour afterwards, the cry was heard in the encampment, "The wady is coming!" Going out to look, he saw a white sheet of foam advancing from the south, between the trees of the valley. In ten minutes after, a river of water came pouring along, and spread all around them, converting the place of their encampment into an isle of the valley. The current in its deepest part was powerful, capable of carrying away sheep and cattle, and uprooting trees.

Africa is chiefly drained into the Atlantic ocean and its branch the Mediterranean Sea, the river system of the Indian Ocean being very inconsiderable. The Nile is the oldest of historical rivers, and afforded the only means of subsistence to the earliest civilized people on earth; but the origin or source of the river itself remains an enigma to this day. The area drained by this river is at least 2,000,000 English square miles.

The river Senegal has a length of 1,100 miles, and has its sources in the same elevated tract of land as those of the Kawara. The Gambia and Rio Grande, south of the Senegal, are also considerable rivers. The Kawara, or Niger, is, next to the Nile, the largest of the African rivers. Its sources, like that of the Nile, are still unknown. It appears to be the Ahmar, which is said to rise in a high group of mountains east of Sierra Leone. As far as Timbuktu it is called Joliba, and its course is pretty well known; but from that place to the Yaouri, it is as yet unexplored. Thence down to the mouth, it was first traced by Lander. It is there called Kawara, in general, though it has several names in the different languages of the tribes which inhabit its shores. The Tshadda is its principal tributary, extending far into the heart of Inner Africa. It was recently explored by Dr. Barth in its upper course, where it flows through the kingdom of Adamana. The length of the Kawara is about 3,000 miles, and it drains about 1,500,000 square miles.

South of the equator, the west coast receives many large rivers which are yet unexplored. Such are the Zaire or Congo, the Coanza, and the Nourse, or Cunene. The Swakop has recently been explored by Mr. Galton. The Orange river is about 1,000 miles in length. Its head streams are the Ki, Gariep or Vaal, and the New Gariep, consisting of the Caledon and Cradock. The Orange river drains 350,000 English square miles.

Rounding the southern extremity of Africa, and proceeding up its eastern coast, the Limpopo is the first river requiring notice. Its head streams and middle course are known, but whether it empties into the sea at Delagoa Bay, or at Inhambane, is a matter of doubt. The Zambezi is the largest river of the eastern coasts. Its sources are not known but it is probable that its head-streams are the Sesheké and Chobé, recently discovered by Messrs. Livingston and Oswell.

Africa possesses several considerable lakes, of which lake Tsad is probably the largest and most interesting. It contains about 100 islands of large size, scattered over the lake. They are wooded and inhabited by the Bidduma, a Pagan tribe, who have remained independent of the Mohammedan nations living around the lake. Dr. Overweg was received by them with great kindness, on his landing upon their islands. Lake Tsad has no connection with the Kawara or the Nile, but forms an inland receptacle receiving the waters of some of the most distant regions of Inner Africa.

Lake Fittri forms a distinct hydrographical system between it and the Nile, with which it has no connection. Lake Tsana or Dembea is the chief lake within the basin of the Nile, so far as known. It is situated on the table-land of Abyssinia, at an elevation of 6,110 feet. Other lakes on the Abyssinian table-lands are Zuwai, Haik, and Ashangi.

In Inner Africa, a number of considerable lakes are reported to exist, but only two are known with any degree of certainty, south of the equator, the Nyassa and Ngami. Nyassa, the great lake or sea in 10° south latitude, is as yet only approximately laid down on the maps, according to native information, and whether it be the feeder of a large river, or merely a recipient lake, is unknown. Another lake in that region has recently been reported by the natives to Dr. Krapf, as being situated west of Mombas, beyond Kilimanjaro, and in the country of Uniamézi. (For a description of Ngami, see South Africa.) These are fresh water lakes; besides which there are numerous small salt and natron lakes in various parts of Africa.

Climate.—"The general climate of Africa," says Malte Brun, "is that of the torrid zone; more than three-fourths of the continent being situated between the tropics. The great mass of heated air, incumbent in these hot regions, has ready access to its northern and southern parts, situated in the zones called temperate, so that the portions of them adjoining the tropics are equally torrid with the regions actually inter-tropical. Nothing really moderates the heat and dryness of the African climate, except the annual rains, the sea breezes, and the elevation of the surface. These three circumstances are sometimes united in a greater degree under the equator than in the temperate zones. It is not impossible that in the centre of Africa, there may be lofty table lands, like those of Quito, or valleys like the valley of Cashmere, where, as in those two happy regions, spring holds an eternal reign." Recent discoveries in the interior of Africa favor this hypothesis. Rev. Dr. Krapf, in his recent missionary tours in north-eastern Africa, has discovered ranges of mountains covered with perpetual snow.

The greatest heat is not found under the equator, but to the north of it, in consequence of the northern portion being of greater extent than the southern, and of less elevation. The highest temperature is found throughout the Sahara, particularly in its eastern portions, toward the Red Sea. In upper Egypt and Nubia, eggs may be baked in the hot sands, and the saying of the Arabs is, "In Nubia the soil is like fire, and the wind like a flame." The regions along the Atlantic and Mediterranean coasts are rendered more temperate by the influence of the sea. To the south of the Great Desert, where the country becomes more elevated, the temperature decreases. The intensity of radiation, and its influence upon the temperature, are very great in Northern Africa. While in the day time, the soil of the Sahara rapidly absorbs the solar rays, during the night it cools also so rapidly that often ice is formed. Africa is not much under the influence of regular winds, except the monsoons of the Indian ocean. From hurricanes, Africa is nearly exempt, except its southern extremity, to which at times the Mauritius hurricanes extend. Northern Africa is exposed to the hot winds and storms from the Sahara, which are called in Egypt Khamsin; in the Mediterranean, Sirocco; and in the western regions, Harmattan. Extreme heat and dryness are the characteristics of these winds, which, raising the sand, filling the air with dust, and prodigiously favoring the powers of evaporation, are often fatal to the vegetable and animal creation in the regions visited by them.

The People.—From the shores of the Mediterranean to about latitude 20° north, the population of Africa consists largely of tribes not originally native to the soil, but Arabs and Turks, planted by conquest, with a considerable number of Jews, the children of the dispersion; and the recently introduced French. The Berbers of the Atlas region, the Tuaricks and Tibbus of the Sahara, and the Copts of Egypt may be viewed as descendants of the primitive stock, while those to whom the general name of Moors is applied are perhaps of mixed descent, native and foreign. From the latitude stated, to Cape Colony, tribes commonly classed together under the title of the Ethiopic or negro family are found, though many depart very widely from the physiognomy of the negro, which is most apparent in the natives of the gold coast. In the Cape Colony, and on its borders, the Hottentots form a distinct variety, closely resembling the Mongolian races of Asia. (See Hottentots.)

The Copts, (pron. Ckoobt or Ckibt.) are regarded as the descendants of the ancient Egyptians. They do not now compose more than one-sixth of the population of Egypt, not exceeding in number 150,000, of which 10,000 reside at Cairo. In some parts of Upper Egypt there are villages exclusively inhabited by Copts. Their complexion is somewhat darker than that of the Arabs, their foreheads flat, hair soft and woolly, nose short but not flat, mouth wide, lips thick, eyes large, high cheek bones. They are not an unmixed race, their ancestors, in the earlier ages of Christianity, having intermarried with the Greeks, Nubians, and Abyssinians. (See Copts.)

guage and origin; the Eastern Nubians, and Nubians of the Nile, the latter called Berberines.

The country of the Nubians is limited on the west by that of the Tibbus, who are spread over the eastern portions of the Sahara, as far as Ferran and Lake Tsad. Their color is not uniform, some being quite black, and others copper-colored. They are a pastoral people, and live in square villages, a portion of which is devoted to their flocks.

"All that is not Arabic in the kingdom of Morocco," says Dr. Latham, "in the French provinces of Algeria, in Tunis, Tripoli, and Ferran, is Berber. The language also of the ancient Cyrenaica, indeed the whole country bordering on the Mediterranean, between Tripoli and Egypt, is Berber. The extinct language of the Canary Isles was Berber; and, finally, the language of Sahara is Berber. The Berber languages are essentially inland languages. As a general rule, the Arabic is the language for the whole of the sea coast, from the Delta of the Nile to the straits of Gibraltar, and from the straits of Gibraltar to the mouth of the Senegal. The Berber nation is one of great antiquity, and from the times of the earliest history, has been spread over the same extent of country as at present.

The Moors inhabit large portions of the empire of Morocco, and are spread all along the Mediterranean coast. They are a mixed race, grafted upon the ancient Mauritanian stock, whence their name. After the conquest of Africa by the Arabs, they became mixed with their conquerors. Having conquered Spain, in their turn, they intermarried with the natives of that country, from which they were afterwards driven back to Mauritania. They are a handsome people, having a resemblance to the European. They are also intellectual and not altogether unlettered; but they are cruel, bloodthirsty, and revengeful. Their religion is Mohammedan. They generally lead a settled life as merchants, mechanics, or agriculturists, but there are many wandering tribes; and along the coast of Morocco, they carry on piracy with armed boats.

At two different periods, separated from each other by perhaps a thousand years, Africa was invaded by Arabic tribes, which took a lasting possession of the districts they conquered, and whose descendants form no inconsiderable portion of the population of North and Central Africa, while their language has superseded all others as that of civilization and religion. The second of these was effected by the first successors of Mohammed, who conquered Egypt, and subsequently the whole north of Africa, as far as the shores of the Atlantic, in the course of the first century of the Hegeira, or the seventh of the Christian era.

After the destruction of Jerusalem, the Jews spread rapidly over all the Roman possessions in Africa; and when Philip II. drove them from Spain, thousands of families took refuge on the opposite shores of Africa. They are now numerous in all the northern towns. They live in great degradation, except in Algiers, where the French have given them freedom and independence.

Ever since the conquest of Egypt by Sultan Selim, Turks have settled in the north of Africa, and as they were the rulers of the country, the Turkish became the language of the government; but they can hardly be considered as permanent settlers.

For a description of the Abyssinians, see Abyssinia. The Ethiopian race comprehends by far the greater number of African nations, extending over the whole of the middle and South of Africa, except its southernmost projection towards the Cape of Good Hope. A line drawn from the mouth of the Senegal in the west to Cape Jerdaffur in the east, forms its northern limits; but this race are not all negroes. The latter are only one of its numerous offshoots. The principal negro nations are the Mandingoes, who are numerous and powerful, and partially civilized, in Senegambia, and farther inland, around the head waters of the Kawara, where they have established a great many kingdoms and smaller sovereignties. They are black, with a mixture of yellow, and their hair is completely woolly. The Wolofs or Yolofs, whose language is totally different from those of their neighbors, are the handsomest and blackest of all negroes, although they live at a greater distance from the equator than most of the other black tribes, their principal dwelling-places being between the Senegal and the Gambia, along the coast of the Atlantic.

The Foulahs or Fellatahs occupy the central parts of Sudan. Their color is black, with a striking copper hue. They are one of the most remarkable nations in Africa, very industrious, live in commodious and clean habitations, and are mostly Mohammedans. Of the principal nations of Guinea, among whom the negro type is particularly distinct, especially around the Bight of Benin, are the Felooas, near Caramanca, very black yet handsome, and the Ashanti, who surpass all their neighbors in civilization. In South Guinea we meet with three principal nations, the Congo, the Abunda, and the Benguela negroes. The next great branch of the Ethiopic race comprehends the Galla, who occupy an immense tract in Eastern Africa, from Abyssinia as far as the inland Portuguese possessions in Mozambique, to the south of the equator. An interesting tribe of them, the Somali, have lately been brought to the knowledge of Europeans, a widely scattered nation, who lead a pastoral life on the uplands, and also nearer to the coast of the Indian Ocean from Cape Jerdaffur southward to a considerable distance. They seem to be of a mild and peaceful disposition, while the other Galla tribes are a warlike race. The Kaffres, Hottentots, and Bushmen, occupy the greater portion of Southern Africa. (See Kaffres and Hottentots.) The island of Madagascar is inhabited by a race of Malay origin, exhibiting traces of Negro and Arabic mixture.

The total population of Africa is vaguely estimated, according to the most recent researches, at 100,000,000.

Languages.—The Arabic is the language of the North, and the Mandingo is used from the Senegal to the Niger. But the languages or dialects of the negroes are as multifarious as the nations. According to Seetzen, the languages of Africa must amount to 100 or 150; but some trace them to a common origin. Rev. John Leighton Wilson, late missionary of the American Board at the Gaboon, in an article in the Bibliotheca Sacra for November, 1847, says: "Too little is yet known of the numerous and diversified dialects of Africa, to determine with certainty the precise number of families which they form."

"In the northern half of the continent, or that portion of it inhabited by the black races, the number of languages is very great, the different families of which show very little, if any, affinity for each other; while in the southern division, one great family prevails over nearly the whole of it, even to the Cape of Good Hope."

Government.—Most forms of government may be found in Africa. Despotism, however, in its worst and most offensive shape, is by far the most prevalent; and, with few exceptions, slavery and anarchy reign triumphant throughout Africa.

Industry, in Africa, is at the lowest ebb. The Africans have, of themselves, generally made little progress in the arts. All the more laborious occupations are imposed on the females. In some parts, the wives of kings and petty princes till the land for the support of their lords. The Mandingoes, however, have made considerable advances in civilization, and the Ovas of Madagascar are an industrious people.

Commerce.—An extensive intercourse has been carried on, from the remotest antiquity, between very distant parts of the continent, in consequence of the natural adaptation of the products of one part to supply the wants of another. Thus Northern Africa supplies Central Africa with dates and salt, and receives, in return, gold dust, ivory, gums, palm-oil, feathers and slaves. Egypt and the towns in the Barbary States have always been the great seats of trade, which is carried on wholly by caravans, numbering from 500 to 2000 camels.

Slave Trade.—Slaves have been the staple article of export from the African coast; and in some years as many as 110,000 or 120,000 have been carried across the Atlantic. In order to supply slaves for the market, a wholesale system of brigandage and robbery has been organized in many extensive districts, the people being hunted down like game by the petty princes, and by the Mohammedans, who affect to believe that they are entitled to capture and sell the "idolators," to serve as beasts of burden in another hemisphere.

The sufferings and misery which result from this traffic, the merciless waste of human life, and the "horrors of the middle passage," no tongue can tell, no imagination can paint; yet these are but the lesser evils of this horrid trade. Its deepest wound has been inflicted upon the moral and social condition of the country. It has undermined all the deep foundations of society, dissolved the bonds of friendly alliance between adjoining villages, destroyed the peace of families, and extinguished the last remaining spark of parental affection. Even the mother will sell her own child for a few strings of beads or a gallon of rum. It is gratifying, however, to know that the efforts of the British government, together with the influence of the American colony at Liberia, have nearly extinguished the inhuman traffic upon a large extent of the western and south-eastern coasts, where it has heretofore been carried on to the greatest extent.

The traffic has also received a considerable check on the eastern coast, in consequence of a treaty for its suppression between the British Government and the Imaum of Muscat.

Religion.—Christianity is professed in Abyssinia, and in Egypt by the Copts, but its doctrines and precepts are little understood or obeyed. Mohammedanism prevails in all the northern countries; but the native mind generally is surrendered to superstitions of indefinite number and character. The labors of Christian missionaries have, however, especially in South Africa, done much towards turning the benighted Africans from idols to the living God. (See Western and Southern Africa.)

The social condition of Africa is, of course, extremely depressed. The lowest form of polygamy is diffused all over Africa; and although forbidden in Abyssinia, the marriage tie is there so slight as hardly to have any sensible influence; and morals are in a state of almost total dissolution. Cannibalism formerly prevailed to a frightful extent throughout Africa; and though checked by the motive of providing slaves for market, is still found to exist in some parts. Among some considerable nations, the exposure of children, and the slaughter of those that are deformed or maimed, is not only tolerated but enforced. In some parts human blood is mixed with the mortar used in the construction of temples. McCulloch's Geography; Malte Brun; McQueen's Geographical Survey; Condor's Dictionary of Geography; and especially the Encyclopedia Britannica.

MISSIONS.

Africa, notwithstanding its terrible climate, bad government and petty wars, forms one of the most interesting missionary fields in the world. Its native inhabitants, though deeply degraded, are found peculiarly susceptible to religious influences. And wherever the gospel has been preached long enough to penetrate through their ignorance and superstition, it has generally found a congenial soil. No missions in the world have been more successful, in proportion to the means employed, than those of the Moravians and the London Missionary Society, in South Africa, and the Church Missionary Society in West Africa.

The way is opening up for the extension of Christian missions into the interior; and so much preparatory work has already been accomplished, in reducing the languages to writing and translating the Scriptures, that we may look for rapid changes, and confidently hope that the day is not distant when a large portion of the continent will be Christianized. The results of the missionary work in Africa will be seen by the following

Owing to the manner in which some of the societies make their returns, it was not possible to make the foregoing table perfect in all its parts, as several items are not reported at all, by many of them. But few of the societies give any account of the female members of the missions; and but few give any distinct intimation whether their laborers are clergymen or not. But on several points of chief importance they are complete, viz.: the whole number of laborers, communicants, and scholars in school. These items will indicate very clearly the state of the work. Deducting the females and native helpers, it appears that there are less than four hundred European and American missionary laborers, on the whole continent of Africa; which will give 270,000 to each laborer. This presents an appalling aspect of the destitution of that dark, benighted land. On the other hand we have a most encouraging and cheering view of the success of missionary labor in this portion of the vineyard of the Lord, which fully sustains what we have said of the susceptibility of the African character to religious impression; for we have but little less than eighty converts to each missionary laborer on the continent and islands of Africa. The missions are generally represented as in a prosperous condition, except that in some portions of South Africa, they have suffered from the Kaffre war, and in Madagascar, the converts still suffer persecution. These statistics can be corrected at any future time on referring to the January and February numbers of the London Missionary Register for the current year.

AFRICA, EASTERN. East Africa, according to McCulloch, comprises the region to the north of the Zambezi river, round by the sea coast, to the confines of Abyssinia. The Encyclopedia Britannica makes it extend from Natal to the Red Sea, (which would take in a portion of the limits we have allotted to Southern Africa,) comprising Sofala, Mozambique, Zanzibar, and the Somali country. But little is known of that region beyond the coast. The Sofala country, extending from Delagoa Bay to the Zambezi river, is flat, sandy, and marshy, gradually ascending towards the interior. The soil is very fertile and produces chiefly rice. In the interior gold and other metals and precious stones are found.

Mozambique extends from the Zambezi to Cape Delgoda, and is similar in its natural features to the Sofala coast. The country is inhabited by the large and powerful tribe of the Macuas. The principal river is the Zambezi.

Zanzibar or Sawahili coast extends from Cape Delgoda to the river Jub, near the equator. The coast is generally low, and has but few bays or harbors. Its northern portion is rendered dangerous by a line of coral reefs. The region possesses a great number of rivers, but none of the first magnitude. The climate is similar to that of other tropical coasts of Africa, hot and unhealthy. In some portions, however, the elevated ground, which is more temperate and healthful, approaches near to the coast.

The island of Zanzibar is the residence of the Imaum of Muscat, (whose dominion extends a considerable distance along the coast,) and is the seat of an extensive commerce. Mombas, on a small island close to the main shore, possesses the finest harbor on the coast.

The Somali comprises the eastern horn of Africa, from the equator northward to the Bay of Tudjorra, near the Red Sea. The coast is generally bold and rocky; and the extensive region it encloses, presents a slightly ascending plain, traversed by large and fertile valleys. Along the Arabian gulf, the coast is very abrupt, and girded with a range of mountains, the highest of which, Jebel Ahl, reaches an elevation of 6,500 feet. The Somali country is famous for its aromatic productions. The inhabitants belong to the Galla tribe.—Encyclopedia Britannica; Harris's Highlands of Ethiopia; The Nile and its Tributaries; McCulloch's Geography; African Repository, Jan. 1850.

MISSION.

Church Missionary Society.—The Abyssinian Mission, which was commenced in 1829, was, in 1841, changed into the East African Mission, embracing a much wider range than was originally contemplated by it. (See Abyssinia.) Mr. Krapf writes from Ankobar, in 1841, that the people of Shoa manifested a great desire for the word of God, and that they besieged his house from morning till evening, to procure copies of the Scriptures. He had translated the four Gospels into the Galla language.

During the year 1842, the Mission was interrupted by various causes; but a treaty of friendship and commerce was concluded between the British Government and the King of Shoa, which provides protection for British subjects in the territories of Shoa. Mr. Krapf undertook a difficult and dangerous journey to the capital of Abyssinia, in order to ascertain what encouragement the new Abuna would give to missionary operations in Abyssinia. He afterwards proceeded to Alexandria to meet Messrs. Isenberg and Mühliessen, who were on their way to join him.

About this time there arose a fierce dispute between the more enlightened party and the monks, in the Shoa province, respecting some frivolous points of speculation; and the monks prevailed with the king, by threatening excommunication, which gave the more ignorant and bigoted party the ascendancy. Mr. Krapf before leaving expressed a fear that their influence might prove unfavorable to the mission. And, on his return, with the brethren, he found that the king had prohibited their return, and all efforts to induce the chiefs of the countries lying between the sea and Abyssinia to let them pass were unavailing.

Messrs. Isenberg and Mühliessen proceeded to Abyssinia by the way of Massowah, to ascertain the disposition of the new Abuna, and see whether there might not be an opening for the renewal of the mission at the Capital. But in this they were disappointed. They found the enemies of the mission in the ascendancy; the Abuna gave them no encouragement; and the chief Oubea ordered them to quit Abyssinia. They had no alternative but to return to Cairo. But during their stay in Abyssinia, they were able to dispose of more than two thousand copies of the Scriptures.

Dr. Krapf, meantime, visited Aden, in order to concert a plan for reaching the Galla tribes in Eastern Africa, from the Indian Ocean; and from that place he wrote a letter to the committee, asking their approval of the plan, which he afterwards received; but while waiting for it he went to Massowah, and learning the difficulties encountered by his associates, he remained on the frontier of Tigre, and employed himself in the distribution of the Scriptures.

After receiving the approval of the committee, Dr. and Mrs. Krapf sailed for Zanzibar, but were driven back and exposed to great danger; and after a very trying voyage they arrived at Zanzibar, Jan. 7, 1844. There he was kindly received by the Imaum of Muscat, to whom they were introduced by the British Consul. The Imaum wrote a letter to the governors on the coast, after this manner: "This note is given in favor of Dr. Krapf, the German, a good man, who desires to convert the world to God. Behave ye well toward him, and render him services every where." After remaining there about two months, he proceeded on his way, touching at several places, and arrived at Mombas, a small island at the mouth of the Tuaca river, about 4° south latitude, which he selected as the site of the mission. After his arrival there, Mrs. Krapf was called home, some of her last words being, "Do not praise me in your account of my last hours; but tell our friends that the Saviour has pardoned me, a poor miserable sinner." She had endured great hardships, in the tossings to and fro to which they had been subjected for months previous.

After this afflictive bereavement, Dr. Krapf devoted himself with energy and zeal to the work of his mission, giving his first attention to the study of the languages spoken in those regions. He, however, made several excursions among the Wonica and Wakamba tribes on the continent, declaring to them the blessed gospel, and surveying the ground with reference to future operations. He found the natives extremely degraded, indulging to a fearful extent in habits of intoxication, and frequently selling their children to obtain the means of indulgence. He also applied himself to the work of translation; and three years after the establishment of the mission, he had translated Genesis, Acts, Romans, Galatians, Peter, and 1 John into the Sooahelee language; and Luke and John into both Sooahelee and Wonica. He had also compiled a dictionary of 10,000 words of the Sooahelee, Wonica and Wakamba languages. In 1846, Rev. J. Rebbman was appointed to this mission. Dr. Krapf had suffered from severe and repeated attacks of fever, which greatly impaired his constitution. He had, however, continued his missionary tours, in which he gathered much valuable information respecting the interior tribes, laboring to preach the gospel every where; and wherever he could make himself understood, the natives would repeat what they heard to others, and thus spread the message of salvation.

On the arrival of Mr. Rebbman, immediate arrangements were made for commencing a mission among the Wonicas, and New Rabbai was selected as the location; which is situated about four miles to the west of the extremity of the bay, at a considerable elevation, commanding an extensive view. The people, with one mind, cheerfully gave their consent to the establishment of the mission, assuring the missionaries of their friendship and protection. Both Dr. K. and Mr. R. were laid aside some weeks with the fever; and before they had fully recovered, they set out in great weakness, for the new mission, Dr. K. saying, "The mission ~~must~~ be commenced; and should death or life result to me, I can now have no regard to sickness whatever." They found this place more salubrious than Mombas; and though encountering many difficulties, yet met with some encouragement. Although of a peaceable disposition, the Wonicas are deeply sunk in ignorance, indifference, superstition, and sensuality. In Sept. 1847, after laboring 12 months, they had established a small school and erected a small cottage for worship, which would hold 60 or 80 persons, but only a few had been induced to attend. These indefatigable missionaries continued to make exploring tours in the interior, and in one of their excursions to the north, they came in sight of the Galla country, so long the object of desire on the part of Dr. Krapf. Their journeys to the west opened a new country, of which the physical character and the disposition of the inhabitants present facilities for missionary labor of the most encouraging kind. The Wakambas, with whom the missionaries are in daily intercourse, carry on a traffic with the main body of their tribe, from 400 to 600 miles distant in the interior. Three groups of mountains, 4,000 to 5,000 feet high, enclose the Faita country, whose inhabitants are estimated at 170,000 souls; and Dr. Krapf thinks there are no insurmountable obstacles in the way of establishing a mission among them. In 1848, Mr. Rebbman explored the country beyond Faita, called Jagga, travelling on foot amidst a thorny jungle, infested by wild beasts, for seven days. But having ascended the second range of mountains, he felt as if walking in the Jura mountains, in the Canton of Basle, so cool was the air, so beautiful the scenery.

It will be recollected, that in 1843, the missionaries were forcibly driven from Abyssinia, through the influence of the emissaries of Rome. Since that time the Jesuits themselves have been obliged to leave the country. In June, 1849, Mr. Lieder writes that the young king of Shoa, Beshahel Ouered, had written to the Queen of Great Britain, desiring a renewal of the friendly intercourse that had existed between the British Government and his father, and to Dr. Krapf, requesting his return. The young king, only 14 years of age, had renounced the heterodox notions of his father, and delivered hundreds of persons whom the late king had thrown into prison, because they would not embrace his views. He had also taken the Metropolitan, Amba Salame, (see Abyssinia,) as his spiritual guide. Amba Salame himself, had also written to Mr. Lieder for two good teachers, as he was anxious to open a school of a superior character, in Gondar. And the king of Abyssinia and the Abuna had both written to Bishop Gobat, proposing that he should undertake the superintendence of the Abyssinian Convent at Jerusalem; in consequence of which the Committee determined to establish a mission at Jerusalem, to provide, among other objects, for the instruction of Abyssinian pilgrims.

Dr. Krapf and his associates, in their reports for 1849, speak discouragingly of their prospects at the new station of Rabbai-Empia, owing to the depths of ignorance and superstition to which the people were reduced. Their minds are enslaved by sorcery; and many cruel customs, such as putting to death all deformed children, prevail among them; yet the missionaries had been encouraged by the awakening of a poor cripple. This year the mission received a reinforcement; but one of the newly arrived missionaries was cut off by inflammatory fever soon after their arrival.

They had continued to prosecute the exploring tours, showing wonderful openings for the entrance of the Gospel into the interior. In the mean time, Dr. Krapf prosecuted the study of the languages, and the translation of the Scriptures, with zeal and success. He has come to the conclusion that, from the Galla boundary down to the Cape of Good Hope, there is one family of languages, which he calls the Suahéli stock; which stock, he thinks, from specimens he has received of West African languages, commences on the southern bank of the Gaboon River.

The report of the mission for 1850 is encouraging. The poor cripple noticed the previous year had been baptized and died in hope; and two others had made an open profession of their belief in Christianity, one of whom was the father of a family, in independent circumstances, and the other a learned Mohammedan, the Cadi of his village, who gave up his office, and the gains attached to it, for the Gospel's sake, and placed himself under the instruction of the missionaries.

The missionary tours have been continued; and Dr. Krapf gives the following view of the great results to which his discoveries may lead:

"When once the time has fully come that the Hamitic race shall be made acquainted with the Gospel, and be received into the family of God's children on earth, the high roads of Africa will take every observer by surprise. It will then be manifested that the facilities of communication on the African continent, are not inferior to those of Europe, Asia and America. God's Providence has certainly paved the way for the speedy accomplishment of his sublime designs. The Niger will carry the messengers of peace to the various states of Nigritia, while the Tshadda, together with the Congo, will convey them to the western centre of Africa, toward the northern tribes of Uniamési. The different branches of the Nile will lead the missionaries toward the same centre from the north and north-east, while the Jub and the Dana will bring them in from East Africa; and the Kilimani will usher them in from the south. The sources of these great rivers are not so distant from each other as our present geographical knowledge would lead us to believe. Shall we propose, therefore, and undertake the formation of a mission chain, linking together the eastern and western coasts of Africa? Or, shall we follow up the water-courses of the continent, by establishing missions at the sources and estuaries of those great rivers? The Tshadda, the Congo, the Nile and the Kili-mani rivers, take their rise either from the great lake in Uniamési, or very near it. And if the communication with Central Africa shall be found so simple and so easy, why should we question the speedy spread of Christianity and Christian civilization in Africa?"

In these tours, the missionaries obtained much valuable geographical information; and among other objects of interest, they saw a range of mountains, the tops of which were covered with perpetual snow. After the completion of these tours, Dr. Krapf visited England, in order to print his translations, and to confer with the Society upon future plans for the East African Mission. He also visited Germany, where he selected three pious mechanics to accompany him to Africa, and one of the students at Basle, who was ordained by the Bishop of London. Dr. Krapf having fully explained to the Committee his views upon the East African Mission, he returned at the beginning of 1851, with the view of establishing new stations, retaining Rabbai as a starting point on the coast. He returned accordingly, with his new associates; and, after their arrival at Rabbai, he began preparations for going with Mr. Pfefferle to Usambara, to redeem a pledge given to King Kmeri, of establishing a mission among his people. But Mr. Pfefferle soon after died of nervous fever, the fever of the country, and Dr. K. prosecuted the journey alone, with some native servants, who deserted him in the hour of danger. He was attacked by robbers on the way, and obliged to give up the object, and to return to the coast. But while attempting to reach the river Dana, he was again attacked, and came near losing his life. And, after a fatiguing journey, suffering from hunger and thirst, and amid many perils, he at length reached the station. But, with indomitable resolution, he still pursues his object of establishing a chain of missions across the continent; but thinks they cannot at once penetrate far into the interior, but that they must first occupy a nearer post.

Dr. Krapf afterwards visited Usambara, and King Kmeri received him well, and desired that the mission might be established on a mountain thirty or forty miles from the estuary of the river Pangani; and offered to order a considerable number of his subjects to build houses and cultivate the land for him; and also to afford them protection and give them an opportunity to carry on their labors. A wide door for usefulness here presented itself, but at the latest dates, he had not entered upon the work.

AFRICA, SOUTHERN: The region south of Cape Negro, on the west, and of the river Zambezi, on the east, embracing, within its limits, the English colony of the Cape of Good Hope.

Topography.—The country consists of three successive plateaus, increasing in elevation ac-

ording to their distance from the sea, and separated from each other by as many chains of mountains. The first of these is called the Lange Kloof, or Long Pass; and between it and the sea is an irregular belt of fertile land, well watered with small streams and frequent rains, from 20 to 60 miles in breadth. It is well wooded with forest trees, and from its proximity to the ocean has a mild climate. The next chain is the Great Black Mountain, (Groote Zwaite Bergen.) It is more lofty and rugged than the first, consisting, in many places, of double and treble ranges, and sometimes rising to the height of 4,000 feet. Between these two is a belt of about the same area as that outside the first, composed in some parts of barren hills, in others, of naked arid plains of clay, called Karoo, interspersed with fertile and well-watered patches of land. The third chain of mountains, called the Nieuwveldt Gebirgte, unites toward the east, with the Schneeuw-bergen (Snow Mountain,) the highest in South Africa, its most elevated peak being 10,000 feet above the sea; and covered with perpetual snow. Between this and the second range is an arid, desert plain, nearly 300 miles in length by 90 to 100 in width, called the Great Karroo. This is not a sandy plain, like the great desert, but a sort of tableland, thinly covered with an argillaceous soil, impregnated with iron, upon a substratum of rock. It is about 3,000 feet above the level of the sea. The beds of numberless rivulets, in which water is rarely to be found, cross it like veins, in a thousand directions. Mr. Moffat says, the entire country, extending in some places hundreds of miles on each side of the Orange river, and from where it empties into the Atlantic to beyond the 24th degree of east longitude, appears to have the curse of Gilboa upon it. It is rare that rains to any extent or quantity fall in those regions. Extreme drought continues for years together. The fountains are few and precarious, and some of them have dried up altogether.

From the west coast the country ascends, in a similar manner towards the interior, by successive plateaus, separated by mountain chains. The Roggeveldt (Rye-field,) the loftiest of these, rises to more than 5,000 feet above the level of the sea. To the north of all, and near the boundary line of the territory, there is a chain of mountains 9,000 feet in height. The whole tract of country to the north is much more sandy, barren and thinly inhabited than that to the east, which, as it recedes from the Cape, seems to increase in fertility and beauty.

The third great chain of mountains forms the watershed, or division between the streams which flow north, into the country of the Bosjesmans or Bushmen, and those which run southwest, through the colony. On its northern side, rise the tributaries of the Orange river, and on its south the Great Doorn, (Thorn,) Gamba, Camtoos, Sunday, Great Fish, and other rivers. On the west coast, the principal streams are the Great Berg, (Mountain,) and Olifant or Elephant river. Both are navigable for small craft about twenty miles. On the south coast are the Breede or Broad river, the Gauritz, Camtoos, Sunday and Great Fish. The Broad river is navigable for small craft about 30 miles. Considering the extent of the coast, good harbors are few. Saldanha Bay, Cape Town, is the best.

The Great Lake.—On the 1st of June, 1849, Rev. David Livingston, son-in-law of Mr. Maffat, of Kolobeng, more than 200 miles N. E. by N. from Kuruman, proceeded on a tour of discovery to Lake Ngami, 300 miles N. W. from Kolobeng. But by the circuitous route which he pursued, he traveled about 600 miles. After proceeding about 300 miles through the desert of Kalihari, the party struck on a magnificent river, the Zouga, and following it to its source, it proved to be the Great Lake. The banks of this river are beautiful, covered with gigantic trees, some of them bearing fruit. Two of the Boabob variety measured 70 to 76 feet in circumference. The higher they ascended the broader the river became. It has a periodical rise of water, supposed to be occasioned by the melting of the snow on the mountains. Its waters are clear and soft, and it is said to be connected with other large rivers, running from the north. Another party visited this lake in 1852, and ascertained its length to be sixty-five, and its average breadth 12 miles. It is at an elevation of 2,825 feet above the sea. Mr. Livingston found a tribe of natives on the banks of the Zouga, called Bakoba or Bayeiye, in whom he was deeply interested. They are a totally distinct race from the Bechuanas, their complexion being darker, and they speaking a different language. He admired their frank, manly bearing. They listened to the statements which he made respecting the Divine Word, and seemed to understand them. They were found dwelling around the lake, and on the banks of all the rivers to the north, which seemed to open a highway capable of being quickly traversed by boats. Thus is the way opening in every direction, for the entrance of the gospel into that dark region.

In 1851, Messrs. Livingston and Orwell again started for the north, but in a more easterly direction, when they reached the latitude of 17° 25' S., and discovered the Chobe and Sesheke, deep and constantly flowing rivers, supposed to be the feeders of the Zambezi. The Zouga was ascertained to be absorbed in sands and salt pans. The country through which the former rivers flow, is level and very fertile.

Capt. Vardon explored the region northeast of Kolobeng, tracing the Limpopo river to a considerable distance. In 1851, Mr. Galton explored a part of South Africa from Walfish Bay, on the west coast as far as lat. $17^{\circ} 58'$ S. and 21° E. long., accurately determining the whole region.

In 1852, a journey was made by Mr. Plant, from Natal to Delagoa Bay, in which he discovered that St. Lucia Bay leads into an extensive inlet, hitherto unknown.

Climate.—The climate is in general temperate and healthy, but unsteady, disagreeable, and not well suited to agriculture. In the south-western districts, the rains in the cold season are profuse, but of rare occurrence in the summer. In the more northerly districts, sometimes no rain falls for years; which, however, Mr. Moffat attributes to the universal destruction of the forests. Generally, throughout the colony, the rain, when it does come, pours down in torrents, occasioning great damage. Sometimes the southeast wind is a species of Simoom, excessively hot, and loaded with an impalpable sand. The mean temperature of the Cape is about $67\ 1\text{--}2^{\circ}$ Fahr., the coldest being 57° and the hottest 79° . Yet Mr. Moffat thinks the climate of the colony perhaps the healthiest to be found in any part of the world. With reference to the climate of the whole of Southern Africa, Mr. Moffat says, "It varies from that in which thunder-storms and tornadoes shake the mountains, and the scorching rays of an almost vertical sun produce the mirage, to that which is salubrious and mild, within the boundaries of the colony along Kaffre-land to the fruitful and well-watered plains of the Zulu country, in the vicinity of Port Natal; while the more mountainous and elevated regions are visited by keen frosts and heavy falls of snow."

Native Population.—When the Cape was first discovered by Bartholomew Diaz, and when it was taken possession of by the Dutch in 1662, the whole of what is now designated as the colony was inhabited by the Hottentots proper.

The Kaffres proper live beyond the fish river, on the eastern boundary of the colony. They form one tribe of the great Bechuana family. Their national character is bold and warlike. Their country is bounded by the ocean on the south, and a range of mountains on the north, and beyond them lie the Amopondo and Zulu tribes, belonging to the same family. North of Kaffre-land, between the Winterberg mountains and the higher branches of the Yellow river, lies the country inhabited by the Basutos, a tribe of Bechuanas. Beyond the Basutos to the north of Orange river, lie the other Bechuana tribes, whose numbers and extent are yet unknown.

The country from the limits of the desert to the west coast is called Great Namaqualand, and contains a thin population of the Hottentot race. To the north of the Namaquas, lie the Damara tribes, of whom comparatively little is known, except that they approximate, in physical appearance and color, to the negroes on the west coast. These tribes inhabit a country extending from the tropic of capricorn to the Cape of Good Hope, and from the Atlantic to the shore of the Indian ocean.

The tribes which have been mentioned are those which have been the objects of missionary labor. (See CAPE COLONY, KAFFRES, HOTTENTOTS.) — McCulloch's Geography; Moffat's Labors and Scenes in Southern Africa, Chap. I.: Encyclopedia Britannica.

MISSIONS.

Moravian Mission.—Missionary operations were first commenced in South Africa, by the United Brethren. In 1737, George Schmidt arrived at Cape Town, a free passage having been granted him by the Dutch East India Company. His object was to make known the gospel to the Hottentots; and he soon commenced his labors at Bavian's Kloof, afterwards called Genadendal, (Vale of Grace.) Though obliged to preach through an interpreter, his self-denying efforts were followed by considerable success. The Hottentots regarded him with sentiments of unfeigned love and admiration; and in the course of a few years a number of them received his message as the truth of God. Finding himself, however, much embarrassed in his operations by the interference of the colonial government, he repaired to Europe in 1744 to obtain a removal of his grievances. But he not only failed to secure this important object; the Dutch East India Company even refused to sanction his return to the scene of his labors; and for fifty years the harvest which he had begun to gather, was left without a reaper.

At length, however, in July, 1792, Marsveld, Schwinn and Kühnel were permitted to search for the few sheep, who had been left so long without a shepherd at Genadendal. They found a part of the wall of the old mission-house standing; and in the garden attached to it were some of the fruit-trees which Schmidt had planted. An aged female whom he had baptized, and who still retained a remembrance of her beloved teacher, rejoiced exceedingly when she was told that the new missionaries were his brethren. The Hottentots,—some of whom recollected their old pastor, while many had heard of his brief but beneficent career,—rallied around his successors; and before the end of 1793, seven persons were baptized. Great opposition, however was encountered, from the Dutch farmers, or boers, as they are called, who, thinking the instruction of the Hottentots likely to prove injurious to their temporal interests, manifested their hostility by poisoning the minds of the natives, and by threatening violence against the missionaries. They also preferred charges against them, to the colonial government, thereby securing orders for embarrassing their proceedings. By these means the mission was for a long time kept in a state of constant alarm. In one instance, a numerous body of the colonists rose in arms, to obtain a redress of alleged grievances, among which was the attempt to evangelize the Hottentots; in consequence of which, the missionaries were, at one time, driven from their post.

Mr. Schwinn, while traveling to Cape Town, on one occasion, was refused either lodging or refreshment by the colonists, and was compelled to ride all night, attended by a single Hottentot, through a desert country infested with runaway slaves. Through all these trials, however, the native converts stood by their teachers, in the greatest extremities.

But in 1795, the colony was taken possession of by the British Government, and the mission at Bavian's-Kloof, was taken under protection by the new government. After this, they enjoyed more quietness and peace, a considerable number of new people came to them, and the word of God was owned and blessed to the conversion of souls. A Church was built, and before the close of the year, twenty adult converts were baptized. Still their enemies were not quiet. In February, 1796, some of the neighboring farmers assembled a hundred armed men, with the design of murdering the missionaries, and destroying their settlement; but the plot was discovered by the government, and prevented. Afterwards the boers undertook to starve the missionaries and their people, by refusing them provisions, which occasioned much suffering. But the Lord turned the hearts of some of the worst of their persecutors, who acknowledged the utility of their labors, and sent a wagon load of corn to the settlement, at a lower price than it would have been sold elsewhere.

The mission now began to be visited by persons of influence at Cape Town, who bore honorable testimony to its good effects; and among others, Mr. Borrow, who gives the following account of what he saw: "Early on Sunday morning, I was awakened by some of the finest voices I had ever heard, and looking out, saw a group of Hottentot women neatly dressed in calico, sitting on the ground, and chanting their morning hymn. The missionaries were middle-aged men, plain in their dress, meek and humble in deportment, but intelligent and lively in conversation, zealous in their cause, but free from bigotry. Every thing partook of their characteristic neatness and simplicity. Their church was a neat plain building, and their mill the best in the colony. Their garden produced abundance of vegetables. Almost every thing had been done by the work of their hands, their society requiring every one to understand some trade. They have upwards of six hundred Hottentots, and their numbers are daily increasing. These live in huts dispersed over the valley, to each of which is attached a piece of land, and their houses and gardens are very neat and comfortable; and all are engaged in useful trades or occupations. On Sunday they all regularly attended public worship, and it is astonishing how neat and clean they appear at church. Their deportment was truly devout. The discourse of the missionary was short, pathetic, and full of good sense. The women sung in a plaintive and affecting style, and their voices were sweet and harmonious."

In 1798, a reinforcement arrived from Europe, and the old church was converted into dwellings, and a new one built, capable of holding 1,500 persons, the settlement having increased to 1,230. Eighty-four were baptized during this year.

In the summer of 1800, an epidemic fever raged for some months, carrying off sometimes eight or ten a day. To meet the occasion an arrangement was made by which each missionary and his wife visited a certain district every week, making a circuit of four or five miles, at great peril to their own lives. They found the poor people lying in the greatest misery, upon nothing but a sheep-skin spread on the bare ground, without medical aid, and often without food; the convalescent tormented with hunger, and the poor, naked children crying for food. When they spoke to them, in those circumstances, of the love of Jesus, they were cheered by seeing them listen with eagerness, seeming to forget all their sufferings, and resigning themselves to the will of the Lord, expressing their confident hope that he would receive them to himself, and extolling his goodness, in sending them teachers to instruct them in the knowledge of their Redeemer.

By this time, (1801,) the fame of Bavian's-Kloof had spread far and wide, and the natives came in companies, some of them the distance of a six weeks' journey. One poor woman came, who said she understood Bavian's-Kloof to be an asylum for poor sinners like herself who had become tired of the service of Satan, and were desirous of finding rest for their souls. Peace being concluded between the English and Dutch, the colony was restored to the latter, and the new governor proved friendly to the mission, and one of the missionaries was appointed chaplain to the colony. At the suggestion of Gen. Jansen, the Governor, the name of the place was changed to Gnadenthal, or Genadenal, which means Gracevale.

In January, 1806, the colony was again conquered by the British; but the government continued friendly to the mission. In 1807, a new settlement was formed at Groenckloof, or Green-glen, in the high road between Cape Town and Saldanha Bay, and Messrs. Schmitt and Kohrhammer removed there with their wives in 1808. They soon gathered a settlement around them, and their labors were blessed by the Holy Spirit, and many were turned to the Lord, giving evidence of repentance and faith. The following remarks of one of these converts is a specimen of the feelings generally expressed, giving evidence of the genuineness of the work of grace in the heart : "I seem to be surrounded by my sins, like a man standing in the midst of the fire, and am ready to be consumed by the anguish of my spirit ; but in this situation, I stretch out my arms toward heaven, and exclaim, Lord Jesus, suffer some drops of thy heavenly grace to quench the flame which threatens to destroy me."

The mission still continued to enjoy the protection of government and the blessing of God, and the converts made good progress in their knowledge of divine truth. The heathen from a distance were led in a remarkable manner, as by some unseen influence on their minds, to flock to the mission settlements. One woman said that her father one day called his family around him and said, "My dear children, though you are Hottentots and despised by men, yet behave well ; for I believe that God will, at some future time, send us teachers from a distant country. I may not live to see that day, but you will hereafter know that I have told you the truth. As soon as you hear that such persons have arrived, hasten to them, and obey their instructions." Soon after the old man's death, the teachers arrived, and as soon as the daughter heard of it, she went to them, was instructed in the way of salvation, and after some time, was received into the church.

In 1815, Rev. C. J. Latrobe, Secretary of the United Brethren's Society, visited the mission, accompanied by four male and two female missionaries. This visit was productive of much good ; and while there, he made an expedition into the interior, accompanied by three of the missionaries, and the surveyor of the government, and selected a site for a new station, on the banks of Witte Revier, near the frontiers of Kaffraria, which was afterwards called Shiloh.

In December of this year, the inhabitants of Genadendal were suddenly involved in distress, by the descent of a torrent from the mountains, which overwhelmed the greater part of their premises with destructive violence, and occasioned great damage. But when the missionaries spoke to the poor Hottentots of the damage done to their grounds, they replied, that they had cause to thank the Lord for his mercy, that notwithstanding their great demerit, they had been chastised with so much lenity.

In 1817, the Governor of the colony, Lord Somerset, visited the mission at Genadendal, and after expressing the highest gratification at what he saw, presented them with three hundred dollars for the use of the school.

On the 7th of April, 1818, Rev. H. Schmitt, and his wife, with three single men and the widow of Kohrhammer, commenced the mission at Shiloh, or Witte Revier, or White river. Considerable numbers of natives began to attend on their preaching, when they were involved in the greatest calamities by a predatory excursion of the Kaffres, which resulted in the loss of their cattle, and the murder of nine of their Hottentots, and compelled the missionaries to leave the station. On the 18th of May, Mr. Hoffman visited Witte Revier, and found the mission premises burnt, and everything destroyed. But, in October, peace having been concluded between the Kaffres and the colonial government, the mission was resumed, and rapid and interesting improvements were effected at the new settlement. Rev. H. P. Hallbeck says, in 1821 : "On the spot where, two years ago, we knelt in the fresh track of an elephant, and offered up our first prayer for the prosperity of this establishment, I now found a beautiful orange tree, adorned at once with ripe fruit and fragrant blossoms; and shortly after my arrival. I was invited to tea, under the huge yellow tree, in the shade of which, but lately, there were no assemblies but those of wild buffaloes, elephants, and other dreaded inhabitants of the desert."

The Tambookies were a wild race, on the borders of the Kaffres ; and the missionaries frequently complain of their intractableness, indifference, superstition and insubordination ; yet, from the first, they appear to have regarded the missionaries with esteem and veneration, going to them for advice and for the settlement of their difficulties ; and down to the period of the breaking up of the station, during the late Kaffre war, they have been gradually improving, and assimilating more and more to the habits and usages of Europeans. The gospel appears also to have taken effect upon the hearts of many of them.

In July, 1822, the settlements at Genadendal and Groenckloof again suffered severely by flood, involving them almost in complete ruin. The buildings were damaged to the amount of thousands of dollars, and the huts of the Hottentots, together with their grounds, very much injured. They also lost a great many cattle. At the same time the settlement at Enon was suffering severely from famine.

In 1826, the missionary writes : "A new dwelling-house is building under the inspection of a Hottentot mason of Genadendal, and I am surprised at the neatness and accuracy with which the work is done. This Hottentot has not his equal, as a mason, either among the Africans or Europeans, in the neighborhood. He is an excellent character and a pattern of sobriety, industry, and Christian temper : " thus showing the effect of missions in elevating the general character of the heathen, and qualifying them for the arts of civilized life.

In the year 1822, the Brethren were solicited by government to undertake the religious instruction of a number of lepers, for whom the Hospital Hemel-en-Aarde had been erected, in a romantic situation, at the foot of a mountain called the "Tower of Babel," near the sea. Rev. J. P. Lietner, in obedience to this request, removed there with his wife, in December of that year, and the poor patients were overjoyed at their arrival. Some of them, who had previously belonged to the church, at the stations, exclaimed, "Now we know that Jesus has heard our prayers and sent us help; for we have often entreated him to send our teachers to us." Others who had spent their time in fiddling and dancing, now broke their fiddles and became serious and attentive hearers of the word. This mission has been continued to the present time; but the hospital was subsequently removed to Robbin's Island, that the patients might enjoy the benefits of sea-bathing, the missionaries accompanying them.

The year 1832 was signalized by an encouraging work of grace among the neighboring farmers. They had begun to attend public worship at the different stations, and in several families a striking change had taken place. "In view of this work, our churches have been filled with attentive hearers, our schools with crowds of children, and both churches and schools have been filled with the hallowed presence of the Spirit of God, who has wrought a marvelous change in the hearts of many, both old and young. Wonderful indeed has been the revival of religion around us, by which the tone of society has been changed, and the farmers, who in former years opposed the work, are now brethren and fellow laborers in Christ, sympathising in our sorrows, and rejoicing in, and praying for our success."

The awakening among the farmers continued throughout the years 1833 and 1834, and the converts among them remained steadfast in the faith. One of the brethren called on a woman who was dangerously ill, who grasped his hand and with great fervency exclaimed, "The Lord himself sent you to this land, in order to be the means of saving my soul from perdition: this I wanted to tell you before I die." She informed him that she was awakened by a conversation he had with her in 1829, every word of which she remembered. Her husband also had been awakened, and had established family prayer.

There has continued to be, down to the present time, a steady increase of numbers at the several settlements, the natives sometimes crowding in, in great numbers. There has, also, been a steady improvement in industry, agriculture, mechanical employments, houses, dress and the arts of civilized life. And generally, every year, there has been evidence of the special presence of the Holy Spirit in the conversion of souls, and sometimes in large numbers. The converts have for the most part, given evidence of growth in grace, and general improvement; though almost every year it has been necessary to cut off some members for disorderly conduct. The general influence of the gospel in elevating the character of the natives, has been very marked and striking. The Governor of the colony on visiting Genackendal, in 1849, remarked to Rev. Mr.

Teutsch, "Your missionaries have been the greatest benefactors of the Hottentots; and you have conferred the greatest benefits on the Colony."

Great eagerness has often been manifested to hear the word. In 1849, Rev. Mr. Franke, on visiting the out-stations of Goedverwacht, some distance from Groenckloof, remarks: "Every time we visit that spot, our hearts are gladdened. Every word appears to be, as it were, devoured by those hungering souls, many of whom come from a distance, some from twelve to sixteen miles. They are constantly making inquiries whether they will not soon again be visited, and great joy is manifested by the arrival of the missionary among them." And often at the settlements the crowds are too great to be accommodated in the churches, and many stand outside. But at some of the stations the settlements have grown so large that many of the people have to go to an inconvenient distance to find employment, which frequently takes them for weeks from Christian privileges.

The missions generally have large farms connected with each station; and in several instances the government has appropriated three thousand acres of land to a station. Besides this, they have various kinds of mechanical employments in operation. These arrangements, while they furnish employment for the natives, and instruction in agriculture, and the mechanic arts, and afford a partial support to the missions, occupy too much of the time and attention of the missionaries in secular pursuits.

In 1839, at the request of the colonial government, a mission was commenced among the Fingoes, who being delivered from a state of bondage among the Kaffres, found refuge to the number of many thousands within the colony. This new station was called Clarkson, and the number of Fingoes residing there was 1,000. They had large herds of oxen, with flocks of sheep and goats, and had settled every place in the vicinity where the soil was capable of cultivation. The Fingoes received the missionaries with open arms, and their attention to the word was truly edifying. Such was their eagerness to hear, and the concourse of people, that they were obliged to hold the service in the open air; and very soon the most pleasing traces of the work of the Holy Spirit on their hearts were visible. In April, 1840, this became still more marked. At one of their meetings, the Fingoes poured in from all quarters, and great emotion was manifest among them, which was shown in various ways, some weeping for themselves and others for their unbelieving parents and relations; and in the afternoon, there were few dry eyes in the congregation. The blessing of God has continued to follow the labors of his servants at this station. The Fingoes are the relics of several inland tribes, who have been expelled, and almost annihilated by their more powerful neighbors. They took refuge with the Kaffres, who treated them as serfs; and when the colonial troops overran a large portion of Kaffraria, they put themselves under the protection of the British government.

The effect of the emancipation of the slaves, or apprentices as they were then called, was greatly to increase the number of those who flocked to the mission stations, and especially, of the children in school. The missionaries at Genadendal, speaking of the genuine effects of the admission of the gospel into the heart, as manifested by the converts, say, "And among none more so than the lately enfranchised slaves, whose growth in grace and knowledge is most encouraging." In one instance, a man came a distance of two or three hundred miles, to obtain a missionary for a settlement of emancipated slaves, and offered a salary of $500, but was obliged to return without one.

In the Diary of the station at Genadendal for 1841, it is stated that "The emancipated slaves seem animated by an uncommon desire after spiritual blessings. There is a fire in their hearts which has not been kindled by man, but by the Spirit of God. Freedom appears, by the divine blessing, to have awakened in their minds the feeling that they are beings who belong not to time only, but to eternity. 'The chains,' said one of them, were on my limbs from infancy. I could not come to the house of God, but was obliged to live like a brute. Now, God has broken my chains, and I am here; but my heart is quite blank; I am old, and can understand but little. My God! let but some drops of heavenly dew fall upon my barren soul!"

The Kaffre wars have affected the missions of the United Brethren less than those of some other societies; yet several of their missions were disturbed, and some of them temporarily abandoned in consequence. Companies were drafted into the Colonial army from the different stations, which took them away from the means of grace. However, they were led thereby to prize them more highly. They kept up meetings at their camps, which were attended by the Dutch farmers, to their edification; and the British officers bore honorable testimony to the good conduct of the Christian Hottentots. Yet some of the young men returned with habits of dissipation, which led to their prompt discipline, and was the means of introducing the temperance reformation among the converts. Various measures were resorted to, from time to time, to prevent the use of intoxicating liquors. The farmers were entreated not to furnish them to the Hottentots; but this failing, Bishop Hallbeck addressed an earnest letter to the congregation at Groenkloof on the subject, and a general resolution was passed that no brandy, and but a limited quantity of wine should be brought into the settlement; and on a petition from Genadendal, the civil commissioner refused to license the sale of liquors at that place.

Schools have been sustained from the beginning at all the stations, with increasing interest; and especially the infant school is spoken of from time to time, as producing a very happy effect, not only upon the children, but the parents.

In 1837, an institution was opened at Genadendal, for training Hottentot assistants, with eleven boarding pupils; and the foundation stone was laid, on the first of November, for a two-story building, 74 feet by 23. The first examination proved highly satisfactory, and those present were not a little astonished to hear several of the pupils explain everything with fluency in English, when called on to solve various problems with the use of the globe. At the latest dates, the whole number of pupils admitted was 26, of whom 11 had received appointments as assistants; two of whom, however, had been cast off for improper conduct. There were, in 1851, ten pupils in the institution, five of whom were Kaffres.

After the mission at Genadendal had been in operation a sufficient time to attract the attention of the public, the frequent visits of the English at the station suggested the idea of collecting a library of religious books for their use, which was effected and proved a means of much good to strangers, who, from time to time, became temporary residents of the mission settlement.

The brethren early introduced the practice of speaking individually to all the people, on the concerns of the soul, which they found very profitable. Mr. Lehman, describing such a conversation, in 1841, says, "Many of those with whom we conversed declared that they had been led to us by a secret impulse; and that though at first they could not comprehend much, they now began to understand and relish the word, and could not be sufficiently thankful for the grace of God." Their pious expressions, on these occasions, were often truly edifying. An officer of the church, on recovering from a severe illness, acknowledged his backslidings, and said, "I was like a dying, half-withered tree; but my Saviour in mercy remembered me and visited me with sickness. As the gardener saws off the whole crown of a withered tree, leaving only the stump to produce new and healthy branches, so has my Saviour done for me." A Fingo captain said, "My Saviour has not only purchased me with his blood, but in the days of my ignorance and misery, he showed himself an Almighty Redeemer in me, and subdued my desperately wicked heart. Now I sincerely believe he will keep me so that the powers of darkness shall not be able to separate me from him." Another, on being asked where true sanctification was to be found, replied, "On Golgotha, at the foot of the cross. When I am not there in spirit, I have no power to resist sin." One on being asked wherein meetness for heaven consisted, replied, "It is his grace alone on which I build. He forgives my sins, for the sake of his precious blood. I come to him daily as a beggar." One who had been a slave, said her mistress used to reprove her, and she laughed at her; but having through God's mercy, been convinced of sin, she had gone and asked her pardon. "O, I am happy," said another, "for I love my Saviour. He is my treasure."

The genuineness of the work is also indicated by the happy deaths of the converts, notices of which appear in the journals of the missionaries every year. We mention, as specimens, two remarkable cases, in extreme youth. Also one of advanced age. Charlotte Orzom, a youth of fifteen, died in February, 1841. She had been baptized the year before. On being visited by a missionary, she said, "Ah, I love the Lord with all my heart! With my whole heart, I cleave to thee, and thou wilt come and dwell with me. This is my consolation. In joy and pain, my soul depends on thee with humble confidence, thou rock of my salvation!" In two hours afterwards, she was with the Lord.

Rev. Mr. Fritsch, writing from Elim, in 1849, says, "Of late, we have been much edified by the happy departure of several members of our flock. We were particularly struck with the happy frame of a young girl, eleven years of age, who expressed the happiness she enjoyed in the prospect of soon going to her Saviour, and entreated all who were present to remain faithful to Jesus, that she might meet them in eternity. Her grandfather, who soon followed her, after a short illness, said, "I suffer great pain, but what is it, compared with the torments which my Saviour endured for me on the cross?"

In 1845, some new regulations were introduced, among which were the annual contribution of a small sum by every able-bodied inhabitant, toward the expenses of the place; the formation of a Missionary Association; for securing a better attendance of the children at school; and for the more effectual banishment of spirituous liquors. Missionary collections had previously been taken up at some of the stations. In 1843, the Fingoes at Clarkson, after an address from their missionary, came forward with the utmost cheerfulness, the smallest offering being 1s. 6d. sterling, and the largest 7s. 6d. At Shiloh, the first public contribution was made in 1844, when young and old pressed to the boxes, with countenances beaming with joy. Showing that, among the first effects of the gospel is a benevolent desire, and a readiness to make sacrifices, that others may participate in its benefits.

In 1849, the station at Shiloh, was destroyed by the Kaffres. It was a frightful scene; but the missionaries escaped. Some of the people, however, joined the rebels, but mostly by constraint. Many of the houses were burnt down, and the church was changed into a castle. In April, 1850, Messrs. Bonatz and Gysin visited Shiloh, and found all the huts of the Kaffres and Fingoes burnt; some houses of the Hottentots were standing, but occupied by the English and Fingoes. The dwelling-house of the missionaries, with its blackened walls, bore witness of sad events. The Mamre and Goshen stations have also been broken up by the war.

The whole number of male European laborers at these stations is 29.—Choules's History of Missions; London Missionary Register.

London Missionary Society.—The London Missionary Society, three years after its first formation, in 1795, sent out to Southern Africa, four laborers, two of whom, Dr. Vanderkemp and Mr. Edmonds, were appointed to that part of the colony bordering on Kaffria; and the other two, to the country north of the colony, inhabited by different tribes of Bushmen or Bosjesmans. Dr. Vanderkemp was a son of a minister of the Reformed Dutch Church at Rotterdam. He was born in 1747, educated at the University of Leyden, and for some time practiced as a physician. In 1791, the loss of his wife and child at sea was the means of his awakening and conversion; after which, he devoted himself to the self-denying labors of a missionary. Mr. Moffat says of him: "He came from a university, to stoop to teach the alphabet to the poor native Hottentot and Kaffre; from the society of nobles to associate with beings of the lowest grade in the scale of humanity; from stately mansions, to the filthy hovel of the greasy African; from the army, to instruct the fierce savages the tactics of a heavenly warfare, under the banner of the Prince of Peace; from the study of physic, to become the guide to the balm in Gilead and the physician there; and, finally, from a life of earthly honor and ease, to be exposed to perils of waters, of robbers, of his own countrymen, of the heathen, in the city, in the wilderness."

In 1799, Dr. Vanderkemp, in company with Mr. Edmonds, proceeded through many dangers, to the land of the wild and warlike Kaffres; and after no little parley and delay, the chief gave his consent that they should remain in his dominions. They selected a spot for a house, felled trees, and cut down long grass for a thatching, and then kneeled down on the grass, thanking the Lord Jesus that he had provided them a resting-place, and praying "that from under this roof, the seed of the gospel might spread northwards through all Africa." But, the next year, Mr. Edmonds went away, and Dr. Vanderkemp was left alone. He labored on alone for some time, but owing to untoward circumstances, left Kaffreland for Graaff Reinet; but not until he had sown some good seed; for thirty years afterwards, an aged woman was admitted to the church who received the gospel from his lips.

After this, the Doctor and Mr. Read attempted to establish a mission among the Hottentots near Algoa Bay; but after much opposition from the colonists, and sundry attacks from the plundering Hottentots, they were obliged to take refuge with about 300 Hottentots, whom they had collected in Fort Frederick. After the cession of the colony to the Dutch, a spot was granted them on Kooboo, where they commenced the station called Bethelsdorp; which, however, from its sterility and want of water, was unsuitable for a mission farm. Five years after its commencement, they wrote to the directors that they had been without bread for a long time, and did not expect to procure any for three or four months, nor had they any vegetables. Yet notwithstanding all these discouraging circumstances, there were many indications of the Divine blessing on their labors. The progress of their scholars was astonishing, and above all, their facility in acquiring religious knowledge, considering the apathy, stupidity, and aversion to effort, which characterize the natives. Dr. Vanderkemp closed his useful labors, Dec. 15, 1811, after breathing out the Christian assurance, "All is well."

Bethelsdorp, under many difficulties and disadvantages, grew and multiplied. In 1822 it was in a most flourishing condition, having large schools and other institutions, and a printing press. New churches were also planted at Pacaltsdorp, Theopolis, and other places, through the instrumentality of Rev. J. Campbell.

A mission was commenced at Kat river, among the Kaffres, in 1816, by Mr. Joseph Williams. Short as Dr. Vanderkemp's labors were among the Kaffres, he left a savor of the gospel behind him, which still remained. The commencement of the mission was most auspicious. Temporary houses were raised, ground was cleared for cultivation, a water-course and a dam were constructed, and the Kaffres assembled for instruction. A little more than two years after, Mr. Williams was removed by death. His lonely widow, however, found sympathy in the hearts of the natives, who had just begun to appreciate their teachers. She instructed her half-civilized attendants to prepare the wood and make the coffin, and with a weeping band, followed the desire of her eyes to the silent dust. No successor was appointed, at that time, and the mission to the Kaffres was suspended.

At the same time that Dr. Vanderkemp proceeded to the land of the Kaffres, Messrs. Kircherer, Kramer and Edwards, took up their course for Zak river, between 400 and 500 miles north from Cape Town. Mr. Kircherer had been designated to Kaffreland. But the Bushmen, on making a treaty with Mr. Fischer, one of the colonists, who was a good man, beheld him solemnly appealing to God to witness the transaction, and observed that he was in the habit of assembling his family for worship morning and evening, and were thus led to inquire about God, and solicit a Christian teacher. Mr. Fischer took some of their principal men to the Cape, to see what could be done for them. And Providence so ordered it, that they arrived just before the missionaries, who received it as a call from God to labor in that quarter. They received great kindness and attention from the government, and assistance from the farmers, who accompanied them to the spot, and loaded them with things requisite to commence the station.

Zak river became the finger-post to the Namaquas, Corannas, Griquas, and Bechuanas; for it was by means of that mission that these tribes and their condition became known to the Christian world. The farmers continued friendly, and many Hottentots and Bastards flocked to the station; but the Bushmen, for whom the mission was designed, could never appreciate its object. The missionary's life was more than once threatened by them; but his labors were blessed to the conversion of a number of Hottentots and Bastards, who afterwards became pillars in the Griqua Mission. Mr. Kircherer having left, the mission, with no small regret, was abandoned in 1806.

In 1814, another mission was commenced among the Bushmen at Colesberg, south of the Great river, by Messrs. Smith and Corner. The settlement was commenced with about 500 Bushmen. For some time, however, they were jealous of the missionaries, fearing that they were employed to deliver them into the hands of the farmers, between whom and themselves, there had been a long and a mortal enmity. But it was not long before the light and power of the gospel reached their hearts, and many of them believed. A church arose, and with it the usual results of Christianity appeared, among which were extensive gardens, cultivated by the hands that used only to handle the bow and spear, as they roamed wildly over the country.

Another mission was commenced among the Bushmen at Hephzibah. But in consequence of some conflict between the farmers and the Bushmen, the missionaries were ordered by government to retire within the colony; and at these stations, in the midst of much promise, were broken up. Some of the Bushmen had acquired a good knowledge of the principles of Christianity, and appeared to receive it into their hearts; and they were zealous in endeavoring to convey it to their countrymen. And the experiment proved that the conversion of this wild, untractable race was not impossible. The last effort of the society to establish a mission among this people was attempted in the vicinity of the Caledon river; but the mission was afterwards transferred by Dr. Philip to the Paris Society.

In the month of January, 1806, the Orange or Gariep river was crossed by the missionaries of the London Missionary Society, for the purpose of carrying the gospel to the inhabitants of the wild and desolate regions of Great Namaqualand. Of this region, Mr. Moffat says, "As an inhabited country, it is scarcely possible to conceive of one more destitute and miserable." On his way there, he met a person who had spent years in that country, and on inquiring about it, his reply was, "Sir, you will find plenty of sand and stones, a thinly scattered population, always suffering for want of water, on plains and hills roasted like a burnt loaf, under the scorching rays of a cloudless sun;" of the truth of which, he says he had ample demonstration. The inhabitants are Hottentots, distinguished by all the singular characteristics of that nation, which includes Hottentots, Corannas, Namaquas and Bushmen. After a long journey of great hardships, and much suffering for want of adequate supplies, the missionaries arrived at the Orange river, where they waited at a place which they named Silent Hope, till Christian Albrecht visited Great Namaqualand and returned with encouraging prospects, when they went forward to the spot selected, which they named Happy Deliverance. Their prospects were alternately bright and gloomy. Their proximity to Africaner added not a little to their anxieties. But he came to them and welcomed them to the country, because they were sent by the English, saying that though he hated the Dutch, he loved the English, because he had heard they were friends of the poor black man. This man, being driven to desperation, by the oppressions of the Dutch boers, had risen upon his master, and putting himself at the head of his tribe, had become the terror of the whole country.

Africaner, hearing that it was the intention of the missionaries to remove to another place, came to them and entreated them not to leave that part of the country. They did, however, remove to Warm Bath, about 100 miles west of Africaner's neighborhood. Here they resumed their labors, among a mixed population of Namaquas and Bastards from the Colony, whom they found it difficult to manage. For a season their prospects were cheering, and their labors blest; though they labored in a debilitating climate, in want of the necessities of life, spreading their scanty fare upon the lid of a wagon chest for a table. While here, their congregation was increased, by that desperado, Africaner, who with part of his people, drew near and attended occasionally the instructions of the missionaries, who visited his place in return. But some jealousy and perhaps alarm were excited in the minds of the people of the station, which induced him to retire to his former place. But Abraham Albrecht's health failing, he took an affectionate leave, on the 14th of May, 1810, accompanied by his brother, leaving the mission in charge of Mr. Tromp. After a tedious journey, he expired at the house of Mr. Botmas, at Honing Berg, on the 30th of July. His last words were, "I go to Jesus; I am a member of his body." After this, Christian Albrecht proceeded to the colony, married a lady of superior education, and returned to his field of labor. But in consequence of the imprudence of some of the people at Warm Bath, in joining an expedition against Africaner, he became enraged and vowed vengeance on the mission. For a whole month, the missionaries were kept in the greatest terror, and at length were obliged to flee, and return to the colony. Africaner and his men soon arrived, and after obtaining what booty they could find, set fire to the premises, and left them in ruins. In Dec., 1811, they set out to return again to the scene of their labors and trials. After a most distressing journey, they arrived at Silver Fountain, the residence of Cornelius Kok; where, five days after, Mrs. Albrecht breathed her last. The Namaqua mission was resumed at Pella, south of the river, where they were joined by about 500 of the Warm Bath people. Mr. Christian Albrecht, having occasion to go to the Cape for medical advice, suddenly expired, leaving behind him a bright testimony of zeal, love, and self-denial. But before leaving the country he had the unspeakable joy of making peace with Africaner, and seeing the standard of the Prince of Peace raised in the very village of the man who once "breathed out threatenings and slaughter," against not only his fellow heathen but against the saints of the Most High. Rev. J. Campbell, on his first visit to Africa, while passing through Namaqualand, had written a conciliatory letter to Africaner, to which the chief returned a favorable reply through Mr. Albrecht, who sent Mr. Ebner to occupy a station at Africaner's Kraal. Mr. Ebner's labors were blessed, and in a short time, Africaner and his two brothers, David and Jacobus, with a number of others, were baptized. Yet he does not appear to have been altogether the man for the place ; for by some means he got the ill-will of the natives, and on the arrival of Mr. Moffat, in Jan., 1818, he was in great danger of losing his life ; and he soon after left the mission.

Soon after Mr. Moffat's arrival, Christian Africaner made his appearance, and inquired if he was the missionary appointed by the directors in London ; and being answered in the affirmative, seemed pleased, and said as Mr. M. was young, he hoped he would live long with him and his people. He then ordered a number of women to come, who soon made their appearance, bearing bundles of native mats, and long sticks like fishing rods. Africaner, pointing to a spot of ground, said, "There you must build a house for the missionary." A circle was formed and the women fixed the poles, tied them down in the hemispheric form, covered them with the mats, and in about half-an hour the house was done, all ready for habitation.

Soon after Mr. Moffat commenced his services, which were attended every morning and evening, he was cheered with tokens of the Divine presence ; and in none were these tokens more marked than in the chief, Africaner, of whose wonderful change and devoted piety, Mr. M. has given a thrilling account. But as the memoir of this Christian chief is a common book among us, the sketch will not be repeated here.

After some time, Mr. Moffat visited the Cape, for the double purpose of procuring supplies, and of introducing Africaner to the government ; and while there, he was appointed by the Society to the Bechuana mission.

The mission which was commenced and afterwards broken up on the Zak river, after migrating for a few years, finally settled down at Griqua Town in 1804, with Messrs. Anderson and Kramer, and a mixed multitude of distinct tribes, having different languages, customs, &c. Mr. Anderson says, when he went among the Griquas, they were without the smallest marks of civilization ; excepting one woman, they had not one thread of European clothing. The missionaries' lives were in danger, the natives afterwards having confessed that they had frequently meditated killing them but were overawed by what they had learned of an Almighty power. They were in the habit of plundering one another, and seemed to see no wrong in this or any of their actions. Violent deaths were common. Their usual manner of living was disgusting, and devoid of all shame. But after a series of hardships, requiring much faith and patience, the instructions of the missionaries were attended with a blessing which produced a great change. The people became honest in their dealings, abhorring those acts of plunder which had become so common among them. They entirely abandoned their former manner of life, and decency and modesty prevailed in their families.

The Griquas at first showed great aversion to the labor of cultivating the ground. But after some time, they were prevailed upon to try the experiment ; and this was followed by a great and visible improvement in them as a body. As early as 1809, the congregation consisted of eight hundred persons, who resided at or near the station. In 1810, they were threatened with an attack from a marauding party of Kaffres. Mr. Jantz, the missionary, with the people, set apart a day of fasting and prayer, and at the same time sent a pacific message with a present to the Kaffres, who immediately retired. The mission continued to flourish, till in 1814, Mr. Anderson received an order from the colonial government to send down twenty Griquas for the Cape regiment. This demand greatly exasperated the natives, and produced such an excitement that Mr. Anderson was obliged to leave them ; while the refusal of the natives to comply with the order, led to the introduction of a restrictive system by which the missionaries were prevented from crossing the northern boundaries of the colony. Mr. Anderson was succeeded by Messrs. Moffat and Helm, the former of whom, in his book, bears honorable testimony to his zeal, perseverance and success as well as to the warmth with which his memory was cherished by the natives. One object of Mr. Moffat's appointment was to make a vigorous stand against interference on the part of the missionaries with the government of the people. The former chief of the Griquas, Adam Kok, had abandoned Griqua Town, and the acknowledged chief, Berend, lived at the distance of fifty miles, and paid very little attention to their interests. The consequence was, they were without any regular government. The hint was given them to appoint one of their own number to take the government of the village. The idea was eagerly embraced. The choice fell unanimously on Andries Waterboer, a man who had been educated at the station, and employed as an assistant teacher in the school, but who possessed neither name nor riches. The missionaries took no part in the matter ; but the choice afforded them entire satisfaction. This was a new era in the mission, as it relieved the missionaries from constant attention to the secular affairs of the people. Waterboer, however, feeling his insufficiency, spent several evenings every week in conversing with them on the subject of his duties and responsibilities. His administration was not unattended with difficulty and trouble ; but by the blessing of God, he succeeded in establishing the principles of order and peace. He always continued, however, to preach. He obtained afterwards a liberal salary and supplies from the colonial government, and was able, at length, to present the Griquas in a most favorable aspect. The mission received a new impulse in 1831, since which time it has continued to increase and to extend its influence around, having been blessed in no ordinary degree. Mr. Helmore, having been appointed to Lekatlong, a station of Bechuanas connected with the Griqua Mission, 190 of their members were transferred to his care, and a new church was formed, and at the request of the chief, 100 of the Basutos returned home, and connected themselves with the French mission.

Mr. Moffat states that the missionaries experienced great difficulties, and were frequently in imminent peril of their lives, in consequence of holding the office of agent of the colonial government. He says, "More than twenty years' experience among the aborigines beyond the bounds of the colony, has convinced the writer that the two offices are incompatible." The reason is that it places them in a suspicious attitude toward the natives. But it is the testimony of those well acquainted with the subject, that without this official character, they were able to exert a wide and strong influence over the natives, to restrain their warlike, marauding and revengeful disposition.

A mission was commenced by Mr. Hamilton, among the Bechuanas, at Lithakoo; though with but the reluctant consent of Mothibi, the chief. These people have no notion of idolatry, and no religious ideas of any kind, so that they can only be approached, at first, through motives of self-interest, which, however, when resorted to, must ultimately react against the missionary's object. In consequence of a disastrous defeat of a marauding expedition against the Bakuenas, Mothibi, and a majority of his people removed to the Kuruman river, in June, 1817. In 1820, Mr. Moffat arrived, in company with Mr. Campbell; and in 1821, the former became permanently connected with the mission, where he now remains. This mission passed through perils and dangers almost incredible, which are described by Mr. Moffat with graphic power. First, they were the objects of suspicion to the natives, who ordered them to leave, and threatened their destruction. Then the country was visited with a long and terrible drought, which threatened to destroy every thing. A rain-maker was sent for, who charged it upon the missionaries; but, after having deceived and fleeced the people, he was obliged to flee for his life. Afterwards a new station was commenced, at a place more favorable for water; but no sooner had they commenced operations, than the whole country was thrown into a scene of the wildest excitement and confusion, and nothing but wars and rumors of wars, and attacks from banditti, seemed to be the order of the day. Several times the mission was scattered. But at length, after unheard of confusions and terrors, hardships and disasters, things settled down into comparative quiet, and the appearances at the station were indicative of the long desired change. And shortly after the return of Mr. Hamilton from a visit to the Cape, they were favored with the manifest outpouring of the Spirit from on high. The simple gospel now melted the hearts of men who had scorned to weep. The missionaries were taken by surprise. So long accustomed to indifference, the scene overwhelmed their minds. Their chapel became a Bochim and the sympathy spread from heart to heart, so that even infants wept. An emancipated slave, named Aaron Josephs, who had come to the station for the education of his children, was awakened, and giving evidence of a saving change, was received into the church. The services on this occasion gave a new impulse to the work, and soon the sounds predominant throughout the village were those of singing and prayer. Those that were awakened held prayer-meetings from house to house; and when there were none able to engage in prayer they would sing till a late hour. Before the dawn of morning they would assemble again at some house for worship, before going to labor. Aaron and two other men now came forward and offered to build a school-house, that might serve as a place of worship, at their own expense. And as all gave their assistance, the building was soon completed. Many important improvements were also made in the outward affairs of the mission, in which there was no lack of native assistance, while the language and translations were attended to. On the first Sabbath in July, 1829, six of the converts, after a careful examination had shown a good knowledge of divine truth and a simple faith relying alone on the merits of Christ, were baptized and received into the church. And Providence had so ordered, that a large number were present from Philipolis, Campbell, Griqua Town, and Boochoap, who were profitably impressed by the solemnity. There were present, also, parties from the interior, who had come there to trade. The place was crowded to excess. In the evening, they sat down at the table of the Lord, and enjoyed a cheering and encouraging season. The converts clothed themselves in decent raiment; and soon after a sewing school was started, to teach the women and girls to make their own garments. The same gospel which had taught them that they were spiritually miserable, blind and naked, discovered to them also that they needed outward reform, and thus prepared their minds to adopt those modes of comfort, cleanliness and convenience, which they had been accustomed to view only as the peculiarities of a strange people. And the same improvement was manifest in the other departments of household economy.

Prospects continued cheering. The desire for instruction was great, and the experience of the inquirers and converts was such as to give good evidence of grace. "I seek Jesus," one would say, and another, "I am feeling after God. I have been wandering among beasts of prey; the day has dawned, and I see my danger." Another, "I have been sleeping in a lion's den; or been blown to and fro like a calabash upon the water, and might have sunk." A woman, who was about to die, called her husband and friends, and addressed them: "I am going to die. Weep not because I am going to leave you, but weep for your sins, and weep for your souls. With me all is well, for do not suppose that I die like a beast, or that I shall sleep forever in the grave. No, Jesus has died for my sins; he has said he will save me; I am going to be with him."

The people now made rapid progress in civilization; and as the country had been blessed with plentiful rains, they began to adopt European modes of cultivation, and to increase the variety of their agricultural productions. And the spiritual affairs of the station kept pace with external improvement. Progress was made in reading, and knowledge increased; and early in the year 1830, the foundations of a church were laid.

Mr. Moffat, having completed the translation of the gospel of Luke, repaired to the Cape to get it printed, and returned with the treasure, together with a hymn book in the native language, a printing press, type, paper and ink, having learned to print during his absence; also bringing with him Mr. and Mrs. Edwards, as a reinforcement. Nothing could exceed the surprise of the natives, when they saw a white sheet, after disappearing for a moment, emerge spangled with letters. The mission continued to prosper after this. Mr. Moffat made frequent excursions into the interior to visit other tribes, where, in the midst of great peril and strange adventures, he was mercifully preserved, and permitted to scatter some seeds of divine truth, and prepare the way for other labors. He afterwards made a visit to England, where he spent several years in the translation and printing of the Scriptures and other books for the mission among the Bechuanas.

In the latter part of 1843, he returned to his field of labor, where he arrived on the 13th of December, accompanied by Rev. Messrs. Ashton and Inglis, as a reinforcement. He met a warm reception. "Many were the hearty welcomes," says he, "we received, all appearing emulous to testify their joy. Old and young, even the little children would shake hands with us. Some gave vent to their joy with an air of heathen wildness, and some in silent floods of tears; while others whose hearts had sickened with deferred hope, would ask again and again, "Do our eyes indeed behold you?" Thus we found ourselves again among a people who loved us and who had longed for our return. It has afforded us hallowed delight, and often called forth from our hearts the liveliest feelings of gratitude to God, to witness the progress of the knowledge of divine things, and of the power of the gospel, among the people connected with this place, as well as at our out-stations."

The missions of the Society, embracing many stations not named in the foregoing sketch, though subject to occasional interruptions from the predatory excursions of hostile tribes from the former wars with the Kaffres, and from hostile boers, enjoyed, in general, continued prosperity, till the breaking out of the Kaffre war, in 1846, when the stations in Kaffreland were abandoned.

The presence of the Holy Spirit has been manifested at most of the stations to a greater or less extent, every year; and, as the result of seasons of refreshing, additions have been made to various churches, in different years, varying from a few individuals to ten, twenty, and even as high as ninety at one time. In 1839, the Caledon Institution was favored with a remarkable awakening. Its beginnings were at first small, and without noise; it continued, till men, women, and children, became anxious about their salvation. At one public meeting, after service, Mr. Helms asked all to remain who felt anxious about their souls, and only fourteen retired out of three or four hundred. A great moral reformation took place; 122 were added to the church, and the members appeared to walk worthy of their profession, their character being marked by humility, their views simple and scriptural, with much spirituality of mind, and disposition to converse about the things of God. The next year reports the work as still continuing, and as having produced great changes in many families, many having been brought in, who were considered as hardened beyond hope. In 1843, Mr. Helms wrote: "We have still the spirit of prayer, sinners are awakened, and the new converts are growing in grace."

In 1847, a revival commenced at Gossiep, an out-station of the Griqua Mission, among the young people, as the result of which, ninety were added to the church, of whom the missionaries say, the following year, "Generally, the new converts give us great satisfaction." In 1851, there was a gracious work at Long Kloof, which continued, with very little intermission, to the following year, and fifty of the converts had been received into the church.

The effects of the gospel are visible, also, in outward things, at all the stations. The report of the Caledon Institution for 1849, says, "the people are gradually and steadily advancing, not only in knowledge, but in civilization, which is chiefly seen in their adoption of better clothing, the increase of domestic comforts, and the superior quality of their food. And, as long ago as 1841, Dr. Philip, while on a tour among the missions, writes from Caledon: "This station presents a most gratifying spectacle to those who saw it in former times. In 1823, the people were in rags. Few of them had any covering on, except the filthy sheep-skin kaross. Their huts were of the most wretched description. They were given to drunkenness, and its kindred vices, and the ground on which they resided lay waste. In 1825, and the two following years, their condition was, if possible, still more miserable, and the lands were in the possession of the neighboring boers. The people are now dressed in British manufactures, and make a very respectable appearance in the house of God. The children who formerly went naked, and presented a most disgusting appearance, are decently clothed. Instead of a few wretched huts, resembling pig-styes, we have now a rising and regular village; and the valley on which it stands, which till lately was uncultivated, is now laid out in gardens. While religion was low among the people, we could not get them to build decent houses; but last year the walls of forty houses were raised."

Among the Fingoes, who are constant in their attendance on the means of grace, a marked and pleasing change is exhibited in their outward appearance. In 1843, Mr. Passmore wrote: "The red clay, used for anointing their bodies, has been superseded by the cleansing waters of the spring, and the kaross and blanket have given place to garments of European manufacture. Many have made great progress in several branches of knowledge. The desire for instruction is very great. In the summer, many of them come from their work, and remain in school till half-past nine o'clock in the evening, before they go home for refreshment, and they purchase with avidity all the books that are published."

Mr. Solomon, on arriving at Griquatown, in December, 1843, writes: "I found the great majority of them no longer living in their mat huts, covered with their filthy karosses, subsisting on roots and game, but dwelling in European houses, many of them of stone or brick; decently clothed in European attire; cultivating all the ground capable of cultivation; possessing flocks and herds; and enjoying many of the comforts of life. I found many of them intelligent and respectable, in every sense of the term, who would reflect credit on any community." He says, also, that the influence of the mission was not confined to that particular spot, but had extended to some distance in all directions; and that there were several outposts where churches had been gathered, some of them containing 100 to 200 members, walking as becometh Christians.

Testimonies of this kind might be given to an indefinite extent; but we have room for but one incident more on this point, which will show that the change is perceived by the heathen, and its cause acknowledged: A Fingo, traveling through Hankey, where the society have a station, sat down to rest at the door of the place of worship, and looking round on the houses, behind which the gardens were concealed, asked one of the deacons how the people got food in such a place. The deacon told him to look at him, and see if he was not healthy and well clothed. He then called a fine child, and told the man to look at it, and see if it was not well fed. The stranger assented, but seemed perplexed. The deacon then told him if he would attend service the next day, he would see that it was so with them all. The Fingo rose to depart, and lifting up his eyes and right hand to heaven, exclaimed, "It is always so where that God is worshipped!"

The following incident, which occurred in 1848, at Long Kloof, shows the influence of the schools upon children, even of a tender age, and their reflex influence upon the parents. A man utterly regardless of divine things was induced by a relative to send two children to the school, a boy of eight and a girl of six years. After a few weeks he came for the boy, as he wanted him to herd calves. The boy objected to going, "because," said he, "there is nothing good taught at the place where father lives." "But," said the father, "what can such a thing as you learn here?" "Father," said the boy, "I have learned something." "Repeat it, then," said the father. The boy replied, "'It is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners?' Does father know who Jesus Christ is? He is the Son of God. Does father know who are sinners? All are sinners." This conversation so affected the father that he returned home without the boy, and in a few weeks came back, an altered man, having, as he said, "met with the precious word of God."

Polygamy has been found to be a great hindrance to the progress of the gospel. The people seemed to have no idea of the sinfulness of the practice. But the missionaries gave no countenance to it, and required the converts to give up all but one wife, and to prefer the first one. Sechele, the chief at Kolobeng, was the chief rain-doctor of his district, and had been reckless of human life. But, from the commencement of the mission, he attended school and all other services. The truth took hold of his heart, and he professed it boldly among his people. But the great sacrifice he had to make was the renunciation of polygamy. His surplus wives were the most amiable women, and the best scholars of any in the town. Soon, the chief sent two of them to their parents, with the message that the word of God had come between him and their daughters. The others were properly disposed of. Each of them carried away all that belonged to her, and the chief supplied each of them with new clothing. As soon as it was known that he had renounced his wives, a general consternation seized both old and young. The town was as quiet as if it had been Sunday. Not a single woman was seen going to her garden. Councils were held during the night, in order to intimidate him. But he remained firm, and after being tried in various ways for two months, he was baptized.

Many very interesting cases are mentioned, to show the effect of the gospel, in producing a spirit of liberality. At all the stations they have generally shown a disposition to contribute according to their ability. A poor woman, a cripple, hired herself out to earn something to give to the missionary cause. When the time for the missionary meeting came, she asked her mistress for five shillings, who, in reply, told her that sober and industrious people ought not to give anything, but rather drunkards, who squandered their money. She replied, "Mistress, such persons can do as they choose, but we feel that we must give."

At the conclusion of a Sabbath service at Port Elizabeth, the missionary called on a man to offer prayer. He commenced by alluding to the condition of himself and countrymen before they heard the gospel, when they indulged in vice, and when they were ready to murder each other; but when he came to speak of God's goodness in having sent the gospel to them, and in having made them partakers of its blessings, his voice faltered, and his heart seemed too full for utterance. He said, "How can we ever love thee as we ought to do, for thy love to us?" He could go no further, but sat down, and continued sobbing all the time of the last hymn. This man, who was a poor Fingo, obtained his living by working on the beach, up to his waist in water, landing goods; and he brought the missionary eight shillings for the jubilee fund, and a sovereign as his annual subscription. In 1843, there was extreme scarcity from want of rain in all the villages, yet, that year, the churches in South Africa, out of their deep poverty, contributed £1,600 for the support and extension of the gospel.

The society have turned their attention to the raising up of a native agency. In 1844, Mr. Moffat writes: "The state of our mission is very promising, with regard to the native agents employed in teaching and addressing the people. Six men are connected with Kuruman, and these, from what I know of them, are, through the divine blessing, calculated to do much good. It is truly delightful to observe the fervent zeal of these godly men. In my opinion, this is the only means by which the interior of the country can have a stated ministry." And, again, in 1846: "At all our stations the simple, but evangelic labors of our native assistants are receiving the divine blessing."

In the report of the society for 1847, the directors say, "During the greater part of last year, this field of the society's labors has been the theatre of war, and scenes have daily occurred over which the friends of humanity and religion must bitterly mourn. Thousands of lawless Kaffres invaded the colony, destroying the villages, stealing the cattle, and slaughtering the inhabitants. During the progress of these events, the four missionary stations of the society in Kaffreland were ruined; the missionaries and their people were compelled to seek refuge in the colony; their property fell into the hands of the enemy; and the several settlements, with their houses and chapels, were totally destroyed. All the Christian institutions and villages within the colony occupied by our brethren suffered in various degrees, but the flourishing settlement of Kat River most severely." The reports of the missionaries generally speak of the bad effects of the war, in engendering dissipation and vice; but they bear testimony to the good conduct generally of the church-members, who were called into active service in the army.

In the report of the society for 1852, the directors say: "The war has continued throughout the year to spread desolation and death. Alarm and distress have been universally prevalent throughout the eastern districts, and many valuable lives have been sacrificed. A portion of the Hottentots, who, on all former occasions, proved loyal and able defenders of the colony, have been, unhappily, induced to unite with the hostile Kaffres. But it is to be regretted that the conduct of the colonists has been calculated to produce, in the minds of the colored people, distrust, estrangement, and enmity. At the commencement of the contest, the governor, in his proclamation, doomed the Kaffres and their allies to extermination, and the British settlers joined heartily in the design. Extermination was the watchword in the field, and the motto inscribed on their banners,—producing, in the minds of the native population, the impression that it was a war of races. But the only stations of the society at which disaffection to the government has been manifested, are those of Kat River and Theopolis; and, from its thirty-five stations, from four only have the missionaries been obliged to retire."

In the report for 1853, they say: "This deadly conflict has at length terminated, and, as might have been foreseen, by the triumph of the British arms. The principal Kaffre chiefs have been driven, with their people, out of their country, and their lands allotted to British settlers and colonists, and on the widely extended frontier there will be military posts, from which the troops and settlers are to guard the colony against the return of the exiled natives." But they justly complain of a treaty which has been concluded between the British government and the Dutch boers, by which the territory north of the Vaal river has been ceded to the latter, as the Free Dutch Republic, without any provision for the protection and freedom of the British missionaries, some of whom have been laboring among the aborigines for more than twenty years, or for the numerous and prosperous Christian churches which they have gathered. In this treaty, the boers engage not to subject the natives to slavery, but no security was taken, and the directors have no confidence that it will be executed. Already, three of the society's missionaries and the natives among whom they were stationed, have suffered grievous outrage and wrong from the Dutch emigrants. During the month of August, 1852, they attacked the native tribes, among whom Messrs. Livingston, Inglis and Edwards labored; the men were killed, and the women and children captured; the property taken as spoil, and their villages destroyed. The house of Mr. Livingston was broken open, his property stolen, and his books torn to pieces and scattered to the winds. And, in the month of October, these three missionaries, after a mock trial, were sentenced to be banished from the country. And, on application by the directors to the home government for redress, they were coolly informed that the treaty with the Dutch emigrants had been confirmed by the government, thereby precluding the expectation of future liberty for the British missionaries, or of freedom for the native tribes. Rev. Mr. Helmore writes, Jan. 25, 1853: "The boers are subjugating the Bechuana tribes to their iron yoke. Mamusa is destroyed; the missionaries of Matebe and Mabotsa are driven out of the country; Kolobeng is destroyed. Kuruman and Lekatlong are the only stations of our society that yet exist in the Bechuana country. Alas! for the tribes beyond us, still enshrouded in the black cloud of heathenism."

It may not be out of place here to remark that, according to the statements of Dr. Philip, Mr. Moffat, and others, the missions in South Africa have met with greater hindrances from the opposition of the colonists and the interference of the colonial government, than from all other sources, and that the oppressive policy pursued by the colonial government towards the natives, has been one of the chief obstacles in the way of their success.

Much complaint is made of the canteens, or grog-shops, by which the mission settlements have been infested, and, in some instances, successful attempts have been made to counteract their influence, by introducing the pledge of total abstinence. At Dysalderp, the Total Abstinence Society, in 1844, numbered 420 members, and was the means of a great moral reformation.

Here, as in all parts of the world where missions have been successful, the emissaries of Popery have come in to take possession of the harvest. In 1846, Dr. Philip says there were priests in all the villages, and some of these are represented as men of learning and ability, and they were employing every means that their zeal could dictate to make converts.

The native converts, in speaking of their own religious feelings, manifest a simple-hearted piety, a knowledge of their own hearts, and of the gospel, in its adaptedness to their wants, with an implicit faith, truly remarkable; and the death-beds of the departed have shown that this faith was able to sustain them in that hour which brings nought but terror and wailing to the heathen.

The latest intelligence from these missions is encouraging. The report of the society for 1853 states that, "Although the stations throughout the colony have suffered, in consequence of the Kaffre war, some diminution in their temporal resources, and the men who entered the military levies have been exposed to the influence of the camp and the battle-field; yet these evils have been far less than might have been dreaded. Even at the Kat River settlement, Rev. James Read has collected the scattered members of the church, and recommenced the schools; and at every other station, with the solitary exception of Theopolis, the believers have walked together in the fear of the Lord, and in the comfort of the Holy Ghost, and have been multiplied." But beyond the bounds of the colony, it has been otherwise. Yet it is gratifying to learn that the members of the churches, at the stations which have been broken up, have generally sought refuge at other mission settlements, and that their conduct, in these trying circumstances, has been such as to honor their profession.

While the surrounding country has been subjected to the lawless attacks of the emigrant boers, the station at Kuruman has been unmolested. Mr. Moffat writes, in November, 1852, that he is going on with the work of translation, and that the state of the work is more encouraging than in former times; the people are more settled in their habits, and better informed; the grounds at and near the station are becoming more generally cultivated. Mr. Ashton writes, January, 1853, that they had just admitted two young women to the church who were baptized in infancy, thus bringing in the fruits of the second generation.

At the station at Long Kloof, within the colony, and at an out-station not far distant, an interesting work of grace commenced in 1852, about the time the men returned from the war. To the missionary it was an overpowering time. Many who had grown old in sin, as well as the youth of both sexes, were crowding around to speak with him of the concerns of their souls. In the report for 1853, the work is noticed as still continuing. Seventy-three had been received into the church, as the fruits of the revival, and the church was apparently in a healthy state.

The Rev. Dr. Livingston has returned from his third journey into the interior of the country, having penetrated 300 or 400 miles northward beyond the limits of his former travels. He found a country abounding with rivers, some of much greater magnitude than he had hitherto seen in Africa, and an interesting population, far more numerous than the native tribes further south. Though speaking different languages, they generally understood Zaffre war and the Dutch boers. Notwithstanding the excitement and the unsettled things, consequent upon a state of is table presents the churches in a state. The yearly additions have, in ses, been large; while the average is to a missionary, which is, we fear, than the average yearly additions to intry churches. The aggregate of numbers shows the number of converts ual to 134 to each missionary. This, n connection with all the incidental omplished, shows a large return for r bestowed.—Maffat's Southern Africa; 'ip's Researches in South Africa; Ro- the London Missionary Society; Lon- sionary Register; Freeman's Tour in frica.

yan Missionary Society.—The first mis- sent to South Africa by the Wesleyan ury Society was John McKenny of Cole- eland. Some pious soldiers in an En- giment, at the Cape of Good Hope, in- quested the English Wesleyan Confer- send them a man to preach the gospel. Kenny offered himself for this service. arrival at Cape Town, in August, applied to the Governor, Lord Somer- ermission to preach, but this was ro- nd after several efforts at usefulness, in- er way, he was ordered to Ceylon the ar, to join the band of missionaries ad gone out with Dr. Coke.

On their arrival, they to the Governor for the usual license ise his ministry at Cape Town. Shaw believing that the command King of kings," could not be counter- by any earthly authority, proceeded to commission as God's ambassador, on wing Sabbath day to a congregation d of soldiers. His heart, however, on preaching Christ to the perishing and he earnestly looked for an oppor- o do so. Just at this juncture, Schemlen, missionary of the London ry Society, arrived in Cape Town, ne Namaquas. Mr. Shaw sought an- r with them, and was encouraged by- mlen to attempt a mission among the heathen beyond the Orange river. But the difficulties surrounding him were many and great. He had not yet the sanction of the committee for such an undertaking; then the expense would be great, and besides, his wife's health was very feeble. But in this emergency this intrepid and devoted woman urged her husband to undertake the arduous enterprise, and pledged her personal property to sustain it, should the committee in London not be willing to bear the expense. This decided him. A wagon and oxen, with other necessities, were immediately purchased, and Barnabas Shaw and his wife, without knowing where they should find a resting place, or to whom they should go, set off on their journey through the African wilderness. They soon crossed the bounds of civilization; and with the thermometer sometimes standing 110° in the shade, they plodded on their weary journey, and on the evening of the 27th day, they met a party of Hottentots, accompanied by a chief, who encamped near them. Mr. Shaw entered into conversation with them, and to his surprise and delight the chief informed him that having heard of the "Great Word," he was on his way to Cape Town to seek a Christian missionary, to teach him and his people the way of salvation. They had already traveled 200 miles, and there were yet nearly 300 more before they could reach Cape Town. It was certain that they could obtain no missionary there; and that a peculiar providence arranged this meeting. Had either party started but half an hour earlier on their journey, they must have missed each other, they coming from Little Namaqualand, and Mr. Shaw facing toward Great Namaqualand. The delight of this poor heathen chief may be imagined, when, after listening to his affectionate statement, Mr. Shaw informed him that he was a missionary of the Cross looking for a people to whom he might preach Jesus Christ; and when he agreed to go back with him to his tribe, the chief wept aloud, "and rejoiced as one that had found great spoil." They pursued their way through deep forests, and across the most rugged and precipitous mountains, (over which even 14 oxen could hardly draw the wagon,) and when within two or three days' journey of their destination, the chief hurried on to inform his people of his success. On the last day of the journey, between 20 and 30 Namaquas, mounted on young oxen, came hurrying on to meet and welcome the missionaries. They approached at full gallop, their eyes sparkling with delight, and having saluted them, set off again at the top of their speed to announce their approach, when the whole town turned out to meet them. Next day a council was held, which was opened with prayer, and a sermon from, "This is a faithful saying," &c., and before the termination of the discourse, the chief and many of his people wept aloud. After which Mr. Schemlen, on behalf of Mr. Shaw, propounded a series of questions, relating to the establishment of a mission, to all of which most satisfactory answers were given. This devoted German missionary, having seen them safely at their destination, left them for his own field of labor, distant four weeks' journey.

Mr. and Mrs. Shaw found themselves surrounded by heathen, far from friends, and scarcely yet able to speak the language, so as to make themselves understood. They took up their abode in a hut, with neither chimney, door, or window, and without furniture, sleeping on a mat laid upon the bare ground. The day was devoted to manual labor—building a house and tilling the ground,—and the evenings to communicating religious instruction. Within one month of his arrival, he was rejoiced to see some fruit of his labor. Soon a chapel was erected, a school commenced, a class formed, and a deep religious feeling extended itself among the people. In the month of June, Mr. Shaw admitted 17 adults into the Christian church by the ordinance of baptism; in July the Lord's Supper was administered for the first time, and in December, the first Love Feast was held. The converts delivered their sentiments with great freedom and simplicity, of which the following are specimens: "Peter Links rose and said, 'I was formerly an enemy to missionaries, and when some wished to have one, I opposed it; but now I am thankful for the word. I love it. It has taught me that I am a great sinner. When I felt this I wandered about eating bitter bushes hoping thereby to make atonement for my sins; but I never found peace till I heard Jesus came to save the lost. I am thankful for what the book says, 'Come, let us reason together, though your sins be as scarlet,' &c. I have been like a poor little silly lamb, which is only just beginning to go. When the ewe goes from it a short distance, it turns aside, first to one bush and then to another. The ewe has her eye upon it, and goes back again to it, and does all she can to induce it to follow her and will not forsake it. So the Lord has done for me.' The chief followed. His remarks were very brief: 'All the sins I have committed,' said he, 'from my childhood to the present time, seemed to be placed before my mind.' Very soon afterward he found mercy, and told Mr. Shaw, that 'though he had been extremely sorrowful on account of the weight of his sins, the burden had been removed by the grace of God, and his mind was now filled with peace and joy.' Old Trooi rose up and said, 'When I first saw my sins I felt pain in my heart; and by night, when all the people were sleeping in their huts, I could not close my eyes. I got up and went out. I wandered to and fro. I lay down on my hands and knees to pray. When I found one who told me what I should do to be saved, I was so delighted that I knew not how to go away.'"

In the depths of the African wilderness that same Divine Spirit, which had moved his people in England to undertake the mission, was enlightening the darkness of this people, and leading them to the enjoyment of a personal salvation through the labors of their solitary missionary. Early in 1818, Rev. E. Edwards arrived at Lily Fountain, (the name of the station,) to assist Mr. Shaw. His coming was most opportune, and greatly delighted the people. In gratitude for his arrival, the natives cheered them with "songs in the night." In their state of ignorance they had often danced at midnight to the sound of the kommet-pot, and now, beneath the same bright moon, in the calm stillness of the night, the mission party are startled from their slumbers by the sound of distant music. They rise and listen, and as it comes nearer, they discover it to be a happy band of the redeemed heathen going from hut to hut, and the song that rose on the midnight air was "a new song"—a hymn of praise, in their own language, to their Redeemer, one verse of which according to their custom was often repeated :

"Faith loves the Saviour and beholds
His sufferings, death and pain ;
And this shall ne'er be old nor cold,
Till we with him shall reign."

As they went onward they called on the head of each family to engage in prayer, and thus left in their track the cloud of incense rising up from the domestic altar, acceptable before God.

The committee had sent out with Mr. Edwards a forge and some iron, with other means of improvement. They set to work, and made ploughshares and other implements of industry, and soon agriculture began to show its happy effects around them. Nothing surprised them more than the heated iron, and the sparks from the anvil. It was to them the day of wonder ; and as the Greeks bemoaned the lot of their ancestors, who had not lived to see Alexander on the throne of Darius, so the Namaquas seemed to lament the lot of their fathers who had died before a forge was set up in their camp. A school-house was built, and with the assistance of Mr. Edwards, education began more rapidly to diffuse its blessings.

As an illustration of the difficulties attending the introduction of letters among a barbarous people, Mr. Shaw, when in England, about 1841, stated in the hearing of the writer, that for weeks he had tried in vain to make the Namaquas understand that the large letters he had traced on cards and hung up before them, each stood for a separate sound, and that their combination gave a word or idea. They looked astonished and burst into a loud laugh. He was growing disheartened ; but recollecting they had a name for each bullock, he again hung up his letters on a tree, while the Namaquas sat in a circle on the ground, and pointing to the first letter said, "There is bullock A," and to the second,

"There is bullock B," and so on. Their eyes brightened ; they had caught the idea, and he had no more trouble.

A good chapel and a mission house were erected. Meanwhile the work of God deepened in the hearts of the people. An awakening commenced. Even the children held meetings for prayer by themselves. Clad in their karosses of sheepskin, they bowed before the Lord, and sung joyful hosannas to the Son of David.

The news of this good work spread from tribe to tribe, and soon the cry was heard from distant places, "Come over and help us." Some of the Lily Fountain people went on a visit to a tribe of Mulattoes, about sixty miles off, carrying with them two little girls who had been taught to read and sing ; and so eager were those poor heathen to learn something of the way of life, that they kept the two little girls reading, praying, singing and answering questions incessantly, scarcely allowing them any rest day or night. A desire was thus awakened in the breasts of many to be "taught the way of God more perfectly." One of the men of the tribe soon arrived at the station, and told the missionaries that the people living near him, who had never heard a sermon or seen a missionary, were longing for the gospel. Mr. Shaw visited the tribe, (in Bushman-land,) and preached there a few days.

In February, 1819, a Hottentot from a distant tribe, arrived at the station, and addressing the missionaries said, "My errand in coming here is to request that you will come and teach us, at our place, the good tidings of the gospel. I am now an old man, and have long thought of the world. I now desire to forget the world and seek something for my soul. We have many people—Bastards, (Griquas,) Hottentots, and Bushmen, all of them earnestly desiring the gospel. I could not sleep, but rose early in the morning, and went to one of my friends, whose house was a considerable distance from mine, to speak with him. I found him in the very same state of mind with myself, longing to hear the gospel and greatly troubled. I stood amazed, and said this must be from God ; if it be not from him I know not from whence it has come. I will go to the Khamies mountain and hear for myself. He said, if you (the missionary,) will go with me, or come to us, we will send a wagon and oxen for you. If I cannot procure men (though I am now old) I will come myself ; and be assured I will never leave you. I will give all my cattle over to the other people, and live free from worldly care ; but you must come soon."

Could it be possible that a mind thus drawn by the Spirit of God, (or those anxious ones in the tribes he represented,) would be left to grope its way in darkness? No, at the very time these words were being uttered in Africa, the Committee in London were making arrangements to reinforce the mission; and soon the Rev. J. Archbell, with his excellent wife were on their way. They arrived at Lily Fountain in July; and two weeks after, in company with Mr. Shaw, they proceeded to open the new station in Bushmanland, at a place called Reed Fountain, about two days' journey from Lily Fountain to the east. The old Hottentot received them with joy; ground was selected, and a station formed, where the word of life was dispensed and eagerly received by this people.

The pious natives of Khamies Berg (or mountain) continued to improve both in temporal and spiritual matters; and were as a city set on a hill. Their light shone in worshipping God in their families. Mr. Shaw testifies concerning them:—"Oft have I heard them engaged in family prayer, before the sun had gilded the tops of the mountains, nor were their evening devotions neglected. As I have stood by the mission house, with the curtains of night drawn around us, I could hear them singing their beautiful evening hymn:

"O Christ eternal, light divine,
Who constantly on us doth shine;
Thy presence shall be with us here,
Though neither sun nor moon appear."

Then falling on their knees they felt the presence of the Most High, and the fulfilment of the promise, 'The habitation of the just shall be blessed.' The happy change was thus illustrated by one of their old men: "Mynheer, before we received the gospel we were like an egg before the chicken is hatched; we were surrounded with darkness, and could see nothing; but when the gospel came it broke the shell, and now we see the light of day!" Religion also led to temporal comfort. When the mission commenced in 1816, the habits of the people were filthy in the extreme, so that the effluvia from a congregation of them was enough to make the missionary sick. But no sooner did they receive the gospel than they washed and clothed themselves. Instead of living on roots, or by the chase, and creeping into a smoky hut, or a hole in the earth to sleep, they built houses and cultivated the soil and received the reward of their labor; so that of many a spot in South Africa it may now be said, "There he maketh the hungry to dwell, that they may prepare a city for habitation, and sow fields and plant vineyards, which may yield the fruits of increase." Geo. Thompson Esq., and also Sir James E. Alexander have both, in their respective volumes of Travels, put on record a most pleasing testimony concerning this mission and others established by Mr. Shaw and his associates in South Africa.

In 1820, Mr. Shaw undertook a journey to some of the tribes beyond the Orange river in order to explore the country and to avail himself of any opening which might be presented for the further spread of the gospel. His journal contains a record of dangers and toils and efforts, which has few parallels even in missionary history. Besides the burning sun and wind, they were constantly exposed to wild beasts and to savage men; often in danger of dying by hunger and thirst, or losing their way in the wilderness, or being dashed to pieces over the precipices round which they had to climb. But God preserved them; and after fourteen weeks' absence, they returned in safety. He made his report to the committee in London, and applied to the colonial governor, Sir K. Donkin, who kindly permitted and encouraged him to open missions among the chiefs he had visited, many of whom had requested to have Christian teachers sent to them.

In 1821, the mission was enlarged by the arrival of three more missionaries. Mr. Archbell and the Hottentot assistant missionary, Jacob Links, being sent to the Great Namaquas, Messrs. Kay and Broadbent were sent to commence a mission in the Bechuana country, and Mr. Hodgson to remain at the Cape, where permission had at length been obtained to communicate religious instruction to the slave population. The Albany and Kaffraria mission had been commenced the year before by Wm. Shaw, (brother of Barnabas,) and two missionaries were also appointed to Madagascar. The next year the devoted William Threlfall was sent to assist Mr. William Shaw. Being again reinforced in 1823, Mr. W. Shaw opened a mission among the Kaffres under the protection of the Kaffre monarch, Pato, and Mr. Threlfall and Mr. Whitworth proceeded to open a mission still farther east, in Delagoa Bay. While Mr. Edwards left Khamies Berg to establish a station among the Corannas, on the banks of the Orange river, at a place called Moos. This and the station at Maquasse (about three degrees east of the junction of the Cradock, and one day's journey north of Orange river), were much interfered with by incursions of savage tribes in their vicinity. Mount Coke, on the Buffalo river, was established the following year. The missionaries were engaged in their great work, learning the languages, building school-houses and places of worship, and preaching the word of life with considerable success when an event transpired which filled them with the deepest sorrow. They were called to resign part of their number to become the first martyrs of the Methodist missions to South Africa. Among the first fruits of Barnabas Shaw's ministry at Khamies Berg, in 1816, was the family of the Links. This converted Hottentot family alone furnished three native teachers of such decided piety and suitable knowledge of the truth as to be very useful in the mission. One of these was Jacob Links, who was at first employed as interpreter. But his progress in knowledge and piety was such that he soon began to preach himself, and accompanied Mr

Shaw in his various visits to neighboring tribes. He was very useful; in 1818, the conference accepted him as an assistant missionary, and placed his name upon the minutes. Besides his own language, (the Namaqua,) he could preach in the Dutch, and he also learned English, that he might have access to its religious literature. As an instance of his shrewdness: One day he and Mr. Shaw encountered a Dutch boer, who stoutly denied that the Bible or the gospel was ever intended for Hottentots. Links looked him in the face and replied, "Master, you told me that our names did not stand in the Book. Will you now tell me whether the name of Dutchman or Englishman is to be found in it?" No answer was given, and Jacob continued, "Master, you call us heathens. That is our name. Now I find that the Book says that Jesus came as a light to lighten the heathen, so we read our name in the Book!" The Dutchman was silenced.

On another occasion, Mr. Shaw says, "At the time of our going into Namaqualand, most of the distant (Dutch) farmers not only disapproved of the heathen being instructed, but some of them endeavored to turn it all into ridicule. One of them declared to me that he believed the Namaquas were only a species of wild dog, and had no souls. I therefore called Jacob Links, who was with me at the time, and offered to prove that Jacob, though a dog, could both read and write better than the farmer. I believe the farmer could do neither; and finding himself in an awkward situation, he called for his horse and rode hastily away."

In gratitude for his recognition as an assistant missionary by the committee in London, Jacob Links wrote them the following very interesting letter, which gives additional particulars of his personal history. This letter was written in Dutch, in a very good hand. Only three years previous to its date the writer of it was an ignorant Hottentot; let the reader bear this in mind, and then answer the question to his own conscience, whether or no the gospel of Christ is adequate to elevate and save the most degraded of mankind? The following is a literal translation:

"AFRICA, LEELIE FONTEINE, }
Nov. 19, 1819. }

"Unknown but Reverend Gentlemen:—The salutations which you sent, I received from our beloved teachers, and wish you and the Society much peace and prosperity in the name of the Lord. I have long been desirous of writing you concerning my former and present state, but on account of weakness in the Dutch language, I have been hindered. I hope, however, your goodness will excuse and wink at my fault. Before I heard the gospel I was in gross darkness, ignorant of myself as a sinner, and knew not that I had an immortal soul; nor had I any knowledge of him who is called Jesus. I was so stupid that when a Hottentot came by us who prayed to the Lord, I thought he was asking his teacher* for all these things of which he spoke in his prayer. Sometime after this another Namaqua came upon our place. He spoke much of sin and also of Jesus. By means of his conversation I was very sorrowful and much affected, and knew not what to do. My mother having some leaves of an old Dutch psalm book, I thought if I ate them I might then find comfort. I ate the leaves up but my sorrow was not lessened. I then got upon the roof of an old house to pray, thinking if I were high the Lord would hear me better; but I found no deliverance. I then ate all sorts of bitter bushes, for I thought the Lord might possibly have mercy on me. But my heaviness did not then go away. I then heard that I must give my cause over to Jesus, and tried to do so, by which I found much lighter. There was then no one in this country to tell us of Jesus, and I desired to go to the Great river, (the Orange river, near 200 miles off,) to learn from the word. I was now persecuted both by black and white. The [Dutch] farmers said if we were taught by missionaries we should be seized as slaves. Some said I had lost my senses; and my mother believing this to be the case, wept over me. After this a missionary on his journey to Pella, remained some weeks with our chief; but as I was tending cattle in the Bushman-land, I heard nothing. Then our chief and four other persons went to seek one who could teach us. I was at this full of joy; and when they returned, and I saw the teacher (Mr. Shaw) whom the Lord had sent us, it was the happiest day for me that I ever knew. Through the word that the Lord gave the missionary to speak I learnt that my heart was bad, and that nothing but the precious blood of Christ could cleanse me from my sins. I also found Jesus to be the way of life and the sinner's friend; and I now feel the most tender pity for all those who are ignorant of God. I often feel sweetness for my soul whilst I speak about the gospel, and my own experience in the Lord. Before our English teacher came we were all sitting in the shadow of death. The farmers around us told us that if we prayed they would flog us, and some of them even threatened to shoot us dead if we attempted to pray. They said we were not men but baboons, and that God was blasphemed by the prayers of Namaquas, and would punish us for daring to call upon him. Now, however, we thank the Lord that he has taught us by his servants, and that he hath also given His son to die for us. We hear likewise, that many people in England remember us in their prayers; and we hope they will not forget us. The society of all praying people are by me saluted.

An unworthy Namaqua, JACOB LINKS."

This monument of the mercy of God continued to grow in grace and knowledge, and with great acceptance to exercise his abilities in preaching Christ to his own people and to the tribes around them. About this time a deep feeling of commiseration for the perishing heathen beyond the Orange river, had taken hold of the church at Lily Fountain. And notwithstanding the distance and the danger, Jacob Links had already offered, if no European missionary could be obtained, that he would take one of his Christian brethren with him, and go and live among the Great Namaquas, and teach them the way of life. Just at this time (early in 1825) the Rev. W. Threlfall arrived at Lily Fountain. Mr. Threlfall was a young man of amiable spirit and manners, of deep piety and of great promise as a Christian missionary. He left a home in England where the attractions of wealth and social enjoyment presented their charms in vain to detain him from the settled purpose of his heart to preach Christ to the heathen. He was appointed to Africa in 1822. But his decided predilection was for Madagascar, and he hoped to be allowed to proceed there from Africa. When on the point of embarking, (in addition to a donation of £100 which he forwarded to the Missionary Society,) he nobly intimated to the committee that if the low state of their funds was the difficulty which prevented their assent to commence a mission in Madagascar, if they would furnish another missionary to go with him, he would himself meet that difficulty. There never went forth a more devoted missionary than W. Threlfall. On landing in Africa and beholding what had been done already by the labors of the missionaries, he was so delighted that he wept for joy. After laboring in Albany for a time, he proceeded to Delagoa Bay. He made great proficiency in acquiring the language; but in the midst of his labors and usefulness his health failed and he set sail for Cape Town. On the voyage he and all on board were prostrated with fever; eleven of the crew died, including first and second mates, and the helm of the ship was tied a-lee, for no one had strength to steer, and she drifted in distress, till discovered, when she was run into Table Bay. Believing himself dying, Mr. Threlfall took his pocket book and wrote, "My request to my beloved father is, that whatever property he intended to give me may be devoted to the missionary cause." The vessel was prohibited from entering the harbor, and no communication allowed between her and the town. No one would venture to the ship. In this awful emergency the Rev. J. Whitworth, Wesleyan missionary, then at the Cape, volunteered to go on board the infected vessel and attend to the sufferers, and under express stipulation that he was not to return till the quarantine was taken off. Providing himself with medicines, &c., he went on board, and God not only preserved him but also made him the instrument of raising up all the rest; and on the 25th of May, Mr. Threlfall, with the captain and crew landed, praising God for their deliverance. Mr. Threlfall then proceeded to Lily Fountain to join Mr. Shaw, and concert measures with him for extending the cause of Christ among the heathen. Mr. Shaw was delighted with him. His piety and zeal and love for souls was ever apparent. After regaining his health in some good measure, he projected a mission to the Great Namaquas on the north-west; and finding "a true yoke-fellow" in Jacob Links, every thing was soon arranged, and he, with Jacob Links and Jonas Jager, a native exhorter, left Lily Fountain on their perilous journey in June, 1825. Mr. Shaw heard from the party up to Aug. 6th. They were at that date suffering much from the disturbed state of the countries through which they were passing, and also from deficiency of food; but still trusting in God. No further information arriving, and several months passing over, fears began to be entertained for their safety, which were soon afterwards confirmed. It appears that a cruel ruffian, well known to the different tribes in Namaqualand as a blood-thirsty savage, who lived by plunder and murder, had with some others like minded, placed himself in Mr. Threlfall's path, and offered to become guide to the party. One night while they were asleep, he and his confederates rose and murdered them. Jonas Jager was shot while asleep. They then turned on Jacob Links and shot him, his last breath being spent in warning and exhorting his murderers and commending his soul to his Redeemer. Mr. Threlfall attempted to fly, but a shot struck him and he fell, and the cruel assassin came up and pierced him near the heart with his assagay, and killed him.

The only motive for this dreadful act was to obtain the few trifling articles which they had taken with them to provide food. Both Jacob and Jonas left wives and families to bemoan their loss, and all of them were under thirty years of age; cut down thus mysteriously in their bloom, at a time when the Church was expecting great results from their holy and zealous efforts.

Information having reached the chief Africaner, he pursued and at length arrested the party, and then sent information to the British authorities at the Cape. The murderer was sent to the colony to be executed. On his way he was led through Lily Fountain, and the whole village turned out to see him; but mark the change Christianity had wrought. The friends of the murdered men crowded round him, not to upbraid or torment, but to exhort him to think of his awful condition, and earnestly repent before he left the world; and with an exemplification of the most exalted Christian charity, Martha, the sister of Jacob Links, said to the unhappy wretch—"Although you have murdered my brother, nevertheless, I am sorry for you, because you are indifferent to the salvation of your soul."

The death of Mr. Threlfall produced a deep sensation in England, as well as in Africa; and the Christian bard, Montgomery, celebrated his untimely end in one of his most beautiful and pathetic productions. There was no reserve in the offering which Mr. Threlfall laid upon the missionary altar; his life, his blood, his property, his all, were joyfully consecrated in such a service. And, although, none living know where he sleeps—his devoted life has not been in vain, either to the posterity of Ham, or to the living Church of God. Redeemed Africa will yet place his name in the calendar of her saints and martyrs; and when "the Chief Shepherd shall appear," Threlfall shall "be with him in glory."

It is but just to add, that the wish he penned in his memorandum book, on board the plague ship, was honored, after his death, by his excellent father, so that, including his own donations and his effects, the noble sum of nearly $8,000 was presented, in his behalf, to the missionary cause.

Animated by such an example, his brethren followed up his effort. Great Namaqualand was entered; and, in the country where he fell, the society in whose service he sacrificed his life, has now two stations, two missionaries, six local preachers, and twenty-one teachers, with nearly 400 church members, and more than 1800 Great Namaquas under religious instruction.

Barnabas Shaw came home to England, to recruit his health in 1837; but he shortly after returned to Africa, to resume his labors, and after 45 years of ministerial toil and suffering, this "Apostle of Wesleyan Missions in South Africa," is still at his post, diligently employed; while his son, on the spot where he first drew the breath of life, became the successor of his venerable father, in the care of the Khamies Berg Church, till forced from his position by failure of health in 1848.

W. Shaw, the brother of Barnabas, meanwhile, was engaged with his associates in extending the Gospel on the east coast, and in the interior, among the Bechuanas, as far up as Plaatberg in lat. 28.

The Albany mission was originally commenced with the settlers who went out from England, in the hope that it would connect itself with the Hottentots, and ultimately provide the means for extending itself among the Kaffre tribes. These hopes have been realized; and the brethren occupying them have successively given way to the new missionaries sent out from England, and have planted themselves among the savages of Kaffraria.—From their labors have resulted 19 stations, besides those of Wesleyville and Coke's Mount, in the Albany and Kaffraria District. In the Port Natal and Amazula District there are five stations; and in the Cape of Good Hope District there are nine, all of which with full information will be found in the tabular view at the end of this article.

The peculiar difficulties which our missionaries have to encounter in their labors among these people, arise from their feudal customs, their wandering life, (being herdsmen,) and the restless and warlike spirit of the Kaffres on the east coast. But, notwithstanding these difficulties the Gospel has been planted; schools and churches gathered; education and the press have been introduced; hundreds have been truly converted to God; the savagism of the unreclaimed, in some measure, softened down; and a large number are now before the Throne, who have died rejoicing in the faith which the missionaries first carried to them 30 years ago. An Institution for training native teachers is in operation in Kaffraria, and also a printing press, from which, besides Bibles, Hymn Books, &c., there is regularly issued a periodical in the Kaffre language. There is also another press at Grahams Town, and another among the Bechuanas. The languages employed by the missionaries are the English, the Dutch, the Kaffre, the Bassa, the Sesuto, the Grebo, and the Sichuana.

The leading authorities for this article are the "Annual Reports," and "Missionary Notices," of the Wesleyan Missionary Society; the "Annual Minutes" of the Wesleyan Conference; "The Wesleyan Methodist Magazine;" "Shaw's Memorials of South Africa," and "Moffat's South Africa."—REV. WILLIAM BUTLER.

It is especially gratifying to see, in the self-denying labors of all denominations on missionary ground, and the blessed results that follow, the substantial unity of Protestant Christians. The Apostle expressed his earnest desire, that the primitive disciples, to whom he wrote, might all speak the same thing, and be joined together in one mind and one spirit; and this is fulfilled in the foreign missionary field. By whatever diverse names they are called, whether Moravian, Wesleyan, Episcopal, Presbyterian, or Baptist, they speak the same language of Canaan, and their converts, whether "Parthians, Medes, the dwellers in Mesopotamia," or Hottentots, Kaffres, Hindoos, Chinese, or New Zealanders, all hear in their own tongue, and speak alike the language of penitence and faith. And, in the foregoing sketch, we find the German Presbyterian taking by the hand the English Wesleyan, and going a four months' journey into the wilderness, to introduce him into the field; and soon we hear the "song in the night," rising up from the joyous hearts of those who have received the Gospel from his hands.

The following tables give a comprehensive and cheering view of the results of the labors of the Wesleyan Missionaries in South Africa.

There is a slight discrepancy between these statistics and the table at the end of the article on Africa, that having been made out for the year 1852, and these for 1854. A comparison of the two will show the growth.

Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts.—Soon after the Colony of the Cape of Good Hope came into the possession of the British Government, in 1806, a colonial chaplain was appointed; but for a considerable period, but little interest was felt in the religious condition of the population, and no effort was made for the conversion of the heathen. In 1820, the Society sent out Rev. W. Wright to Cape Town, where he was succeeded in 1831 by Rev. Dr. E. J. Burrow. In 1840, a second clergyman was added to the Society's list. In 1847, there were found in all only 13 clergymen and one catechist, ministering to widely scattered congregations, throughout a territory which, exclusive of the recent additions of British Kaffraria, the Sovereignty, and Natal, was as large as Great Britain itself. In that year, the Diocese of Cape Town was constituted, including, together with all the British possessions in South Africa, the Island of St. Helena; and Bishop Gray having been consecrated on St. Peter's Day, 1847, arrived at Cape Town Feb. 28, 1848. The change which had been effected in the short space of three years, at the time of the Society's Jubilee in 1851, "shows," the Society say in their report, "how the presence of a single man, full of zeal for the glory of God and the extension of Christ's Kingdom, can, with God's blessing, infuse life and energy wherever he goes." At that time, the Bishop of Cape Town had made four visitations, which had been performed on foot or in a wagon; or, occasionally on horseback. In 1850, he crossed the Orange River, to visit the boers at Bloem Fontein and Vrede Dorp, whence he descended to Peter Maritzburg. On his way back, he passed throughout Kaffraria, sometimes into spots before unvisited by travelers, or at least unknown to geographers, for the purpose of bearing the Gospel to those savage tribes.

"The clergy have been multiplied nearly four-fold; two Archdeacons, Merriman and Welby, prove themselves noble coadjutors of their noble-hearted Bishop, and between forty and fifty active laborers were, in 1851, engaged in missionary labor throughout the long-neglected diocese. New churches were springing up in every direction, and the colonists were exhibiting their sense of the benefits conferred upon them, by making some efforts on their part to correspond with those of the church at home. A Collegiate Institution has been established at Woodlands, near Cape Town, which is in active and efficient operation. A Mission has been organized to the Mohammedans in and about Cape Town; and other missions, on a scale of unusual magnitude, are contemplated to the Kaffres and Zulus.—Society's Report, at its Third Jubilee, in 1851, p. 54.

Scotch Missions.—Some time about the year 1820, the Glasgow Missionary Society sent out Rev. W. R. Thompson as missionary, and

Mr. John Bennie as catechist, to accompany a colony of people from Glasgow, who went out with the intention of settling on the border of Kaffraria, the Society hoping a door would be opened for missionary operations among the natives; but the vessel which contained them suffered shipwreck, and the greater part of the company were lost. The missionaries, however, were saved; and the Government appointed Mr. Thompson as a missionary to the Kaffres, in conjunction with Rev. John Brownlee, the catechist, to be supported by the society. The Mission is located on the river Chumie, at the residence of the chief Gaika. Soon after the mission was established, Sicana, the chief of a Kraal near Kat River Mission, died. In the morning of the day of his decease, it being Sabbath, he went to the place of worship, and told the people that God had afflicted him with sickness, and that he should die that day, resigning his soul and body into His hands; and advising them to remove to the Teacher, as the situation of all without Christ was wretched. He died at the time signified, and all his people removed to the station at Chumie in June. It pleased the Lord to pour out his spirit in this wilderness, and in June, 1823, five Kaffres were baptized, and there were as many more candidates.

December 16, 1823, Rev. Mr. Ross and his wife arrived as a reinforcement. At this time, the schools, both male and female, were well attended, and the progress of the children encouraging. A printing press was in operation. From the chiefs of different tribes the missionaries had received warm invitations to become their instructors.

In 1830, a new and commodious church had been built, which would hold 400 persons, and not less than 300 attendants every Sabbath. Morning prayer was daily attended by about 150 persons, who were assembled in the evening and questioned on what they had heard in the morning. The settlement was in a flourishing state. The Kaffres had built a great number of houses for themselves, and had well-cultivated gardens. A new station had been formed at Lovedale, 12 miles from Chumie, to which Messrs. Ross and Bennie had been assigned. And the Gospel of John had been translated into the Kaffre language. In 1833, another station had been added, named Balfour, and it was stated that other societies were supplied with portions of Scripture from their press.

The Glasgow Missionary Society was originally formed of a union of members of the Established Church of Scotland, and Dissenters. On the 9th of January, 1838, this union was amicably dissolved, the members of the Established Church retaining the old name, and the Dissenters taking the name of the Glasgow African Missionary Society, and retaining the stations of Chumie, Iggebigha, Glenthorn, and Kirkwood; while the old So ciety took Lovedale, Burnshill, Pirrie, and Kweleha.

On the 28th of February, 1843, the missionary brethren at Lovedale formed themselves into a session, for the purpose of conducting the ecclesiastical affairs of the station. At their first meeting, it was resolved to observe the first Monday of the month as a day of prayer for the extension of the Redeemer's Kingdom, and at the morning and evening service of that day to direct the attention of the natives to the subject. On the 18th of the same month, Jacob, one of the young men of their seminary, professing to see himself as a lost and undone sinner, and to put confidence alone in Christ, was received as a candidate for baptism.

At Lovedale, public worship is kept up both on the Sabbath and week days. Four meetings are held on the Sabbath. On week days there is a meeting at sunrise, and in the evening the people are called together and examined on the passage read in the morning.

At Pirrie the church was enlarged, Mr. Ross, the missionary, building the walls, his son doing the wood-work of the roof during his vacation, native assistants did the plastering and built the seats, Mrs. Ross glazed the windows, and the native women laid the floor, which was of clay, and whitewashed the whole within and without, coloring the inside with yellow ochre, which the school girls brought two miles. When all hands set to work with equal alacrity upon the spiritual building, how soon will its walls go up!

The station at Kweleha was abandoned, on account of the oppressive conduct of a native chief.

After the division which took place in the Church of Scotland in 1843, the Glasgow Missionary Society became merged in the foreign mission scheme of the Free Church of Scotland; and its missionaries all being in South Africa, were placed under the care of the latter body. The vote of dissolution and transfer was passed on the 29th of October, 1844. At the time of the transfer, there was a mission seminary, valued at 2000*l.* to 3000*l.*; free from debt, with twelve or fourteen native youths in preparation for the ministry; and some of the pupils trained in the seminary were engaged in communicating Christian knowledge to their countrymen.

The mission continued to prosper till the breaking out of the Kaffre war, in 1846, when the missionaries and their people were obliged to flee, some taking refuge at the Kat River settlement, and some in other places. Mr. Gowan returned to Scotland, and Mr. and Mrs. Gorrie repaired to Cape Town, to labor among the colonists. Mr. Gowan thus describes the desolation left behind: "Burnshill station is destroyed, and several others have been burned. Some of the missionaries narrowly escaped with their lives. The houses at Lovedale have been converted into a garrison. The seminary is occupied by 200 soldiers, with commissariat and military stores. The walls of our houses are loop-holed, and our gardens converted into cattle kraals."

In 1848, the missionaries were again at their posts; and at Lovedale, where they had been for some time, every thing was full of hope. At the other stations, things presented a sad appearance. The loss occasioned by the war was about 1,258*l.*, of which the government repaid about 189*l.* The personal loss to the missionaries was over 500*l.* In 1849, the seminary at Lovedale was reopened, with seven native and ten European pupils; and the Governor of the Colony had granted 100*l.* per annum towards the expense of the seminary, and 12*l.* a year to each native teacher, after leaving the institution.

In 1850, Rev. Mr. Macfarlane makes the following comparison of the present with the past: "When our missionaries began their labors, the Kaffre language had not been reduced to letters. The Scriptures, Catechisms, school books, and other publications are now translated. Native husbandry was conducted with wooden instruments instead of iron, and was unworthy of the name. Now, wheat and barley are grown in luxuriance, and oxen are trained for the plough. Polygamy was almost universal, and the women were treated as brute beasts. Now, Christian females refuse to marry in such circumstances. They dress in a becoming manner, and some of them earn their bread by the use of the needle. Then there was little or no Sabbath beyond the mission premises. Now, the Sabbath is generally respected over the district. There are probably a thousand native Christians in the district, and these are, in many cases, educated, and able to instruct others. The worship of God may be heard from many a Kaffre hut. The native mind has been found equal to any ordinary degree of culture. Both sons and daughters of the missionaries are employed in the work. All is full of hope."

In 1852, Mr. Ross and his assistant were compelled, for the fifth time, to leave the station at Pirrie, on account of the war. The rest of the brethren were laboring under many difficulties, yet with encouraging success.—There were then 21 candidates for baptism at Lovedale. The foregoing table will show the state of the mission, at the several stations, in 1844, before the war; the returns since the resumption of the missions, being very incomplete. — London Missionary Register.

Glasgow African Missionary Society.—The help of native assistants, in the conduct of meetings, was beginning to be called in requisition at Chumie, in 1843. At Iggibigha, in 1842, a man and two women, after being under the closest observation for four years, were baptized, as the first fruits of missionary labor at the stations; and soon after, another, who was a candidate for baptism, died, saying, among his last words, "I love to go to Jesus; I cast myself upon him. God has taught me to hope in Him who died for me; I desire to dwell with him for ever. I am going home." The first Christian marriage was celebrated this year; the heathen father of the young woman, after much persuasion, with prayer on the part of the young man, relinquishing the usual present of cattle, which was regarded as a heathenish claim. The operations at Glen-thon have been suspended.

Our schools are supported, at these stations, and the missionaries itinerate in the villages around, making these preaching places; and they say not a few of their candidates for baptism come from these schools. As an illustration of the cruelty of heathenism, they relate that a girl, who was afflicted with epileptic fits, was left to fall into the fire, burning herself severely, and was then carried out and left in the field, where, after remaining in this condition a day or two in great distress, she was carried off and devoured by the wolves.

This mission continued to prosper, till the breaking out of the Kaffre war, in 1846, when the stations at Chumie and Iggibigha were burnt and laid in ruins, the missionaries taking refuge at the Kat River settlement. On the 27th of July, 1847, this society transferred its missionary operations to the care of the United Presbyterian Church.

The Kaffre war has been most disastrous to the operations of this society. It has laid waste the mission stations, scattered the missionaries and converts, suspended entirely the work of instruction, and done an amount of evil, which can scarcely be exaggerated. And yet there is no disposition to abandon the field. The following table will show the condition of the stations in 1844, before the war. Whether they have recovered from the disasters of the war, we have no means of knowing. These facts have been gathered from the London Missionary Register.

French Protestant Missions.—The "Société des Missions Évangéliques de Paris," which was formed in 1822, sent its first missionaries to South Africa, to labor among their refugee countrymen, together with the Hottentots of Wagonmaker Valley, near Talbagh. But the farmers generally being unfavorable to the instruction of their slaves, and the colonists being adequately supplied with religious teachers, they, upon the advice of Dr. Philip, determined on the establishment of a mission beyond the bounds of the Colony. Messrs. Lemue & Rol-land, therefore, leaving Mr. Bisseux with the descendants of the French Refugees, set forward on the 9th of January, 1830, and were soon after joined by Dr. Philip; and after visiting the various stations of the London Missionary Society, they determined to establish themselves in connection with Lattakoo, among the Bechuana, where they arrived, July 24, 1830, after a toilsome journey of nearly ten weeks, from Bethelsdorp. They immediately set about the study of the Sichuana language with such ardor, that they suffered in health, and were obliged to relax for some time, for which purpose, they visited Griqua Town.

On the first of September, 1831, Mr. Bisseux writes from Wagonmaker Valley, that he was about to baptize ten slaves, the first fruits of his ministry; and that the Gospel had wrought an advantageous change in the manners of many. On the 22nd of January, 1832, Mr. Pellissier joined the mission at Lattakoo, and in pursuance of an arrangement, previously made, visited the Chief of the Baharootzes for the purpose of establishing a new station; but the design was frustrated by the jealousy of the chiefs; and in this journey he had a narrow escape from two lions, by which he was pursued.

On the 21st of March, 1833, another reinforcement arrived, consisting of one missionary, and one male and one female assistant. On the 17th of February, 1832, the three missionaries set forward to renew the attempt to establish a mission among the Baharootzes. For three weeks they passed through vast solitudes, which the want of water prevented being cultivated; after which, they traveled many days through an inhabited country, till they reached Mosika, the residence of Mokatla, the chief of the Baharootzes. The town consisted of a great number of huts, scattered at the foot of two high hills, forming a chain of mountains, intersected with valleys. The chief received them with apparent cordiality, and on the Sabbath, ordered all work to cease, and the missionaries addressed a congregation of not less than eight hundred persons. But, in consequence of the jealousy of Moselekatsi, king of the Zulus, to whom Mokatla was tributary, they were obliged to leave the country; and, by the advice of Dr. Philip, they repaired to Motito, seven or eight miles from Old Lattakoo, Mahura, the chief, having desired that missionaries should settle there. Moselekatsi, having made war upon the Baharootzes, and driven them out of their country, many of them were hunted out in the desert, by the missionaries, and induced to settle at the new station. Motito has a good supply of water, and the land is good for cultivation.

At Wagonmaker Valley, in 1833, there was quite an awakening among the people, and there were about forty who gave evidence of piety. The mission at Motito was, at this time, the advanced guard, being eighty-five leagues north of the colony, and no other settlement being so far in the interior. But the prospect seemed discouraging. The mission was established for the special benefit of a tribe of Bechuanas, called Batlapis, residing at Old Lattikoo. But, none of them had as yet come to reside at the station; and when the missionaries, after a fatiguing ride of two hours, inhaling the sand which the wind raised around them, arrived at the miserable dirty village of the chief, they were met with the greatest indifference, except when the chief wished to ask a favor, when the men would be seen retiring to the rocks from all quarters, for prayer! Yet, the settlement at Motito was greatly improved at the end of the first year. The few people collected there were attentive to the Gospel; schools were established, and the chief sent his son and daughter.

In 1833, the station called Caledon, a settlement at the junction of the Caledon and Orange rivers, was ceded to the Society by the London Missionary Society, and taken possession of by Mr. G. P. Pellisier. But, finding that the Bosjesmans, who had been collected there, had abandoned the spot, he turned his attention to the Bechuanas wandering near Philipolis; and a chief with 1,200 followers was induced to join him. In a short time, the appearance of the station was entirely changed. The people had laid out a great number of gardens; and the inhabitants at the station amounted to about 1,800, most of them Batlapis.

On the 28th of June, 1833, a station was commenced at Morija, 54 leagues east of Caledon, near the residence of Moshesh, the chief of the Bechuana Bassoutos; and the chief quit his mountain, and settled with his people at the station. The plan of a new town was speedily traced, and all hands, old and young, were soon busied in collecting and preparing bamboos, laths, reeds and rushes. They set to the work with vigor, and pursued it with alacrity, until a new town arose before their eyes. The site of the mission, which was secured by regular purchase, was considered to be the best in the whole country.

In 1834, a house of worship was built at Motito, and the "sound of the church-going bell," was first heard in the valley of Motito; five adults were baptized, and the inhabitants greatly improved in their condition. Mahura, having offended Moselekatsi, whose power was dreaded, flew from old Lattikoo, taking most of his people with him, so that the hope of reaching them by this mission was given up. The inhabitants of Caledon had increased to 2,500; and some of the people gave evidence of being truly awakened. The prompt and unexpected assemblage of so many people there was considered as an event unequalled in the missions in that country. On account of the departure of Mahura from Motito, and Mr. Rolland not being required there, he commenced a new station in 1835, at Beersheba, 18 leagues from Caledon, within the territory claimed by Moshesh. The missionaries at Morija had just begun to preach in the native language.

In 1836, a great change was visible at Wagonmaker's Valley, and the hostility of the colonists to the instruction and baptism of slaves was giving way. The departure of Mahura from Old Lattikoo, had proved advantageous to Motito, in opening the way for many natives to settle there without fear. The name of Caledon was changed to Bethulia; and the station was considered to be in a remarkably prosperous condition, with evidence of the special presence of the Holy Spirit. The first general conference of the missionaries, which they have continued to hold annually since, was held on the 5th of July, 1835, at Beersheba.

In 1837, a religious awakening occurred among the Bassoutos at Beersheba, and the labors of the last six months were blessed to many souls. A new station was formed among the same people at Thaba Bossiou, by Rev. Mr. Gosselin, and another at Mokollong, among the Lighoyas, by Rev. Mr. Daumas, who was very cordially received by the people, the women presenting their children to him, and saying, "Come! see your father!"

In 1838, the station at Motito had increased in population to 1,000; but had been visited with sore trial by the severe and protracted illness of Mrs. Lemue, in view of which Mr. Lemue had presented to his mind the alternative of sacrificing his wife or the mission. If he remained, he was persuaded she could not survive another season. If he left, he feared that the people, intimidated by Mahura would be scattered abroad. At Bethulia 28 persons were baptized. The administration of the ordinance was a scene of deep interest. "The audience, which had kept a profound silence, because they felt the presence of the Lord, at length interrupted it to give free course to tears, which the scene before them called forth." After the baptism of the candidates, they presented their young children, to consecrate them to the Lord, in the same ordinance. In the afternoon, the Church, with this new addition, making 48 in all, sat down to the table of the Lord. The converts generally were faithful and steadfast, maintaining family prayer, and other religious duties. Fifty-five more professed converts were candidates for baptism, and there was about the same number of inquirers. Civilization also keeps pace with the gospel. All who embrace the gospel adopt, as much as possible, the manners of the civilized. At Morija, Molapo, eldest son of Moshesh, and second chief, was received as a candidate for baptism with ten others. Great progress had been made in the observance of the Sabbath, throughout the whole tribe, and the people were anxious to learn to read. The station was also advancing rapidly in temporal things. The new station at Thaba Bossiou is on an isolated hill of a pentagonal form, about 400 feet high, on the summit of which are the towns of Moshesh and his father Mokachane, from which 22 villages are seen. The missionary is greatly encouraged by the appearance of things. Moshesh, on a neighboring chief inviting him to join him in a marauding expedition, sent this reply: "Go tell your master that there is a house of prayer at Thaba Bossiou. I learn there to make power to consist in wisdom, and not in the number of cattle. My children at Morija are got ahead of me; it is time that I should get instruction." At Beersheba, the following year, after a rigid examination, 42 were admitted to the church by baptism. In this examination, Mr. Rolland availed himself of the assistance of some of the elder members, who, from their knowledge of the persons brought out many things by their questions which he would not have thought of.

In 1841, Rev. Mr. Casalis writes from Thaba Bossiou, on the eighth year after the establishment of the mission, that in his view, there were three periods in the missionary work: during the first, the natives manifest indifference and apathy, arising from ignorance of the true object of the missionary. To remove this ignorance, in this instance, required five years. The second era was distinguished by a remarkable effusion of the Holy Spirit, which enriched the church with many enlightened members. The third period was that of thoughtful, argumentative opposition; and this spirit had already begun to manifest itself; the loss of those who unite with the church giving serious offence to those that are wedded to their sins. This was very strong among the villages around, and had manifested itself decidedly at other stations, especially among the polygamists, who cannot bear the thought of giving up their wives. The aged chief, Mokachane was baptized at this station, saying, "I have done so much evil to Moshesh, by my pernicious counsels and flatteries, that, as long as I live, I shall not cease my endeavors to draw him to God by my words and my prayers." Persecution had manifested itself at some of the stations. A young convert on the Hart river, was subject to the bitter opposition and railing of his father and wife, and his life was repeatedly threatened by the people; but his reply was, "you may kill the body, but you have no power to kill the soul." This year a very successful attempt was made at several stations to secure contributions for the support of the gospel, the people, in their poverty exhibiting great liberality.

In August, 1841, a new station was formed among the Corannas at Friedau, 183 miles east of Motito, by Rev. J. A. Primmer.

At Morija, in 1843, an awakening spread far around the station in more than 100 villages. The members of the church continued to make progress in grace. They were simple, affectionate, united and zealous. There were about thirty, who were regarded as having truly received the gospel during the year. In 1851, Mr. Freeman, the missionary, says, "By dividing 280 villages into 28 districts, 12,000 souls are placed under the instruction of the word of God by means of native teachers."

The latest intelligence gives the results of missionary labor, at the several stations of this society, as seen in the following table:

The Kaffre war occasioned so much destruction and confusion among the missions, that for several years no reports were received. Previous to this time the missions were generally in a prosperous state; evidences of the presence of the Holy Spirit appeared at all the stations, and additions were yearly made to the churches. The church members gave gratifying evidence of piety amidst temptation, and in many instances, persecution. Many, even of non-professors, were abandoning polygamy, and other heathen customs. Civilization was generally advancing, the schools prosperous, many learning to read, and the work of translation and printing the scriptures was going forward. Many also had died in the triumphs of faith. In 1846, a new station was established at Carmel, between Bethulia and Beersheba, for the training of native schoolmasters. An awakening had taken place among the youth, and sixteen of them were candidates for baptism. At Bethesda, in 1851, the brethren say, "Never was our spiritual horizon more encouraging than at present. Some young persons have been awakened." At Thaba Bossiou the station had been greatly disturbed by political commotions, and by the conduct of the three sons of Moshesh, who had renounced their profession of the gospel.

On some of the points embraced in this table, the returns are imperfect; but enough appears to show that the labors of this society have been quite successful; and from the examination we have given the subject, we think the number admitted as communicants may be regarded as giving credible evidence of piety. It has been the practice of the missionaries to keep them standing a long time as candidates, after professing conversion, before admitting them to the church.

American Board.—In 1834, the Board resolved on a mission among the Zulus; the design being to establish one mission among the maritime tribe, under Dingaan, near Port Natal, and one in the interior, among the tribe of which Moselekatsi was chief. To the former were designated Rev. Messrs. Aldin Grout and George Champion, missionaries, and Newton Adams, M. D., physician, with their wives; and to the latter, Rev. Messrs. Daniel Lindlay, Alexander E. Wilson, M. D., and Henry I. Venable, missionaries, with their wives. They sailed December 3, 1834, in the Burlington, and arrived at Cape Town on the 5th of February, 1835. The brethren destined for the interior commenced their journey of 1000 miles, on the 19th of March, in three large wagons, drawn by twelve yoke of oxen, accompanied by Rev. Mr. Wright, a missionary of the London Society, residing at Griqua Town, which place they reached May 16, 48 days after leaving Cape Town. Here they were detained five months to recruit their cattle. They were kindly and hospitably entertained by the English missionaries; and they occupied themselves in learning the Sichuana language, and in preparing a small spelling-book in the Sitibeli, the language spoken by the tribe to which they were going.

The brethren destined to the maritime tribe were detained at the Cape, in consequence of a war between the Kaffres and the Colony, as their route lay through Kaffraria. Meanwhile, they were employed in missionary labor at the Cape; and the church under the care of Rev. Dr. Philip presented them with £45 to defray their expenses. In July they sailed for Algoa Bay, near Bethelsdorp; and leaving their wives at Bethelsdorp and Port Elizabeth, with the missionaries at these places, they sailed from Algoa Bay, December 7, and reached Port Natal on the 20th. About 30 white men then resided at Port Natal, as hunters and traders, by whom they were kindly received, and furnished with cattle for their wagon. A fortnight brought them to the residence of Dingaan, about 160 miles from Port Natal. The chief consented that they should come to his country, but proposed that they should first stop at Natal, till he should see the effect of a school which they might open at his place; to which they consented. Mr. Champion was left at Natal to make arrangements, and the other two returned to Algoa Bay for their families and effects. On their arrival, Mrs. Grout was found to be ill beyond hope of recovery. She died of consumption, on the 24th of February following, full of faith, and rejoicing that she had been counted worthy to leave her country and home on such an errand.

January 22, 1836, Messrs. Lindlay and Venable proceeded from Griqua Town to visit Moselekatsi, and reached his place about the middle of May. The chief gave his consent to their commencing a mission among his people; but their impressions of his character were unfavorable, and the extent of his territory and number of his people fell short of their expectations. The mission was commenced at Mosika on the 16th of June, 1836. But having entered their houses before the mud floors were sufficiently dried, all of them but Dr. Wilson were attacked with fever, and Mrs. Wilson died, after being sick eight days. The survivors were afflicted with distressing rheumatism for three or four months. And they had scarcely recovered, when the Dutch farmers, having been plundered of their cattle by Moselekatsi, invaded his country, destroyed fourteen villages, slaughtered great numbers of his people, and carried off 6000 head of cattle. They threatened to renew the attack, and advised the missionaries to leave the country, which they did, taking their course overland, to join the brethren at Port Natal, where they arrived July 27, 1837, after a journey of ten weeks, in which they traveled not less than 1300 miles, over the worst roads they had seen in Africa.

Messrs. Grout and Champion and Dr. Adams arrived with their families, at Port Natal, on the 21st of May, 1836. Dingaan gave them a cordial reception, with permission to form a station at his capital. Mr. Champion was destined to the interior station at Ginani, about midway between Natal and the chief's residence; Dr. Adams to Umlazi, 6 miles from Port Natal; and Mr. Grout to divide his labors between the two. The king sent seven girls and four boys to be taught by the missionaries. At the end of eight or nine months, Mr. Champion had ten boys and twenty females under instruction, with a congregation on the Sabbath of about 200. But the despotic power of Dingaan, who held his subjects in abject slavery, was a serious obstacle in the way. Dr. Adams had about fifty children in his school, besides a morning class of adults. The Sabbath school for adults contained 250, and that for others, under the care of Mrs. Adams, 250 to 300. She also instructed 30 or 40 females twice a week in sewing. The Sabbath congregation was about 600, assembled in the shade of a great tree. Four boys were taken as boarding scholars. The press had been set up at Umlazi, and two or three elementary books printed for the schools. Mr. Lindley commenced a station at the Illovo River, 15 miles north-west of Natal, and Messrs. Venable and Wilson, at Klangezoa, 30 miles farther from Port Natal. Mr. Grout, with the permission of the committee, returned to the United States, bringing his own motherless child and that of Dr. Wilson.

The Dutch emigrants, after having destroyed the power of Moselekatsi, proceeded toward Port Natal. And, although Dingaan did not claim jurisdiction over the territory, they thought it prudent to gain his consent; and for this purpose, they sent their governor, Mr. Ratief, with a number of attendants, to consult him. Just before, some of Dingaan's cattle had been carried off by a party of Mantalis, disguised as boers. Dingaan required Ratief to see the cattle returned before he would treat with them; and he accordingly pursued the party of marauders, and recovered the cattle, without bloodshed, and returned with them to Dingaan's capital, with about 60 of his men, who, three days after their arrival, were all treacherously seized and put to death. At the same time, a party of soldiers were sent to attack the boers at their encampment; by whom, however, although surprised in the night, they were repulsed. The farmers now rallied their forces, and with the newly arrived emigrants and whites and Hottentots at Port Natal, prepared to attack the treacherous chief. The missionaries were obliged to retire; and leaving Mr. Lindley at Port Natal to watch the course of events, they sailed, with their families, for Port Elizabeth, on the 30th of March. By this time a righteous Providence had made a vagabond of Moselekatsi.

Four times he was attacked and plundered, after the breaking up of the mission.

The Zulus were victorious in a pitched battle with the people residing at Natal, and on the 23d of April, they invaded that place, and Mr. Lindley left on board a vessel, and after visiting Delagoa Bay, joined his family and associates at Port Elizabeth, on the 22d of June. The war continuing, Mr. Venable removed with his wife to Cape Town, and devoted himself to evangelical labors amongst a destitute class of its inhabitants. They afterwards returned to the United States, and Mr. and Mrs. Champion soon followed. The former, at their own request, received an honorable discharge from the service of the Board. The latter waited, with the hope of being able to return; but his wife's health had received such a shock from the hardships she had endured in Africa as to give little prospect of that cherished hope ever being realized. After laboring several years in the ministry in this country he was attacked with a pulmonary complaint; and having visited Santa Cruz, in the West Indies, with the hope of being benefited, he entered into his rest, at the age of 31. His life was one of rare consecration to the cause of Christ. Possessing an ample fortune, and the esteem of a most respectable circle of friends, he left all and entered on the missionary work; and his fondest desire to the last, was, to resume his missionary labors, and spend his life among the degraded Zulus in South Africa. His wife, after a few years of suffering, followed him to the grave, leaving a son an orphan. Mr. Champion, after providing for his family, left the residue of his estate to the Board. Dr. Wilson returned to this country, and afterwards joined the West African Mission.

The Colonial Government resolved to take military possession of Port Natal, and the boers gained a decided victory over Dingaan, and took his capital, and drove him from his dominions. Umpandi, the brother of Dingaan, to save his life, as was supposed, from the jealous cruelty of his brother, withdrew from the Zulu territory. Being joined by a majority of his people, he was declared king, defeated Dingaan in a bloody battle, and compelled him to flee. The Dutch afterwards chased Dingaan to a great distance.

Mr. Lindley and Dr. Adams with Mrs. Adams, returned to Port Natal on the 12th of June, 1839. Mrs. Lindley was detained till autumn, by the illness of one of their children. Meanwhile, the English withdrew their military force, and left the boers and the natives to themselves. Mr. Lindley immediately commenced his labors for the intellectual and spiritual good of the emigrants.

Mr. Grout returned to Port Natal, from the United States, with Mrs. Grout, June 30, 1840. By this time, a congregation of 500 had been collected by Dr. Adams at Umlazi, with a Bible class, and a Sabbath school of 200 children. Mr. Grout accompanied a Dutch delegation to the residence of Umpandi, and obtained his permission for the settlement of a missionary in the Zulu country. Passing by Ginani, where Messrs. Grout and Champion formerly resided, they found the buildings burnt, and the place solitary. A station was afterwards formed in the Zulu country, at a place called Inkanyezi, which means a star. Thirty-seven villages were so near this place that their inhabitants could be collected for worship on the Sabbath. The attendance on preaching at Inkanyezi was about 250, and at Umlazi about 800 at two different places. Each station had a school of about fifty pupils. Mr. Adams had a school for girls once a week, and a prayer meeting for adult females, both classes being instructed in needlework. One of the women gave evidence of having been born again. The mission, up to this date (1841) had printed 55,380 pages, more than half of it portions of the word of God.

Mr. Lindley, at his own request, received a dismission from the service of the Board, in order to accept the appointment of minister of the Reformed Dutch church, with liberty to resume his connection, should unexpected changes render it expedient.

At length, the interest and confidence of the people in the mission awakened the jealousy of Umpandi; and some of the people being accused by those who wished to obtain his favor, of forsaking him and attaching themselves to Mr. Grout, sentence of death was passed upon them, before they knew anything of the matter. At daybreak, on the morning of July 25th, 1842, it was announced at Mr. Grout's window that an army was upon the place. Not knowing whether it was for him, or the people, or for both, he commended himself and his family to God, before leaving his room. An attack was made on the six places nearest the mission house, upon those who had been most friendly to the mission, with orders to put to death every man, woman, and child, in three of them. Mr. Grout immediately left the station, and arrived at Umlazi with his family early in August; and about a month afterwards, he commenced a new station on the Umgeni river, six miles north-east of Port Natal, where he immediately collected a congregation of 600 to 1000 attentive hearers. Meanwhile, the English, after some conflict with the boers, again took possession of Port Natal.

Since the overthrow of Dingaan, the Zulus, weary of his intolerable cruelty, and the scarcely less bloody proceedings of his successor, had been escaping from their country and taking refuge near Natal, until, including the country about 100 miles back, they amounted probably to 24,000.

In view of the repeated disasters which the mission had experienced, and the discouraging aspect of things, as well as of the fact that the Wesleyan Methodists were extending their missions nearly to Port Natal, the Prudential Committee decided that it was inexpedient to continue the mission; and on the 31st of August, 1843, a letter was sent, instructing the brethren to bring it to a close. Previous to this, the native settlements about Umlazi and Umgeni had received great accessions of emigrants from the Zulu country. The Colonial Government, in creating a new colony at Port Natal, had officially announced that no laws should be allowed, recognizing any distinction on account of color; that no attack should be made upon any people without the colony, by persons not acting under the direction of the Colonial Government; and that slavery should not be tolerated in any form. A commissioner had also arrived, who declared himself in favor of giving the natives land on which they might form distinct settlements; of having one or more missionaries in each district; and of employing all the influence of the Government to induce the people to conform to the instructions of the missionaries. Dr. Adams had also visited Umpandi, and a request had been received from him that a colonial agent and a missionary might be sent to reside near him. About the middle of November, Mr. Grout had about 10,000 people around him, within the extent of an ordinary New-England parish, and a congregation of 500 to 1000 on the Sabbath, to whom he preached in the open air, under a scorching African sun.

It was in these circumstances that the brethren received the decision of the Committee. They at once began making arrangements for carrying it into effect. Hearing of a vessel to sail from Cape Town for the United States, Mr. Grout immediately proceeded to that place. On his arrival there, a strong desire was manifested by the ministers of the Gospel and others, that the mission should not be given up. A public meeting was called. After hearing Mr. Grout's statement, addresses were made by Dr. Philip, the American consul, and others, and a collection of about $800 was raised to defray Mr. Grout's expenses, till he could communicate with the Prudential Committee. Dr. Philip wrote to the committee, declaring that, rather than have it given up, he would visit America to beg for the mission. A joint letter was also written, to the same effect, by all the ministers at Cape Town. The Committee, therefore, could not hesitate to authorize the missionaries to resume their labors at Natal.

Before leaving Cape Town, Mr. Grout received the most encouraging assurances from the Governor of the Colony, together with the appointment of government missionary, with a salary of £150 a year, with the same offer to Dr. Adams; and Mr. Lindley was appointed preacher to the boers.

Within the limits of the new Colony there were supposed to be 100,000 Zulus, besides 20,000 immediately around the two stations occupied by Mr. Grout and Dr. Adams.

Dr. Adams was ordained as a minister of the Gospel at Cape Town, on the 10th of December, 1844, the services being performed by Drs. Philip and Adamson and Messrs. Faure and Brown, clergymen of that place.

On returning to Port Natal, having, by some means, lost the right of resuming his station at Umgeni, Mr. Grout turned his attention to a site on the Umvoti river, about forty miles north of Port Natal, which he regarded as a most eligible post, well watered and well wooded, with good arable and pasture grounds. Under date of October 15, Dr. Adams wrote that they had about 100 under instruction in the day schools; and that there had never been a time before, when the people, young and old, manifested so much interest in learning.

On the 18th of April, 1846, Rev. James C. Bryant, who had been for about five years settled as pastor over a united and attached people in Littleton, Mass., sailed for this mission, with his wife, and arrived August 15. About the middle of January following, Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Grout also arrived from the United States. Mr. Alden Grout resigned his appointment from the Government, (which resignation was kindly accepted,) and resumed his connection with the Board, in April, 1845. Dr. Adams had previously declined the appointment.

In 1846, five commissioners were appointed by the Colonial Government, for locating the natives, and adjusting their relations to the emigrant farmers, and among them were Messrs. Adams and Lindley; it being the wish of the Lieutenant-Governor to effect the safe and permanent settlement of all classes; to secure the country lying between the allotments assigned to the natives, so as to impose a restraint upon their migratory habits; to stimulate them to industry by establishing markets; and also to make provision for the new villages that would spring up, and for the internal management and defence of the whole district.

In September, 1846, Mr. Bryant wrote from Umlazi, that, within a few months previous, there had been unusual seriousness among the natives, and that a few gave good evidence of piety. The converts, of their own accord, had established a prayer meeting among themselves; and, in December, Mr. Grout wrote from Umvoti, that the respect and attention with which many listened to preaching, was truly gratifying; and he was not without a hope that a young married couple had been truly converted. They were married in a Christian way, pledging themselves to abandon polygamy; and very soon after commencing house-keeping, they set up family prayer.

In pursuance of the plans of the Colonial Government, five allotments of land were made to the natives, comprising about 2500 square miles, with a population of about 50,000. The missionaries of the Wesleyan Society agreed to leave their American brethren in the undisturbed possession of the coast between the Umtogela and Umziukulu rivers, a distance of 160 miles.

In 1847, five stations had been commenced, and permanent buildings erected at two of them. Dr. Adams had removed twelve miles south-west, to be nearer the centre of his district, and the name Umlazi had been transferred to his new abode, the place he left being called Umlazi River. Six were admitted to the church at Umlazi, this year, as the result of what seemed clearly to be a gracious visitation of the Holy Spirit. There had also been some seriousness at Umvoti, and a native helper had there been admitted to the church. Two or three boys, also, were regarded as hopeful converts.

Speaking of an evening school, which he had, of sixteen regular attendants, Mr. Grout says: "They do not confine their study of books to the particular hour appropriated to their instruction, but seize also upon other opportunities. Not unfrequently have I seen them reading or studying at intervals of labor, or reading the Scriptures together, by the light of a wood fire in the evening. I have seen the same young men and boys, eight or ten in number, singing their morning and evening hymn of praise to God in their own tongue; and I learn that one of their number is in the habit of leading the rest in prayer at these times."

Mr. and Mrs. Ireland arrived at Port Natal on the 13th of February, 1848, and were followed soon after by Rev. Andrew Abraham, Rev. Hyman A. Wilder, and Rev. Joseph Tyler, with their wives. At this period, free schools had been established at each of the stations. A few of the pupils could read all the books which the mission had printed. Among the pupils were several pious young men, who, it was hoped, would become future helpers in the missionary work. At Umlazi, most of the congregation had committed to memory the Catechism, the Commandments, and many passages of Scripture. The numbers that assembled at the different stations for public worship varied from 50 to 1000, who listened with great apparent interest, and behaved with decorum during all the services. This disposition to assemble and listen to preaching is an interesting feature of the mission, and one that promises much for its success. Evidences of the special presence of the Holy Spirit were manifested at all the different stations, this year, and twenty-four were received into the several churches. Some opposition had been manifested, but it was short-lived. At the close of 1848, which seems to be a later date, 15 members had been added to the church at Umlazi and 16 at Umvoti. Prayer-meetings had been sustained at all the stations, and the native converts took part in them with a good degree of readiness and propriety. And Mrs. Grout and Mrs. Adams held weekly prayer-meetings with the females. The monthly concert was sustained at Umvoti and Umlazi, and was the most spirited meeting of all. All the male members took part in it with delight and to edification. About fifteen dollars had been contributed at Umvoti, to support a native missionary among their destitute countrymen, and about seventeen dollars at Umlazi.

December 23, 1850, Mr. Bryant was called to his rest. He was an excellent missionary, and the close of his course was eminently in keeping with his life. Rev. Jacob Ludwig Döhne, a native of Germany, who went to South Africa in 1836, in connection with the Berlin Missionary Society, was, at his request, and the strong recommendation of the brethren of the mission, appointed by the Board; and in the year 1851, the mission was reinforced by Rev. Seth B. Stone and Rev. William Mellen, with their wives. At the close of 1850, there were churches at nine of the eleven stations, containing 123 members, 36 of whom were received during the year. Regular preaching was maintained at 23 places. Three free schools, taught by pious natives, contained 89 pupils. The printing press was in operation, and 377,100 pages had been printed. The average population connected with each station was about 3000.

The distance between the extreme stations is about one hundred and fifty miles. The nearest English missionary station is 150 miles from the most southerly station, at Umtwalumi.

Dr. Adams died on the 16th of September, 1851, in the midst of his usefulness. His end was peace.

Evidences of an incipient civilization are making their appearance at the older stations. At Umvoti, for instance, nearly eighty persons, men, women, and children, come decently clad to the Sabbath worship, and some persons are usually clad while at work during the week. Three families live in civilized-looking houses, and some seven or eight natives are erecting similar habitations. These are substituting iron pots for cooking, in place of the old earthen; and are using spades, axes, saws, and other kindred instruments of husbandry and the arts. One native has procured a cart and oxen, and thus takes produce to the market. Household furniture is naturally found in the improved houses, and clothing to correspond, and some have procured writing materials, and learned how to use them.

The following table will show the state of the mission at the close of the year 1851, and the statistics of the following year, which are not so full, will not materially vary the result:

* Mr. Dohne makes it a rule to go from kraal to kraal daily, visiting and preaching to the people.

Eight churches have been organized in this mission, the largest of which has fifty-five members, and the smallest four. The gospel is preached on the Sabbath, and at other times, at each of the twelve stations, and with more or less regularity at seven out-stations, either on the Sabbath or during the week. Sabbath schools also are sustained, and weekly meetings for prayer and religious instruction. Eighteen persons were received into the churches during the year 1852. The report of the mission speaks also of twenty-five other cases regarded as "hopeful." "Such is the beginning of things. The work moves on as yet slowly. Still the light is spreading—knowledge is increasing. The fallow ground is being broken up, and the seed is falling, some by the wayside, some on stony ground, some among thorns, and some on good ground, as in other parts of the world. The harvest is not yet; but it will surely come. The number of persons constituting the Sabbath congregations varies from thirty or forty up to two hundred."

In the report of his station for 1852, Mr. Lindley remarks:

"With several of my church members, I continue, as I ever have been, well pleased. With most, I see no cause to find serious fault; yet my observation and experience, during the past year, have tended to weaken my confidence in the religious professions of this people. They do not give such evidence as I could wish of a thorough change of heart. And this question, always a difficult one, has now become painful: 'How much allowance ought to be made for imperfection in the Christian character of those who have barely, and but lately, emerged from the depths of a truly degrading heathenism?'"

Rhenish Missionary Society.—In the summer of 1829, this society sent to South Africa four graduates of their Mission Seminary, at Barmen. They sailed in company with Dr. Philip and the missionaries of the Paris Society. Soon after their arrival, two of them, Messrs. Lückhoff and Zahn, entered into the service of two local associations at Stellenbosch and Tulbagh; but afterwards these associations transferred their chapels and other buildings to the Rhenish society. The other two proceeded with Dr. Philip farther into the interior, and purchased the property of a boer, near Clanwilliam, which they named Wupperthal. This estate contained 60,000 acres of land, on which they established a mission colony. Whoever promised to submit to its regulations received a piece of land, and aid in the erection of a dwelling house. He was required to clothe himself, shun theft and drunkenness, remain with his family, and yield obedience to the missionaries. Thus speedily arose the flourishing African Wupperthal, which, crowned with beautiful gardens, looks like a village in Germany. The new settlers were instructed in all sorts of trades; and the oldest colonists already enjoy considerable prosperity. Mr. Zahn established a similar colony in 1844, in the neighborhood of Kokfontein, where he bought 954 acres for the sum of $3 500, on the following plan: Each family receives a piece of land for a house and garden, for which he pays a rent of $12. The rent pays the interest on the money which Mr. Zahn borrowed for the purpose, in Cape Town, and the surplus is applied to the liquidation of the principal; and when the property becomes free, these families will own their places.

The Dutch boers call these colonies "Institutes," and are very hostile to them, because they interfere with their designs of oppressing the natives. Artisans, some of whom are sent out by the society, settle in these colonies, and instruct the natives in the various handicraft occupations. The Institute of Wupperthal maintains itself and requires no assistance from home. A strict discipline is kept up, and every one exerts himself to earn a living, and to leave off the former habits of filth and theft. But some of the German colonists, who have settled among them, have set them a bad example, and the society have determined to send no more such colonists in future.

In 1830, three more missionaries were sent from Barmen, and 2 new stations were founded. One of them, called Ebenezer, at the mouth of Elephant River, was also an Institute. The other was at Worcester. The station at Ebenezer, being dependent for its fertility upon the overflow of the river, often suffers severely from drought, as the river sometimes does not overflow for six or seven years. There are 300 or 400 inhabitants at this station, most of whom are baptized. On account of its drought, this station would have been given up, but for the fact that it furnishes an important starting point for the intercourse with the territories of Namaqua and Damara. The society have also stations at Saron, near Tulbagh and at Kommaggas, in the north-west corner of the colony.

At all the stations, buildings for the schools, and churches, and dwelling-houses for the missionaries, have been erected; and everywhere a formal living in community has been organized; that is, in every missionary community there are chosen, from among the baptized natives, elders or presbyters who form the church session to the missionary, and who maintain discipline over the community. Clerks and church officers are chosen, native assistants are educated, who especially give their aid in the schools. Missionary associations are established; and the people, though nearly all very poor, contribute according to their ability to the support of their ministers. The preaching of the gospel has nowhere encountered systematic opposition from the natives themselves; and the government has shown itself, for the most part, very favorable to the operations of the missionaries. But the boers are bitter foes of the missionaries, because they rescue the negroes from their cruel oppressors.

Until the year 1840, the missionaries of the society in Africa had not advanced farther to the north than Ebenezer. Near to the boundary of Kommaggas, Mr. Schmelen, an esteemed German missionary, was stationed, in connection with the London Missionary Society. At an earlier period he had been in Namaqualand, on the other side of the Orange River, and he was now worn out with age. The London Missionary Society declined to send him any assistants, because they had given up the western coasts of South Africa, to be occupied by the Rhenish Society; thus Schmelen turned to this society, and prayed for fellow-laborers. The first brother sent him was Kleinschmidt, who went out to him in the year 1840; and in the following year, five others went.

In the year 1842, three of the brethren removed into Great Namaqualand, and as far as the tropic of Capricorn, where the boundaries of Negroland or Damara close, opposite to the territory of the Yellow Namaquas. The next year they were followed by two other missionaries into Little Namaqualand; and when, in 1848, the old Schmelen died, Kommaggas continued to be occupied by one of the society's missionaries. They have to the south of the Orange River, in Little Namaqua, three stations, Kommaggas, Kokfontein, and Pella, with several out-stations. In these are placed three missionaries, with several native assistants. They carry on their labors among some two thousand Namaquas, who are scattered over many hundred miles of these deserts, and, besides their Namaqua tongue, for the most part understand also the Dutch. About three hundred had been baptized in 1850, and the desire to obtain baptism was universal. The people are poor and filthy; but little grain is grown; and for cattle little grass can be found. The whole country is now English territory; and thus it is sure to happen that the rapacious boers will take from these poor people their last wells and their fertile strips of land.

Of the three brethren who proceeded into Great Namaqualand, two advanced to where the Zwakop flows into Whale-bay, and forms the northern boundary of Namaqualand. The third remained in the heart of the country, and built himself a house and a church near a beautiful fountain, and called the place Bethany. From this centre he commenced his labors all round, in a wide circle, which is larger than all Ireland. But very few people reside in these districts, only some three thousand; who, in order to find food for their small cattle, travel incessantly from one pasturage to another, keep as long as possible by their teachers in Bethany, but must always soon pull down their huts, in order to set them up again, for a short time, in more suitable localities. The missionary, too, travels the greater part of the year, and visits all the separate parties in the desert, remains with each a few weeks or months, teaches and administers the sacraments, and then returns again to the centre at Bethany. With each troop is a native assistant, who carries on the work of instruction in the absence of the missionary. About 1000 were baptized in 1850, of whom, probably, the half partake of the Lord's Supper. The missionaries usually employ an interpreter, as the pronunciation of the Namaqua dialect is too difficult. But they have already succeeded in fixing the language by writing, and, besides a catechism, they have translated the Gospel of Luke into that tongue; and by the assistance of the British and Foreign Bible Society have had it printed at the Cape, and distributed among the people. The large circuit of the desert of Great Namaqualand is divided into two parts; and a second missionary has been sent.

The two missionaries who proceeded in the year 1842, to the northern boundaries of Namaqualand, met with a very friendly reception from Jonker, the Namaqua chief of that district, who had dwelt before in Little Namaqualand, and had there been baptized. They were the means of suppressing the desolating warfare which had hitherto been waged between the Namaquas and the Damaras, and of establishing peace. Upon this they thought that the door was opened to them to visit the populous tribes that live to the north, towards the Niger; but disputes in their own neighborhood prevented all extension of missionary undertakings; and, on account of them, the locality was abandoned to the Wesleyans, who claimed prior occupancy. But Jonker with his people have relapsed into the abominations of heathenism; and they have become the worst robbers and murderers, so that the missionaries in that district have no more dangerous foe than that Jonker, who formerly sat at their feet. Directly after the missionaries abandoned Jonker's locality, two brethren were sent out to their aid in 1845. They now divided themselves; two went forward into Damaraland, and one established at Whale-bay the station of Scheppmansdorf, of the highest importance for intercourse by sea; and one, somewhat farther to the south, and towards the interior, founded the flourishing Rehoboth, at some hot springs which are pretty numerous in that district, and the country round about is rather fertile. The Namaqua tribe, which has settled there to the number of 1800 souls, is not compelled, by the want of food for their cattle, to disperse at every instant; but reside so constantly that the chief and several of his principal retainers have begun to build for themselves stone houses near the beautiful church and school, a thing hitherto unheard of in Namaqualand. The congregation numbers four hundred baptized persons, and about one hundred participants of the Lord's Supper; and though it has existed only for a short time, t is one of the most prosperous of the missionary communities. The two elders, the four deacons and deaconesses, discharge their offices in an exemplary manner; public worship is very regularly attended; a strict discipline is administered. Amidst the tumults of war, always raging around, Rehoboth has hitherto been preserved as a community of peace. A missionary association has also been formed.

The two missionaries who resolved to penetrate northwards into Damaraland, and to whom lately two other brethren have gone, have had to struggle with very great difficulties among the rude and savage negro tribes. Without an interpreter and without any assistance, they had to master a language to which they were perfect strangers, and which, from the hoarse throats of the people, sounds unintelligible in the highest degree, and appears to be extremely copious in inflections. It would seem that the Damara language is allied to that of the Kaffres. The missionaries have, with unspeakable pains and labor, reached that point, that they can both preach in the language, and they have printed some little books in it. At first they kept together at one station; but they have now three separate stations, and will probably extend them to a wider circle, as soon as the travels undertaken to explore the country beyond Whale-bay towards Lake Ngami have opened paths into the interior. In Damaraland, though the missionaries cannot yet speak of the fruits of their labors, they can speak of many lovely buds and blossoms.

This mission has planted an offshoot, far into the interior of the country. On the northern boundary of the Cape colony, not far from the middle, lie the Karroo mountains, on one extremity of which live a tribe of Bastards, on the other a tribe of Kaffres, that have been separated from their kindred tribes, and have wandered up and down for many years. Among both tribes a mission has been commenced; in 1845, among the Bastards (600), of whom 150 have been baptized; in 1847, among the Kaffres (700), of whom already 100 are baptized. The two stations are called Amandelboom and Schietfontein. They would all have the prospect of pleasing prosperity, if the hostile Dutch boers did not penetrate to them, with an intention to drive out the tribes, and to seize upon their fine pasture lands for their own herds.

In 1854, the mission was in a prosperous condition. Of its seventeen stations, ten are within the limits of the colony, four among the Namaquas, and three among the Hereros. Scheppmansdorf, the most northerly of the Namaqua stations, is near Whalefish Bay. New Barmen lies about two hundred miles north-east from Scheppmansdorf. Of the other two Herero stations, Otjimbingue is situated five days' journey west of New Barmen, and Schmelen's Expectation is one day east of the same place. The following table, though imperfect, will give a pretty correct idea of the condition of the different stations:

Berlin Missionary Society.—This society commenced operations in South Africa in 1833. One of the stations first occupied by its missionaries was Beaufort. Some of them went among the Corannas and Kaffres. Since 1838, they have had stations at Cape Town and Zoar. Its stations in 1847 were, Zoar, Bethel, Itembia, Emmaus, Bethany, and Priel. The number of its missionaries is 14; of baptized persons, 907; of scholars, 418.

Norwegian Protestant Missionary Society.—This society have recently commenced a mission near Port Natal, where they have sent four missionaries; but we have no particulars concerning their operations.

The following table presents a general summary of missionary operations in Southern Africa. The United Brethren and the Wesleyans do not distinguish, in their reports, between ordained missionaries and assistants. In several other respects, the returns are wanting, leaving the table incomplete; but, in the most important particulars, they are so nearly full as to give a fair impression of the work. The missionaries of the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts are chiefly employed in ministering to the established churches in the colony, and the results of their labors are not reported.

AFRICA, WESTERN :* That part of the continent of Africa, which lies along the Atlantic ocean, from the Southern borders of the Great Desert of Sahara, in latitude 16° or 17° north, to Cape Negro, near the river Nourse, or the Southern boundary of Benguela, in about the same latitude South. It varies in width, from 200 to 350 miles, and bears about the same geographical relation to the continent of Africa, that the Atlantic States do to North America. The Kong Mountains form the eastern boundary of the northern half of West Africa, and the Sierra del Crystal mountains the eastern boundary of the Southern half. The former take their rise about 200 miles east of the Gulf of Benin, and run in a north-westerly direction, keeping nearly parallel to the sea-coast, and not more than 200 miles distant, until they reach the latitude of Sierra Leone, where they make an immense sweep into the interior, inclining to the north-east, until they lose themselves in the sands of the Desert 700 or 800 miles from the sea-coast, and more than 1500 miles from their starting point. The latter rise nearer to the sea-coast, and for the first hundred miles are in sight of it ; after which, they bear off in a southerly direction, for 200 miles, and then resume a parallel line to the sea-coast, till their termination, in the latitude of Benguela, 1000 or 1200 miles from the place of beginning.

The three grand divisions of Western Africa, are Senegambia, Upper or Northern Guinea, and Southern Guinea or Southern Ethiopia. The first of these extends from the southern borders of Sahara to Cape Verga, 10° north latitude, reaching inward 700 miles. The second extends from Cape Verga to the Cameroon mountains, in the Gulf of Benin, a distance, on the coast, of more than 1500 miles, but not more than 250 miles wide. The third extends from the Cameroon mountains, in 4° north latitude, to Benguela.

The physical aspect of the country presents some of the richest and most exuberant natural scenery in the world. In the vicinity of Sierra Leone, Cape Mount, and Cape Messurado, the eye rests upon bold headlands and high promontories, enveloped in the richest tropical verdure. In the region of Cape Palmas, there are extended plains, somewhat undulated, and beautified with almost every variety of the palm and palmetto. On the Derwin coast, the country rises to high table land, of the richest aspect, and of immense extent. The Gold Coast presents hills and dales of almost every conceivable form and variety. And, in the neighborhood of Fernando Po and the Cameroons, mountain scenery presents itself of exceeding beauty and surpassing magnificence.

The western coasts of Africa are watered by four great and noble rivers ; the Senegal and Gambia in Senegambia, the Niger in Northern Guinea, and the Congo in Southern Guinea ; besides which, are several small rivers and streams, which run into the Gulf of Guinea.

The discharge of the rivers and small streams is frequently obstructed by the heavy swells from the open ocean, and form themselves into back waters or lagoons, in consequence of the exposed condition of the sea-coast. These lagoons are separated from the ocean by a narrow sand bank, thrown up by the outer swell. They are sometimes 200 or 300 miles long, but generally only a few feet deep, and seldom more than a quarter or half a mile wide. They furnish great facilities of intercourse and commerce to the maritime tribes, but are too shallow for ordinary shipping. The coast of Africa is greatly wanting in good bays and harbors.

The extent of territory belonging to the English colony at Sierra Leone, is about 3000 miles. The British possess also several small settlements on the coast of Guinea, viz., Cape Coast Castle, Sucondee, Dix Cove, Annamaboe, Akra and Lagos. The town of Bonny is situated at the mouth of the river Niger, and has been a great mart for the slave trade. The Islands of Ascension and St. Helena belong to Great Britain; the Madeira and Cape De Verde Islands, to the Portuguese. The Portuguese have also formed settlements below the Niger, on the coasts of Congo, Loango and Benguela.

Climate.—The heat is seldom oppressive on the sea-coast. Alternate land and sea-breezes blow fresh every day. The mercury seldom rises to 90°, and usually ranges between 74 and 84°. In-doors, the air is seldom oppressive. During the Harmattan winds, the mornings are cool, and the wind blows very strongly. On the coast of Senegambia the heat is oppressive, but not so on the coast of Guinea. In the interior, beyond the reach of the land and sea breezes, the climate no doubt would be oppressive.

Inhabitants.—The inhabitants of Western Africa are divided into three great families, corresponding with the three grand geographical divisions. Although these families belong to one race, yet there are marked and essential differences between them.

In Senegambia there are three leading families, known as the Jalofs, Mandingoes, and Foulahs. By many it is doubted whether either of these are pure negroes. The Foulahs are evidently a mixed race. They are Mohammedans, while the inhabitants of Northern and Southern Guinea are essentially Pagan.

Northern Guinea is inhabited by the Nigritian family, so called from their supposed descent from the great negro families living in the valley of the Niger. They are here subdivided into six or seven families.

Southern Guinea is inhabited by the Nilotic family, so called from their supposed descent from the ancient nations of the Nile. They are spread over the whole of the south half of the continent. They differ in many respects from the inhabitants of Upper Guinea. They are not so robust and energetic as the Nigritian race. Their forms are more slender, their features are better, and they are characterized by more shrewdness and pliancy of character.

Government.—There are no extended political organizations in Western Africa, excepting the kingdoms of Ashantee and Dahomey, and neither of these is larger or more powerful than the second-rate kingdoms of Europe. As a general thing, the people live together in small independent communities, varying in population from 1000 to 20,000. The form of government, nominally, is monarchy, but in reality, it is more patriarchal than monarchical.

Social Condition.—Though greatly debased by their heathenism, yet the inhabitants of Western Africa are not to be ranked among the lowest of the human race. They have fixed habitations; they cultivate the soil, have herds of domestic animals; and show as much foresight as most other people in providing for their future wants. They have made considerable proficiency in most of the mechanic arts, and evince a decided taste and capacity for commercial pursuits. They have no written literature, (excepting the Mohammedans among them;) but they have abundance of unwritten lore, in the form of fables, allegories, traditions, and proverbial sayings, in which are displayed no small share of close observation, lively imagination, and extraordinary shrewdness of character.

Moral Condition.—Selfishness, the controlling principle of the heathen heart, has full sway here. The principles of justice, the rights of individuals, the rules of decency, the voice of humanity, the ties of kindred and friendship, are trampled under foot. Theft, falsehood, fraud, deceit, duplicity, injustice, and oppression, are favorite agents and constant companions. Intemperance, licentiousness, gluttony and debauchery furnish the aliment upon which it feeds. It is almost impossible, says Mr. Wilson, to say what vice is preëminent among these degraded natives. Falsehood is universal. No man speaks the truth, who can find a motive for telling a lie. Theft, fraud, and intemperance, are considered as praiseworthy acts. Chastity is an idea for which they have no word in their language, and of which they can scarcely form a conception. Envy, jealousy, and revenge, enthrone themselves in every heart, and wield their triple sceptre with uncontrolled power. Hence, there can be no confidence between man and man, no sympathy of interests,—in fact, no such thing as society. As might be expected, in such a state, their intellectual faculties are obtuse and circumscribed, almost beyond conception. Beyond a few local associations, the ideas of the most intelligent native on the coast of Africa are not one particle above the speculations of a child in this country of two or three years of age. And over such minds, superstition reigns with absolute sway. Although the African is by nature preëminently social, yet polygamy, witchcraft, and the slave trade, together with the general influence of heathenism, render him an entire stranger to social happiness. Even cannibalism prevails to some extent, in connection with punishment for witchcraft. A man's importance in society is regulated by the number of his wives; but between them and himself, there exists no affection. The African woman detests her husband above all others, and strifes, jealousies, and endless bickerings, prevail among the women of his household. The belief in witchcraft sunders all the ties of nature, brings fatal suspicion upon the nearest relatives, and fills the minds of all with a fearful sense of insecurity. Their persons, houses, and almost every article of property, must be guarded by fetishes, and a man must be careful what path he walks, whose house he enters, on what stool he sits, and what he touches. The ceremony of "taking off the fetish" must be performed before a particle of food or drink is tasted. The hair of the head, and the parings of the nails, are concealed with studied care; and yet, notwithstanding these and a thousand other expedients, yet more silly and stupid, these people enjoy no sense of security, but are wretched and miserable among themselves, and know not where to turn for relief.

Religious Belief, and Superstitious Customs and Traditions.—It has been found very difficult to ascertain or describe the religious views of the Pagan tribes of Africa, owing partly to their indefiniteness, and partly to their habits of concealment in relation to what might expose them to ridicule. The belief in One Great Supreme Being, the Creator and Upholder of all things, Mr. Wilson thinks is universal. This conviction stands out in every man's creed; so much so, that any theory of Atheism would strike them as absurd and indefensible. Their conceptions of the character and attributes of God, however, are extremely low. They think of his power over the natural world as great and irresistible; but they have no just ideas of his moral purity; but ascribe to him motives and feelings utterly at variance with his true character. The tribes along the coast have a name for Jehovah, and most of them, two or more, significant of his character as Creator, Preserver, and Benefactor. The general impression, however, is, that He exercises very little agency in the government of the world, feeling too little interest in the affairs of men, or being too far off, to concern himself with what is transpiring upon earth. On some great occasions, his name is invoked, and in the Grebo country he is called upon three times, in a loud voice, to witness any very solemn transaction, as the establishment of peace after war, the ratification of some great treaty, or other measures of national importance. The same thing is done by an individual when he is about to drink the "red wood ordeal." Whether the practice of calling upon God three times, about which they are very particular, has any reference to the Trinity is matter of conjecture; but it is not improbable that it may have been handed down by tradition, or borrowed from Christianity.

The belief in a future state of existence is also general; but they have no very definite or consistent views as to what that state is. Some believe in transmigration, and hence animals in certain localities, as the monkeys about Fishtown, are regarded as sacred, because they are supposed to be animated by the spirits of their deceased friends. The soul of one man is supposed to have been revived in another, especially when there is any marked resemblance between the two. The Mpongwe people suppose there is a place where the spirits of the dead will be ultimately collected; and the Grebos connect with it the idea of an ordeal that must be passed through in going to that place, which may, perhaps, have been derived from the Popish doctrine of Purgatory, taught by the Portuguese missionaries, who visited this coast in the 16th and 17th centuries. But at present, the spirits of the dead are supposed to mingle freely with the living; hence their dreams and sudden impressions upon their minds are regarded as visitations from the dead; and any hints or admonitions received from such sources will be more readily followed than the dictates of reason and common sense. Sometimes the living are reprimanded by the dead for their remissness in duty, and not unfrequently the streets and precincts of the largest towns are swept and thoroughly cleansed, in obedience to some such hint from the dead.

The idea of a future state of rewards and punishments is not clearly developed; but a separate burying place is kept for atrocious criminals, and there is a repugnance felt to mingling with the notoriously wicked and cruel.

Fetishism and Devil-worship are the characteristic and leading forms of religion of the Pagan tribes of all Africa. The two things are entirely distinct in themselves; but they run together at so many points, and have been so much confounded by those who have written on the subject, that it is by no means an easy task to set them in their separate and true light. A Fetish, strictly speaking, is little less than a charm, amulet, or talisman, worn about the body, or suspended from some part of the dwelling, and is intended either to guard the owner from some apprehended evil, or to secure for him some coveted good. On some parts of the coast it is called a grigri, (greegree,) at other places, a juju, (jewjew,) and others still, a fetish, all implying the same thing. It may be a piece of wood, in the form of an ornament, the horn of a goat or sheep, a piece of metal or ivory, or any thing else that has been consecrated by one of the priests. There are several classes of these fetishes, for which they have separate names: those worn about their persons; such as are suspended over the doors, and in different parts of their dwellings, corresponding somewhat to the penates of the ancient Romans; such as may be found along their highways, to protect their farms and fruit trees from depredation; such as are used in war; and finally, such as belong to the town and are kept in a house at the entrance of the village, or at the residence of the chief.

The fetishes are supposed to possess extraordinary and varied powers. They preserve the life and health of one who uses them, and guard not only from visible evils, but from the secret machinations of witchcraft, so much dreaded by the simple-minded African. The fetish is also supposed to be able to protect itself against violence; which power the superstitious people are afraid to test. If the fetish fails, in a given instance, it only proves that this particular one has no efficacy, and it is thrown away for a better one; but every one is considered effective till experience has proved the contrary. And, if nine out of ten fail, the success of the one is balanced against the failure of the nine, and the successful one is the more valued. They talk to their fetishes, try to stir them up to action in great emergencies, pour rum upon them, and act as if they supposed they possessed life and intelligence: but in no other sense can their fetishes be considered objects of religious worship. As a general thing, they are regarded as inanimate objects, without intelligence, but nevertheless, exercising a silent mysterious influence, either for their protection and preservation, or to the injury of their fellow men. They regard this as an established fact; and think it as easy to see the connection between the fetish and the result, as between poison taken into the stomach and death that follows.

The practice of wearing and using fetishes is universal. They may be seen along every path, at the gate of every village, over the door of every house, and around the neck of every one. The young, especially those who have had some intercourse with the civilized world, show some skepticism on the subject; but the older people, especially when they become contemplative, and feel the infirmities of age, cling to them with greater tenacity. The people, however, have less feeling of security than if they had none of these charms; and they never rely upon them in any very trying or dangerous emergency. Indeed, when flying from imminent danger, they will tear off their fetishes and throw them away, to relieve themselves of the incumbrance.

Fetishes are extensively employed to protect property, and to punish offenders. They are made fast to fruit trees, set upon the borders of a farm, or tied around the neck of a goat; by which it is supposed that trespassers will be punished. And so, when any great national law has been adopted, a fetish is made, to punish the offender. But this is more frequently done, when they are too feeble to take the execution of the law into their own hands. The use of fetishes is intimately connected with the belief in witchcraft.

Devil-worship.—The only thing in Western Africa that can strictly be regarded as religious worship, is that which is offered to the spirits of the dead, and usually denominated "Devil- worship." Some of them are regarded as good spirits, and their aid and protection sought, others are considered as evil spirits, and their displeasure deprecated. But it is doubtful whether they have any idea of evil spirits distinct from those which are supposed to have proceeded from wicked men. The presence of some spirits is courted; houses are built for their accommodation, and occasional offerings of food, drink, clothing, and furniture are taken to these houses for their use. They place large quantities of cloth, beads, knives, pipes, tobacco, and ornaments in the coffin, and large articles of furniture around the grave outside, for the use of the dead.

There are also other spirits, whose presence is much dreaded. They are supposed to cause sickness, drought, wars, pestilence, and other forms of national evil; and, in some places, they make offerings to the devil to appease his wrath, and induce him to withdraw the scourge. On the Gold coast, there are stated occasions when the people turn out at night to drive the devil away from town with clubs and torches. At a given signal, the whole community start up, commence a most hideous howling, beat about in every nook and corner of their houses, then rush into the streets like frantic maniacs, beat the air with their clubs, brandish their torches, and scream at the top of their voices. Soon, some one announces that the devil is leaving the town by some particular gate, when they all rush in that direction, and pursue him for miles from the town.

Supposed demoniacal possessions are very common, and the feats performed by those who are believed to be under the influence of these agents, are not unlike those described in the New Testament. Frantic gestures, convulsions, foaming at the mouth, feats of supernatural strength, furious ravings, bodily lacerations, gnashing of the teeth, and other things of a similar nature, characterize all those cases which they regard as being under the influence of evil spirits. But some of these, Mr. Wilson says he found out had been occasioned by the administration of powerful narcotics; and others were the natural results of a highly excited state of the nerves. But there were other exhibitions of feeling and actions, which could scarcely be ascribed to either of these causes. However, we cannot tell what effects may be produced by frequent and violent strain upon the nervous system.

In the beginning, it is not easy to distinguish these possessions from an ordinary attack of disease; and when it is determined to be a possession, it is no easy matter to ascertain what kind of a spirit it is. On the Pongo coast, there are four or five classes of these spirits; and when a man is known to be possessed, he passes through the hands of the priests of these different orders, till some one pronounces it to be a case with which he is acquainted and is able to cure. A temporary house is built dancing commences, a variety of ceremonies are performed, medicines are administered, and after a fortnight spent in this way, night and day, the friends of the invalid furnishing abundance of rum and food for the performers, he is pronounced cured. A house is then built near his own residence, for the accommodation of this outcast devil, who is henceforth to become his tutelar god; and so long as he treats him with proper respect, and obeys the injunctions imposed on him when he was healed, he will do well. But if the disease returns, it is evidence of neglect of duty towards his patron spirit, and the ceremonies must be repeated.

The spirits who are objects of worship in the country, are supposed to inhabit certain great rocks, trees, mountains, rivers, caverns, and groves; and these places are always sacred. They are passed in silence, and not without dropping some kind of offering, if nothing more than a leaf of a tree, or a shell picked up on the beach. To these places they carry offerings of food, drink, cloth, or furniture; but they must be presented by the priest, who pretends to hold intercourse with these spirits. When the priests would make an impression upon the people, one of their own number is concealed in some recess of the grove, or corner of the rock, and answers are given to the questions proposed, but always in an unnatural tone. There is no danger of the exposure of the trick, for no one has courage to venture near the spot, lest a legion of angry spirits should rush out and tear him in pieces. One of these oracles near the mouth of the Cavali river has acquired great celebrity; and it is visited by pilgrims from the distance of nearly 200 miles; and as offerings are always brought, it is a source of considerable revenue to the king of Cavali. It has been visited by several white men, and found to be nothing but a cavern, in which is an echo, that the priests interpret to mean whatever they please, and the people are simple enough to credit the word of men, of whose dishonesty they have daily proofs.

These patron spirits are supposed also to inhabit certain animals, and hence such become sacred. At Fishtown, on the Grain coast, certain monkeys found in the wood about the grave-yard are sacred, because it is thought they are animated by the spirits of their departed friends. At Dixcove, on the Gold coast, the crocodile is sacred. At Papo and Whidah, on the slave coast, a certain kind of snake is sacred. At Calabar and Bonny the shark is sacred, and human victims are occasionally offered to it. At the Gaboon, the natives will not eat the parrot, because it talks, and, as they say, is too much like man; but in reality, perhaps, because they have some suspicion that these birds have the spirits of their forefathers. A certain tiger, at Cape St. Catherine, is also sacred.

These animals have the sagacity to find out that they are not liable to be molested, and therefore appear to be very presuming. The monkeys about Fishtown are quite tame; the alligator at Dixcove will come at call, and follow a man with a white fowl in his hand, to the distance of half a mile from his den; the snake at Papo has become so much domesticated that it may be handled with impunity, and so far trained that it will bite or refrain from biting, according to the pleasure of its keeper. The shark at Benin will come up to the river's edge every day, to see if a victim is prepared for him; and the tiger of St. Catherine will traverse the streets of the village at night, and will burrow somewhere during the day, in the immediate neighborhood, without any apparent apprehension of being disturbed.

The spirits of the dead are supposed to take an active part in the affairs of the world; hence, when in great distress, they go into the woods and call upon them for help, in the most piteous strains. They sometimes send messages to their friends in another world, by one that is about to die. Mr. Wilson says he has known mothers who have shunned their own sons, lest they should use some unfair means to get them out of this world, with the hope that they would do them more service in another. They frequently invoke the spirits of their forefathers, when about to discuss any important matter; and the leading men in the Pongo country rub their foreheads with chalk that has been kept in the skull of some great chief, for the purpose of imbibing his wisdom and courage.

The practice of sacrificing human beings to the manes of the dead, which is more common in Ashantee and Dahomey than any where else, grows out of this belief in a future existence. The victims offered at the death of any member of the royal family, or of any great personage, and which are repeated at stated periods afterwards, are intended to be servants or escorts to such persons in another world. They have no right conceptions of a purely spiritual state of existence, and hence they reason from the visible to the invisible. Although they have no distinct impression of the resurrection, they suppose that their deceased friends have all the bodily wants which they had in this world, and that they would be gratified by the same kind of attentions that would be acceptable here.

A deranged man is regarded as one who has lost his soul, and the same is said of the imbecility of age. In sleep, they suppose it not uncommon for the soul to wander out of the body, and sometimes to come in conflict with other wandering spirits. If a man wakes up in the morning with pains in his bones or muscles, he suspects at once that his spirit has been wandering about in the night, and has received a severe flagellation from some other spirit.

Witchcraft.—Nearly allied to the foregoing, is the universal belief in witchcraft, which is, perhaps, the heaviest curse that rests on Africa, and one of the last evils to be rooted out of the African mind. In its leading and essential features, it does not differ materially from that form of it which prevails in other parts of the world. (See Witchcraft.) A person who professes this art, is supposed to exercise nothing less than omnipotent power, not only over the minds and bodies of his fellow men, but over wild animals and the elements of nature. He can transform himself into a tiger and keep the community in a state of agitation for months or years; he can turn himself into an elephant, and destroy their farms and fruit trees. He can turn another man into an elephant, so that he may be shot by his own father or brother. The wind and the lightning are his agents, and they never fall upon any one but they have been directed by his machinations. It is not known how this mysterious power is acquired. By some it is supposed to be secured by eating a certain kind of leaf in the woods, and by others to be conferred by evil spirits. No very logical proofs are required to show that a man has exercised these extraordinary powers. It is known that he once had a pique at one of his fellow men, and because this man happened to die the same day that an elephant was killed, he is suspected of having turned him into that elephant, and so arranged every thing that he should be put to death. A thunder storm passes over a village, a house is struck with lightning, and some one is killed. The whole community is thrown into the most direful agitation. The inquiry is raised, "Who brought the lightning down upon that man?" the meaning of which is little else than "Who had a grudge against him?" The friends and family of the deceased have the right to single out the person and require him to drink the "redwood draught." This is a sure and infallible test of guilt or innocence. No man can hesitate submitting to it, without acknowledging his guilt. This draught is a decoction made from the inner bark of a large forest tree, called by the Grebos, gian, and by the Ashantecs, adum. The bark is pounded in a mortar, and then thrown into a pot of water until the strength is extracted, when it is drawn off for use. Its appearance is like the water of a tan vat, and it is both astringent and narcotic, and when taken in large quantities, it acts as an emetic. The accused, before he takes the draught, makes confession of all the evil deeds he has committed in his past life, and then invokes God to make "redwood draught" kill him if he is guilty of the crime with which he is charged, but if he is innocent to let it pass off without harm. He is required to drink more or less according to circumstances. If he vomits freely, he is declared innocent. But if otherwise, he is the more strongly suspected, an additional portion is administered, and if death follows, it seals his guilt. The greatest indignities are then heaped upon his body, sometimes even before life is extinct. Women and children are summoned, and required to beat, kick, and spit upon it; and even the friends and relatives of the victim have to join in these outrages, or else they are suspected of participating in his crime. And besides this, the family are heavily fined, and it is a long time before the stain upon their character is wiped out.

On the other hand, if the accused comes off clear it is the occasion of great exultation. He is washed, decked out in his best, and parades the streets with no little pride and complacency. He receives presents from all his friends, and the party who accused him wrongfully are mulcted in a large sum. But a man who has drank this portion once, is not entirely exempt from it in the future.

The use of the "redwood draught" is not entirely confined to the case of persons suspected of witchcraft. It is used as a punishment for some other crimes; and when it is the determination of those who administer it to kill the man, it can be forced upon him in such quantities as to insure the result. This mode of punishment appears to have been adopted for the purpose of exonerating the administrators of justice from the responsibility of putting men to death in cases of doubtful guilt. They say it was the "redwood" that killed him; and it is the general impression that the "redwood" has in itself the discrimination to detect guilt; and thus the people exonerate themselves from the tedious process of searching out evidence. They never assign any reason for the use of this ordeal, except that their fathers did it, and because of the many marvelous stories they can tell of the wonderful feats of this mysterious agency.

A different article is used in Lower Guinea for this ordeal. It is a small shrub with a red root, from which the decoction is made, called by the Mpongwe people nkazya. This is a diuretic and narcotic; and if it operates freely as the former, and does not affect the brain to produce delirium, the man is considered innocent; but if it produces vertigo, he is guilty. Small sticks are laid on the ground, a few feet apart, and after having taken the draught, he is required to step over them. If he does this without difficulty, he is innocent; but, if he fancies they are great logs, and raises his feet high to get over them, he is, of course, guilty. The quantity in this case is not more than half a pint; but in the other it is half a gallon or a gallon.

The natives on the Grain Coast have another, called the "hot oil ordeal," which is used to detect petty thefts, and in cases where women are suspected of infidelity to their husbands. The suspected person is required to plunge the hand into a pot of boiling oil. If it is withdrawn without pain, he is innocent. If he suffers pain, he is guilty, and is fined or punished as the case may require.

Traditions.—Although the Africans have no knowledge of letters, they have a great deal of what may be called unwritten literature, in the form of legends, traditions, fables, and proverbial sayings. Their fables are highly dramatic, animals being made to act and speak with life and naturalness. They have several traditions, which would seem to have been derived from the Bible. They believe in the common origin of the human race, and have a curious legend to account for the difference between the white and black man, for which see Ashantee and Gold Coast. They have traditions also of a deluge and of the advent of the Saviour, but coupled with much that is extravagant and gross.

Among all the tribes of both Upper and Lower Guinea, there are many unmistakeable traces of Judaism. The existence of twelve families in most of the large communities on the coast; the extreme care taken to keep them distinct; the rigid interdiction of marriages between members of the same family; and various other customs, show that they have views akin to those of the Israelites. On the Gold Coast, they divide time into weeks, have their lucky and unlucky days, and observe the new moons with as much interest as the Israelites. Circumcision is practiced among all the tribes in Western Africa, with the exception of those on the Grain Coast; and the neglect of it exposes a man to much ridicule. The practice of sprinkling the blood of animals, as they invariably do, on the door-posts of their houses, and about the places where their fetishes are kept, would seem to indicate a Jewish origin. In the house of the chief-priest, there is usually an altar with two horns, and criminals fly to it and lay hold of these horns, as the Jews did of old, and no one can remove them but the chief-priest himself. They have their stated ablutions and their purifications; they shave their heads and wear the poorest kind of clothes as marks of mourning. At the funerals, the women are the chief mourners, and the time of mourning corresponds with that of the Jews.

Funerals.—African funerals are attended with great pomp and display. The corpse is washed, painted, and decked out in the grandest style. It is then laid on boards, or in a rude coffin, in a conspicuous place, during the funeral ceremonies, which occupy the greater part of the day; the character depending upon the standing of the man. At an early hour, the friends and townsmen of the deceased assemble in a circle, in front of the house. A bullock tied by the fore feet is brought to be slaughtered in honor of the dead. Every visitor is expected to bring some kind of present, to be laid in or beside the coffin. The male relatives and others, to the number sometimes of forty or fifty, get within the circle, and keep up a rapid discharge of muskets for hours. When the ceremonies have been continued long enough, as they suppose, to gratify the dead man, two bearers take the coffin on their heads to carry it to the burying ground. But sometimes the dead refuses to go, and the bearers are whirled round, first one way and then another, and finally run back into the town. Some one then comes and soothes and coaxes the dead man to consent to be carried to the grave yard. The bearers start off again in a trot; but before they get out of town, they are violently forced against some man's house, which is an accusation that the owner has been accessory to his death; and he is forthwith arrested and subjected to the red-wood ordeal. After some delay, the corpse is deposited at the usual place of burial, and the bearers run and plunge themselves into the water. The female relatives assemble morning and evening to mourn for the dead, for one month; after which they wash themselves, put aside all the badges of mourning, and resume their wonted duties. The wives of the dead man are then divided among the brothers of the deceased; but before they enter upon this new arrangement they are permitted to go and visit their respective families.

MISSIONS.

Many of the efforts hitherto made to introduce the gospel into West Africa, it is well known, have been singularly disastrous. The United Brethren directed their attention to the Gold Coast as early as 1736; but after repeated attempts to establish themselves at Christiansborg, extending through a period of nearly forty years, and after eleven of their number had fallen by the diseases incident to the climate, they relinquished the undertaking as impracticable and hopeless. In 1795 two missionaries were sent to Sierra Leone by the English Baptist Missionary Society; but, owing to the indiscretion of one and the ill-health of the other, the enterprise was abandoned. In the following year three societies, the Scottish Missionary Society, the London Missionary Society, and the Glasgow Missionary Society,—made a joint effort to establish a mission among the Foulahs; but this plan was defeated by the combined agency of disease and dissension; and the only one of six laborers who promised to accomplish anything, was cruelly murdered. Two years later (1797) the Glasgow Missionary Society attempted to introduce the gospel among the Timnehs, and sent out two missionaries for this purpose; but they were grievously disappointed in the character of their agents. And even those societies which have been able to maintain their position till the present time, have suffered frequently and severely from the loss of valued missionaries. The hope may be indulged, however, that a better acquaintance with the diseases of West Africa will cause a diminution in the number of deaths. The occasional return of missionaries to their native land is already proving highly beneficial. It may be found also, as many expect, that a residence upon the hills and mountains of the interior will be comparatively free from danger. But whatever may be the obstacles, the gospel must be carried to all parts of Africa, in obedience to the Saviour's last command; and we may encourage ourselves with the hope that "Ethiopia shall soon stretch out her hands unto God."

CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—This society sent missionaries to the Susoo country in 1804; but one of them left the service, and the other, Mr. Renner, remained as chaplain at Sierra Leone. In 1806, Messrs. Bretscher and Prasse, with Mr. Renner, went to the Susoo country, and met with a friendly reception from several chiefs; and a trader named Curtis gave Mr. Renner a house and garden, in a pleasant location, on condition that he would teach his children. Messrs. Bretscher and Prasse built a house at another town called Fantimania, further up the country. Soon after, Mr. Prasse died. This station was reinforced in 1809, by the arrival of Messrs. Barnett and Wenzel; but Mr. Barnett soon after died of fever.

Supposing that the slave trade had exerted such an influence upon the adults that there was no hope of doing them any good, they did not attempt to preach, but confined their efforts to the children, thus erroneously limiting the power of the gospel. Some of the children they ransomed from slavery, and others they supported. In 1810, Mr. Bretscher had thirty boys in a school-house, which he had built; and Mrs. Renner had a school of twenty-eight girls, all neatly dressed in frocks and gowns, made with their own hands. But they were often much straitened. At one time, they could not even buy a basket of rice, and they had not provisions for a fortnight. But Fananda, a chief about 40 miles distant, who had been educated in England, being applied to, offered to thresh two tons of rice for them, leaving them to pay when they could, assuring them that he looked more to the good object they had in view than to the money. But they met with much opposition from the slave-traders, who feared the effect of Christianizing the natives, upon their inhuman traffic, which exerted a most debasing influence on the people: thus in effect making gain of the souls as well as the bodies of men.

In 1813, Mr. Bretscher visited England, and returning with his wife and seven other persons, was shipwrecked with the loss of $13,000 worth of stores. A new station was now commenced on the Rio Dembia, called Gambier, and one had been recently established on the Bullom shore.

At Canoffee a church had been erected, and on the 7th of August, 1815, 50 children were baptized. But by the arrival of a slaver, every thing was thrown into confusion, the mission premises, school-house, and church at Bashia were burnt, and the missionaries compelled to leave, saving nothing but a single trunk and a bed, Mrs. Meisner being taken into the field, from a sick bed, in a blanket. Other indignities were heaped upon the missionaries, and they were threatened with death. They, however, escaped to Canoffee.

On the 13th of February, 1815, Rev. J. O. Sperrhacker and wife, and four other persons arrived as a reinforcement; but Mr. S. was removed by death soon after his arrival, and several other missionaries fell victims to the yellow fever.

In January, 1816, Rev. Edward Bickersteth, secretary of the society, visited the mission; and in view of the repeated fires, and violent opposition of the people, he directed the station at Bashia to be abandoned. He also brought about a change of policy in the mission; reminding the missionaries that their great business was to preach the gospel, and inducing them to make the attempt. But in consequence of the continued hostility of the dealers in human flesh, the stations among the Susoos and the Bulloms were both broken up, and the missionaries and most of their pupils retired within the colony.

After the abolition of the slave trade, a great number of negroes with hundreds of children, were rescued from slave ships, and settled in different parts of the country, and fed and clothed at the expense of the government. To provide for these children, the Church Missionary Society obtained a grant of land at Leicester Mountain, and erected the necessary buildings for what was called the "Christian Institution." This was afterwards changed into a sort of college, where a superior education might be given to the most promising youths, to qualify them to labor as missionaries, or to fill important stations in the Colony. Some years afterwards, the establishment was removed to Regent's Town, and subsequently to Fourah Bay. The missionaries also established schools for the children of the recaptured slaves, in their different villages, in which they were countenanced and assisted by the government. The preaching of the gospel was also commenced among the adults, and in many instances crowned with great success.

When these people were brought together at Regent's Town, in 1813, they were in a most deplorable condition. In 1816, about 1100 congregated at that place, from almost every tribe in that part of the continent. A church had been erected, and much improvement made in their condition. In June, of that year, Mr. Johnson was appointed to the care of Regent's Town; but the aspect of things appeared discouraging. Natives of 22 different nations were collected together, mostly taken from the holds of slave-ships. They were in a state of continual hostility, with no means of communicating with each other, but a little broken English. When clothing was given them, they would sell it, or throw it away. None of them lived in the married state, but they herded together like brutes. From ten to twenty of them were crowded together in a single hut. Many of them were ghastly as skeletons, and six or eight of them sometimes died in a day. Only six children were born in a year. Superstition tyrannized over their minds, and there was little desire for instruction. Hardly any land was cultivated by them. Some would live by themselves in the woods, and others subsisted by thieving and plunder. Many of them would prefer any kind of refuse meat to the rations they received from Government.

So many negroes continued to arrive from slave vessels, that Mr. Johnson had to issue rations twice a week for a thousand persons. He was greatly tried with their indifference, when he attempted to preach Christ to them, and was often on the point of giving up in discouragement. But he soon began to see that his labors were not in vain. The people were beginning to improve in appearance and manners. Their natural indolence began to give place to habits of industry. Those who had lived in the woods came and asked for lots in the town, which was now regularly laid out in streets, and built upon with avidity. The church, which originally contained 500, was five times enlarged, in the course of a few years.

In the course of a year from the commencement of Mr. Johnson's labors, an astonishing progress was made. One evening, when he was praying, and was much cast down, a young man followed him and said, "Massa, me want to speak about my heart. For some time my heart bad too much. When I lie down, or get up, or eat or drink, me thinks about sins committed in my own country, and since me came to Regent's Town; and me dont know what to do." He was pointed to the "Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." The next week, several more came on the same errand. And from this time, the work of grace made progress. Young persons were seen retiring to the woods for prayer, and little groups assembled by moonlight to chant the praises of the Redeemer. Both old and young appeared anxious to be instructed in the way of salvation. Polygamy, greegrees, and the worship of the devil, were universally abandoned. In April, 1818, when Mr. Johnson sailed for England, the number of communicants was 263. All the people were decently clothed, and most of the females had learned to make their own apparel. About 400 couples were married. Their heathen customs were laid aside; and for a year before Mr. J. left, not an oath had been heard, nor a solitary case of drunkenness witnessed by him. The schools contained upwards of 500 scholars, and an equal number regularly attended church every day, at morning and evening prayers; while the average attendance at public worship on the Sabbath was from 1200 to 1300.

At this time, the town contained 19 streets, made plain and level, with good roads round the town. A large stone church rose in the midst of the habitations; a government house, parsonage, hospital, school-houses, store-houses, a bridge of several arches, some native houses, and other dwellings, all of stone, were finished or in process of erection. Gardens, fenced, were attached to every dwelling. All the land in the immediate neighborhood was under cultivation, producing a profusion of vegetables and fruits, and about 75 of the natives had learned various trades.

The parting of the natives with Mr. Johnson was very affecting. Hundreds, of both sexes, followed him five miles to Freetown, and on his embarkation, said, "Massa, suppose no water live here, we go with you all the way, till no feet more move!"

After his departure, a mortal sickness broke out in the settlement, which carried off many of the people, as well as several of the devoted friends and agents of the society. Mr. Wilhelm took charge of the station, during Mr. Johnson's absence. On the 31st of January, 1820, Mr. Johnson arrived at Freetown, on his return. The news of his arrival soon reached Regent's Town, and a number of the people came down that night, and many more in the morning, and he says he never in his life shook hands with so many persons in one day. The joy of the people was beyond all bounds. In 1822, his wife returned to England, in a feeble state of health; and in 1823, he embarked for England to meet her; but on the way, was seized with a violent fever, of which he died.

The society, at this time, had stations at Bathurst, Charlotte, Gloucester, Kent, Leopold, Waterloo, Wilberforce, and York, villages of recaptured Africans; in several of which, their efforts were crowned with success similar to that at Regent's Town, particularly at Gloucester, under Rev. Mr. Düring, where the work of grace and the general improvement were quite as remarkable.

The committee of the society attribute the distinguished success of these two missionaries, under God, to their tender, affectionate spirit. They say that the parental spirit is that which is alone likely to influence a people in the circumstances of the liberated Africans. "The magisterial spirit, which, in its mildest actings, must still tend to coercion and restraint, will repel and shut up the minds of men who have known little of Europeans, but as tyrants and oppressors." Sir Charles McCarthy, who visited them in 1821, states that some of them had "all the appearance and regularity of the neatest village in England, with a church, a school, and a commodious residence for the missionaries and teachers, though in 1817 they had not been more than thought of."

Having thus given a sketch of the early history of this mission, instead of following it in detail during the succeeding thirty years, we shall give a topical notice of its general progress, with the most prominent points of interest, down to the present time.

Reverses, for want of Laborers.—For a number of years, the mission experienced sad reverses in the loss of many of its most valued missionaries. By a mortal sickness prevailing in Sierra Leone, and by disasters at sea, in the short space of seven or eight months, in the spring and summer of 1823, the society lost no less than fourteen of its friends and fellow laborers, eleven of whom were missionaries and their wives, and among them, Rev. Mr. Johnson, who died at sea, as before stated, and Rev. Mr. Düring and Mrs. Düring, who perished, as was supposed, by shipwreck, the vessel in which they sailed for England never having been heard of. The following year, the mission was reinforced by the addition of seven new laborers; but before the close of the next year, an equal number was removed by death, and three others returned home. The following year, six returned home, and three were removed by death. And for several years, the loss of health and the death of missionaries were most discouraging. In some instances, this mortality could be traced to excessive labor, soon after arriving in the country. The society appointed a medical committee, who entered into an examination of the subject, and reported a precautionary plan, which was adopted, with good effect, in succeeding years. They also adopted the rule of allowing all their missionaries to return to England once in six years, in order to recover from the debilitating effects of the climate.

In consequence of this loss of laborers, the affairs of the mission were thrown into great confusion. Regent's Town was, for two or three years after the death of Mr. Johnson, destitute of a resident clergyman, and the attendance upon public worship on the Sabbath had fallen off to about 250; and the Christian Institution, for want of instructors, was quite deserted. In 1826, Mr. Betts gives a deplorable account of the state of things at this station; and similar reverses were experienced at other places, most of the stations having been left to the care of native assistants, who had not yet acquired the ability and experience necessary for assuming such responsibilities.

There was a general falling off of attendance on public worship, and loss of interest in Divine things. Yet, most of the communicants remained steadfast, though suffering some decline of interest. The society made great efforts to supply the deficiency of laborers; and for a time, there was no lack of self-devotion, on the part of missionary candidates, who were willing to enter the breach. But the loss of valuable lives was appalling. At length, however, this frightful mortality in a measure ceased; and, as soon as the stations were supplied with missionaries, they began to revive, and to advance with a steady progress, which has continued, with slight interruptions, to the present time.

Evils of Connection with Government.—As in South Africa, so here, the connection of the missions with the Government, has proved a serious evil. Although the Government were influenced by the kindest intentions, yet the connection proved a constant source of embarrassment. Its relations to the Church Missionary Society were two-fold: first, in regard to the ministry; and second, in the management of education. In 1823 or 1824, an arrangement was made between the Society and the Secretary of State for the Colonial Department, by which they were to take upon themselves the preparation and support of all the English clergymen of the colony, subject to the approval of the Secretary; while the Government should provide for the education of the inhabitants, in the country parishes, and erect houses of worship, and provide houses and gardens for the residence of the clergymen and teachers.

In 1827, the Governor of the Colony introduced some new regulations, considerably affecting the Society's proceedings, as well as its relation to the government. The villages of liberated Africans were formed into three divisions: The RIVER DISTRICT, comprising, Kissy, Wellington, Allen Town, Hastings, Waterloo and Calmont, all lying to the south-east of Freetown; the CENTRAL, or MOUNTAIN DISTRICT, on the eastern border of the colony, on the Bunce river, and the Timneh country; the WESTERN or SEA DISTRICT, comprising York, Kent, and the Bananas. This regulation was approved by the Society. Another regulation, which was also approved, relieved the missionaries of the civil superintendence of the settlements; this office having been found burdensome and embarrassing to the mission.

In August, 1826, Gov. Campbell, thinking that he could place the education of the liberated African children on a more economical footing, and to give them early habits of industry, directed that the boys should not be kept in school beyond the age of ten or twelve years; after which, they should be distributed among the liberated adults, to be actively employed. The missionaries were released from the charge of the schools, except occasional inspection, and natives were appointed to conduct them.

This arrangement greatly diminished the attendance on the schools; and the missionaries afterwards finding that they could exert no beneficial influence upon the schools, broke off all connection with them, and established schools of their own.

The missionaries at Freetown greatly deplored the obstacles to the due performance of their spiritual duties, which had arisen out of their connection with the Government; and contrasted their circumstances unfavorably with those of the Wesleyans, who were not hampered with any such connection.

The Government not having fulfilled their part of the arrangement respecting the support of religion, by which they agreed to furnish houses of public worship and dwellings for the clergy, the society applied, in 1846, for a termination of the arrangement, which was agreed to; and the Committee believed the change would facilitate the operations of the Society.

Sierra Leone, as a Nursery of Missionaries for the Interior.—The missionaries regard the collection of persons from so many different tribes in the interior, at Sierra Leone, as a providential arrangement for the supply of laborers for the evangelization of Africa; and, with this in view, they have directed their efforts both to the education of native helpers, and to the acquisition of the languages of the different tribes represented in the colony.

The work of reducing these languages to writing was commenced as early as 1829, and has been steadily prosecuted ever since. The society's report for 1853 says that some progress had been made in this department during the year. A Timneh English Dictionary had been prepared by Mr. Schlenker; and the Epistle to the Romans had been translated into that language by Mr. Schmid. Rev. S. W. Köelle had completed his grammar of the Vei and Bornu languages. He has also prepared specimens, consisting of 250 words and short sentences, translated into 200 different languages or dialects, showing that no fewer than 200 different nations, speaking 150 different languages, besides numerous dialects of the same, have their representatives in Sierra Leone. These tribes or nations lie along 4,000 miles of coast, beginning from beyond the Senegal, in the north, to the Portuguese settlements, south of the line. They extend in the interior through the whole course of the Niger, from its sources in the mountains behind Sierra Leone to its estuaries, comprising Timbuctoo, the emporium of African commerce, and the vast provinces subdued by the Mohammedan Foulahs, besides numerous small tribes. And even southern Africa has also its representatives. There are those in Sierra Leone who can tell of their native towns in that part of the southern continent which has been hitherto a perfect blank on the maps, which require a day or more to pass from one end to the other. They also tell of broad and deep rivers, of nations of tall and strongly-built warriors, of savage cannibals, and of peaceable and generous nomadic hunters. "Their breasts heave with emotion when a friendly inquiry is made respecting their fatherland, and appeal in fervid language and moving eloquence to those who possess the best gift of God to a fallen world."

The Africans generally entertain a strong affection for their native land; and when Christianized they manifest an earnest desire that their own countrymen should partake of the same benefits. The evangelization and education of these liberated Africans will, therefore, furnish the agency required to carry the gospel to the interior. And it has been ascertained that the gospel message is readily received from their lips by their countrymen. In a number of tours to the interior, undertaken by the missionaries, they have discovered a desire for the gospel, and a willingness to listen to it, from their friends, who have learned it in the colony. It appears, also, that the fact of these friends having been liberated, provided for and educated, by the English, has created a favorable impression upon the native tribes, and prepared them to receive the missionaries with open arms. In view of this state of things, much progress has been made in reducing the different languages of the interior to writing, and preparing the way for future missionary operations.

Education.—Schools have been maintained at all the stations, from the commencement. And the high school, already noticed, has been sustained with various degrees of efficiency, until the present time. A few years ago, extensive buildings were erected, and it now holds the relation of a college to the other educational institutions of the colony. Religious instruction is made prominent in all the studies and exercises. The report of the Principal, Rev. E. Jones, for the year 1852, presents an interesting view of the advancing character of the studies prosecuted by the students, and the increasing importance of the institution. During the year two of the students were sent to the Yoruba mission, and three appointed to labor in the colony. The number remaining at the close of the year, was 17.

In 1843, a grammar school was organized, as an intermediate step between the village schools and the Christian Institution. In this school it was intended to give a sound religious and general education to boys and youths who have received some previous training in the lower schools; and those who give proof of suitable dispositions and qualifications, will be admitted into the Christian Institution. The report of this school for 1852, was highly satisfactory. The number of pupils was 73.

A high school for females has also been established, which in 1852 was in a flourishing condition, containing 26 pupils, of whom 15 were boarders, and in their report for that year, the directors of the society say that their village schools present a peculiarly hopeful character.

Native Agency.—It has been a leading object with the Society, from the first, to train up a native agency. As early as 1820, two young men, while pursuing their studies, visit ed their countrymen evenings and Sundays, to teach them the gospel; in 1822, both of them had charge of stations, and were doing well. During the trying period alluded to, when the Society was deprived of so many of its missionaries by death, many of the stations and even the Christian Institution, were left wholly to the charge of natives. In 1827, the Committee tried the experiment of educating two African youths in England, under the care of a clergyman.

But in 1829, the missionaries express their deep concern at the numerous disappointments which they had met with in their expectations of raising up efficient native assistants; and at one time, a correspondence was opened with the Episcopal church in the United States, with the design of procuring persons of color competent to act as missionaries.

Yet in their report for 1838, the Committee present a more cheering aspect of this subject. They say that the native assistants, proceeding generally from the Institution at Fourah Bay, increase in efficiency. In 1844, they say the prospect of reaching the point at which they have all along aimed in this matter was never before so encouraging. Some of them were found qualified to go forth to distant stations in the interior, with the entire confidence of the missionaries. One of them named Samuel Crouther, was torn from his country and kindred in early life, and consigned to the hold of a Portuguese slaver; rescued by a British cruiser; and carried into Sierra Leone, where he received Christian training, first in a village school, and afterwards in the Fourah Bay Institution. His course was satisfactory and consistent; and as he appeared to possess qualifications for the ministry, he was sent to England, where he completed his education at the Society's Institution in Islington, and was afterwards ordained by the Bishop of London, and sent by the Society to Sierra Leone with the intention of his being employed as a missionary to the Yoruba country, of which he was a native. In 1850, two other native Africans, Messrs. Nicol and Matthews, were ordained by the Bishop of London, and sent out by the Society.

In the report for 1852, the Committee say, that many of the stations formerly under the care of European missionaries, have now been placed in charge of natives, with occasional European superintendence. The whole of the Mountain district had been, for the last year, under the superintendence of one European missionary, and had kept up its character for regular attendance upon the means of grace. Mr. Denton writes from Sierra Leone in 1852, that Mr. Crouther had visited and preached in all the Mountain churches, and that his sermons had been deeply interesting and profitable to the people. On any point, where there was the least danger of misapprehension, he had recourse to his native language, and thus rendered Gospel truth clear and plain to their understandings.

Translations.—It is an interesting fact that the work of translation of the Scriptures into the Bullom language, was commenced previous to the year 1818, by a native, Mr. George Caulker, a chief at the Plantain Islands. In 1820, he had completed the book of Genesis, and was proceeding with the Psalms and New Testament. He had also translated the Prayer Book. He belongs to one of the principal families in Sherbro, and was educated in England.

In 1837, arrangements were made for carrying on the work of translation with vigor, and portions of Scripture and elementary works have been translated, by different missionaries, into the Timneh, Haussa, Yoruba, and Susa languages, and in some of them the Liturgy. Thus is the way preparing for the more efficient prosecution of the missionary work in the interior.

Character and Ability of the Natives.—Rev. Mr. Düring says, "six years' experience has taught me that Africans can learn any thing. I have seen them rise from the chains of the slave dealer, to become industrious men and women, faithful subjects, pious Christians, affectionate husbands and wives, tender fathers and mothers, and peaceable neighbors." But cautions are given against elevating them too suddenly, as in this way they rise so high in their estimation of themselves, that they prove useless in the end.

Calls for Instruction.—The calls for instruction from every quarter, are beyond the means of the society to supply; and petitions come in from the inhabitants of the villages, and from distant tribes, pleading earnestly for missionaries. One of the newly arrived missionaries relates that, on his way from Freetown to Gloucester, there were many children on the road, who, when they saw him as he passed, said one to another, "New white man—new Mission!" and all exclaimed, "THANK GOD!"

Missionary Tours.—The missionaries have been, for a number of years, in the practice of making tours among the neighboring tribes, and into the interior, for the purpose of exploring the country, and ascertaining where openings exist for missionary labor. In most cases, they find the people ready to listen with eagerness to the preaching of the Gospel, and the chiefs desirous of receiving missionaries. Their journals, however, furnish many painful proofs of the sufferings entailed on the interior of Africa, by the foreign slave trade. The petty warfare, which is carried on between the chiefs, with all its attendant cruelties, may almost always be traced to that cause.

At the close of 1848, Captain Forbes, of the English ship "Bonetta," informed the missionaries that, near Cape Mount, he had met with individuals of an African tribe, which possessed a written language, and that he had brought with him some of their books, and a man who could read them. This created a lively interest at Sierra Leone, as it had been generally asserted and believed that, among one hundred and fifty languages of Africa, not one had been raised by the natives to a written language. In the hope that this discovery might be improved to the furtherance of the Gospel, Mr. Köelle was immediately sent by the local committee at Sierra Leone, to visit the tribe, and investigate the circumstances respecting the language. He made the tour in about four months, at the cost of much suffering from privation and illness. He discovered that the art of writing was of recent invention, and confined to the single tribe of Vei, on the coast. The writing is syllabic, about two hundred characters representing all the syllables in the language. Mr. K. found the inventor, who lived about twenty miles in the interior. He was a man about forty years of age, of great intelligence and much religious feeling. He had learned the Roman alphabet, from an American missionary, when a child. He stated that, after he was grown up, and about sixteen years previous to Mr. K.'s visit, he received the first impulse to express his language in writing from a dream. He told the dream to a few of his companions, who assisted him to invent the characters, and to procure, through the favor of the chief of his tribe, the means of establishing schools, and teaching the people. But war soon broke out, the town was destroyed by fire, the tribe depressed and dispersed, and they had had no schools since. Yet, in the chief town, all the grown up people were able to read, and in all the towns, there were some who could read. They had a considerable number of books, on various subjects; but the religion found in them was mainly Mohammedan. In consequence of this report, it was determined, as soon as the way should be opened, to establish a mission among the Vei tribe.

General Improvement.—The general improvement of the natives, and of the country as a consequence, has, from the beginning, steadily kept pace with the prosperity of the mission.

In 1821, Mr. Johnson writes that the gentlemen of Freetown were so fully convinced of the good effects produced by the preaching of the gospel, that they publicly confessed that, above all other institutions, the mission had proved the most beneficial to Africa, and acknowledged that the gospel was the only efficient means of civilizing the heathen. The same year, the experiment was tried of calling the natives from the Christian villages to serve on juries at the colonial sessions; and the result was so satisfactory, that the practice was continued; and the chief-justice observed that, ten years before, when the population was only 4,000, there were forty cases on the calendar for trial, while at that time, with a population of 16,000, there were only six, and not a single case from any village that was under the superintendence of a missionary or a school-master.

The Work of Grace.—From the time that the truth began to be fairly understood by these people, the work of divine grace on their hearts has been noticed by the missionaries, in their reports, from year to year. Mr. Gerber writes from Kent, in 1826: "Since the beginning of last month, there has arisen among the inhabitants of this settlement not only a longing after the bread of life, but also, a continued inquiry after the way of salvation; and, instead of being annoyed, as formerly, with settling daily palavers, and silencing noisy school children at night, I am now rejoiced with different prayer-meetings in the town, and by the school-children singing at night, and before day-break in the morning." This is but a specimen of the notices, which frequently occur in the journals of the missionaries, evincing the special presence of the Holy Spirit, in awakening, convincing; and converting the people, so recently turned from the most debasing heathenism.

Character of Converts.—The fruits of divine grace are manifest in the character of the converts. The committee, speaking of the accounts given of them by Mr. Johnson, say that this gracious influence is manifest in their acknowledgment of the hand of Providence in bringing them from their own country; in the manner in which convictions of sin are awakened or deepened; in the conflicts of the Christian mind; in their sense of the divine forbearance and mercy; in a watchful jealousy over the state of their hearts; in their faith and patience under afflictions; and in their cultivation of domestic happiness.

And, in regard to their feelings and conduct toward each other, Mrs. Jesty writes, "They dwell in love, and live a life of prayer and praise, to Him who loved them, and gave himself for them. The hearts of many of them seem to be full of the love of Christ the whole day; and when merry, they sing Psalms. Such vocal music resounds from all parts of the town. A dispute is seldom known among them. Their benevolence was especially manifested, on the arrival of new cargoes of liberated Africans, taken from the slave ships. Formerly, their chief interest was, to know whether any of their relatives were among them. But after the love of God entered their hearts, they would rush to the landing, and seizing the poor, famished creatures, bear them off on their shoulders to their own dwellings, and take care of them as tenderly as if they had been their own near relations. They also attended prayer-meetings, took part in the exercises, and generally maintained family worship. Mr. Norman writes from Regent's Town, in 1821: "A spirit of prayer is poured out on the people in a remarkable manner; so that we find, as we pass through the streets, on returning from evening school, that almost every house is become a house of prayer." And Mr. Johnson says, the same year, "Family prayer is observed by all the communicants, and by some who have not yet been admitted to the Lord's table, in their respective houses."

Twenty years, or more, after this, Rev. J. F. Sessing, in speaking of the character of some of these converts who had emigrated to Jamaica, in the West Indies, says: "They can read and write, both males and females. They work nine hours a day, and are most conscientious in the discharge of their duties. In order to find time to cultivate their own grounds, they commence their labor at 5 A. M.; and yet, early as they go to work, they never leave home without first collectively singing a hymn, and offering up a prayer for protection and guidance during the day; and they never retire in the evening, without doing the same."

The Sabbath is strictly observed by the native Christians, and to a great extent, by the people generally, who have come under Christian instruction; though at some places, there is great complaint of a relapse, in this respect. It is stated that, in 1845 two captains of vessels landed at a village of about 500 inhabitants, where no missionary or catechist resided, in order to purchase poultry; but the people would not sell on the Lord's day. The people of Abbeokuta go a long distance to market, and travel in large parties for protection against kidnappers. An interval of seventeen days elapses between one market day and another; so that if they lose the day, they must wait for another. And yet, notwithstanding these difficulties, the converts determined not to travel on the Sabbath, though they ran the risk of having to travel in small companies and of losing their market day.

The reports of the missionaries abound in accounts of the expression of pious feeling, on the part of the natives, couched in simple language, yet corresponding with the experience of true Christians in all ages; also, in a variety of personal narratives of thrilling interest, and of peaceful and happy deaths; which, however, it is impossible for us to give in detail. One of the communicants at Kent, who had been torn from his kindred and country in childhood, and suffered great hardships on board the slave ships, declared that his compassion for the man who kidnapped him was so great, and his desire for his salvation so strong, that, when thinking of it, he could not sleep at night.

Church Discipline.—Church discipline is strictly maintained in the native churches of the Society in Sierra Leone. Any palpable inconsistency in a professed member of the church is noticed and reproofed; and, if not corrected, the person is removed from the list of members. This, under God, is often made the means of bringing the careless or disobedient to a better mind. In most congregations, there is a "backsliders' class," who are under instruction and probation, previous to their re-admission.

Remaining Superstitions.—With a people so recently raised from the lowest depths of superstition, it is not surprising to find them sometimes returning to their former habits, or retaining, in their ignorance, some of their old ideas. Among the things earliest associated with the African mind, is, a disposition to trust in charms, or greegrees, as they call them. One missionary says he believes all the inhabitants of the colony would press to the baptismal font, if they might be allowed to regard it merely as the best of all greegrees; and communicants have been found wearing their greegrees at the communion table. Yet, this is not to be wondered at, when we consider that the same thing is encouraged, in a different form, by the greater portion of nominal Christians, and even by some Protestants.

Desire for the Word of God.—Mr. Kissling says, "As soon as the natives can put letters together to form syllables, and syllables to form words, they are anxious to get a Bible; and, if attending our places of worship, a Prayer Book also. Nor is it from mere curiosity that they desire it. Many, I am sure, use them in private as well as in church; and when assembled around their family altar, and by the side of the sick, and on their visits to their heathen countrymen." During the eight years ending May, 1838, 2860 copies of the Scriptures had been issued, and most of them paid for. In 1846, Mr. Beale writes: "Seven years ago, a large stock of Scriptures was always on hand; but latterly, as fast as they have arrived, they have been purchased by eager applicants. The last two shipments were hailed by the people with peculiar joy. They completely beset my house, and within a fortnight after each arrival, nearly the whole of the smaller Bibles, 1500 in number, were exhausted."

Missionary Spirit.—The native Christians manifest an earnest desire to impart the word of life to their destitute countrymen; and in order to cultivate this spirit, the missionaries, at an early period, organized missionary associations at the stations, and took up regular contributions. These societies hold anniversary meetings, at which addresses are made by the natives, as well as by the missionaries. Collections, respectable in amount, have been reported from these auxiliaries every year. In 1851, the amount collected at one station was £123 5s. 8d. This amount was given by 134 communicants and fifty candidates, including £30 ~ 2s. 6d. from 150 children in school.

Timneh (or Timmanee) Mission.—In the autumn of 1840, an expedition was sent into the Timneh country, and it was ascertained that a favorable opening existed for preaching the Gospel; and Rev. C. F. Schlenker and Messrs. N. Denton and W. C. Thompson were set apart for the work, and entered upon their labors. The location fixed upon for the mission was Port Lokkoh, (which see.) The missionaries devoted themselves to translations, schools, and preaching the Gospel; but at the latest dates nothing of special interest had occurred. The people are Mohammedans; and "that pernicious system," says Mr. Schmid, "appears to present a most formidable barrier against the reception of Christian truth." The station is now under the charge of a native teacher, and Mr. Schmid visits it once a quarter, inspects the school, and preaches to the natives.

Yoruba Mission.—We have already alluded to the early history and ordination of Rev. Samuel Crowther, a native African. On the 3d of December, 1843, Mr. Crowther preached in English, his first sermon in Africa, in the Mission church, Freetown, which excited great interest. On the 9th of January following, he established a service at the same place in Yoruba, his native language. The novelty of the occasion brought together a large number of people, Yorubas, Ibos, Calabas, &c. The service was continued, Mr. T. King officiating after Mr. Crowther left.

For a considerable time previous, there had been a movement among the liberated Africans of the Yoruba tribe, towards their native land. For the purpose of making arrangements to enable them to carry the Gospel with them, Mr. Townsend visited their country, arriving in January, 1843, at Abbeokuta, where he met the chief, Sodeke, who appeared friendly, expressed a desire for the return of his people, and for missionaries to accompany them; and wrote a letter to the Governor of Sierra Leone, expressing his thanks to the British Government for what it had done for his people, and his determination to suppress the slave-trade in his country. Mr. Townsend found many liberated Africans from Sierra Leone, at Abbeokuta; and he describes some very affecting scenes, on their meeting their friends and relatives. The country he found to be salubrious and fruitful. (See Yoruba.)

On hearing Mr. Thompson's report, the desire of the Yorubas to return to their country was greatly increased; and hundreds immediately began preparations for leaving the colony. On the 4th of November following, the inhabitants of Hastings addressed a letter to Mr. Graf, their missionary, expressing their desire to return to their country, and presenting, through him, to the Society, a request for a missionary. This was responded to, by the appointment of Andrew Wilhelm, a native teacher of established character, to accompany them. A farewell meeting was held, and addresses and parting advice given to the emigrants by Mr. Graf and several of the natives.

The Committee decided on occupying Abbeokuta as a missionary station; and Mr. Townsend went to England to receive ordination, in order to accompany Mr. Crowther, who had been appointed to the new mission.

He returned to the colony in December, 1844; and on the 18th of that month, Rev. Messrs. Thompson, Golmer, and Crowther, with their wives and four native teachers, sailed in an American vessel that happened to be at Freetown, carrying with them a frame house, constructed for Mr. Townsend in England. They were favored with a prosperous voyage, and arrived safely at Badagry on the 17th of January, 1845. There they heard that Sodeke, the chief of Abbeokuta, was dead, and were advised not to proceed till after the funeral ceremonies were over. Soon after, the Yorubas were attacked by the king of Dahomey, and a serious war broke out, the consequence of the slave-trade. Being thus prevented from going immediately into the interior, they commenced missionary labors at Badagry, among a mixed population. The Gospel was preached under the shade of a tree. Mr. Townsend's frame house was put up, and a native house erected. The service was conducted in the Yoruba language, the greater part of the Liturgy having been translated by Mr. Crowther.

After a detention of eighteen months at Badagry, Rev. Messrs. Townsend, and Crowther succeeded in reaching Abbeokuta, leaving Mr. Golmer at Badagry; which was to be maintained as a branch of the mission, to keep open the communication with the coast. As soon as their arrival in the vicinity was announced, the crier was commissioned to give public notice that the heaviest punishment would be visited on any one who should dare to insult or steal from the strangers who were coming. The whole of the Lord's day previous to their arrival was spent by the chiefs in wrangling with each other for the right of receiving the missionaries, in their respective districts. On their arrival at the ferry of the river Ogun, they were met by a party of Sierra Leone people; and on the opposite bank, another large party, dressed out in their English clothes, were ready to welcome them.

After visiting all the chiefs, which it took them four days to accomplish, an assembly of the chiefs was convened, to hear from them their intentions, on coming into their country. The meeting was conducted with great decorum. Mr. Crowther addressed them, giving a history of the proceedings, and explaining the objects of the mission. He then read a letter from the Governor of the Colony to them. Their answer was highly satisfactory, expressing their gratitude, and promising their coöperation in carrying out the objects of the mission. They immediately set about the erection of buildings; but in the mean time, commenced service partly under the shelter of a narrow piazza, and partly in the open air, and were listened to attentively by all. They also learned that Andrew Wilhelm, the native teacher who had preceded them, had been faithfully laboring to prepare their way.

Under date of August 21, Mr. Crowther states that his mother, from whom he had been torn away about twenty-five years before, came with his brother, in quest of him. Their meeting was most affecting; and she readily received the truth from the lips of her son, and became one of the first fruits of the mission.

In the beginning of the year 1848, Rev. J. Smith, and Rev. J. C. Müller, with their wives, arrived at Badagry; but in the course of three weeks, Mrs. Miller was carried off by the fever, and the alarming illness of Mrs. Townsend, obliged her husband to return with her to England. At Badagry, there was very little that was encouraging. The same friendly feeling continued at Abbeokuta. Rev. Mr. Müller considered the Yorubas a superior class of Africans; and their minds were prepared to receive the truth. They were not so dull and corrupt as those on the coast. Already, the blessing of God had attended the labors of the missionaries. On the 6th of Feb., 1848, just before sailing for Europe, Mr. Townsend, after receiving satisfactory evidence of their true conversion, baptized three women, one of whom was Mr. Crowther's mother, and two men. On this occasion, a large number assembled in the church. The three women were neatly dressed in white. The candidates received Christian names at their baptism. After the service, Mr. Crowther preached an impressive sermon, which was listened to with the deepest attention. The number of candidates for baptism, at this time, was about 100.

From Badagry, Mr. Marsh, as an instance of the cruel bondage of superstition, writes, April 17, 1849, that there exists, among the Popos, at Badagry, a custom, bearing resemblance to monastic vows. The people are mostly under vows to some idols, which cannot be violated by themselves or others, with impunity. Under these vows, they are often shut up for a long time in their idol temples. There were, at that time, about five hundred young men and women, shut up in these temples. When these come out, they are regarded as sacred, and any one who touches their heads or treads on their feet, must pay a large sum of money, or if unable, must be sold or put to death. In crossing from one part of the town to another, Mr. Smith passed a piece of ground where these victims of superstition were put to death, which was literally strewn with human bones; so truly are the "dark places of the earth full of the habitations of cruelty."

Three years after the establishment of the mission at Abbeokuta, so great was the blessing of God upon it, that there were five hundred constant attendants on the means of grace, eighty communicants, and nearly two hundred candidates; and the religion of Jesus Christ had become a topic of conversation in the war expedition, on the farms, and in the market places. The people pressed eagerly to hear the word, and were deeply moved with it, sometimes speaking out and inquiring what they should do. Those who came to oppose, were convinced. The word, also, exercised a general and pervading influence over the people at large; and there was a waning of the power of idols and of the ancient superstitions. Yet, the converts were subject to persecution from those who adhered to the old customs. The priests of the national superstition, being nearly deserted, set up a persecution in four or five of the townships of which the District of Abbeokuta is composed, putting the converts in stocks, cruelly beating them, threatening them with death, and fining them to a heavy amount; but at length, on the urgent request of the missionaries, the principal chiefs interfered, and put a stop to these cruel proceedings. The attempt to renew persecution was again made, in 1850. The cause was believed to be the close blockade of Lagos, by the British squadron, by means of which no slaves could be shipped; which so enraged the head slave trading chief at Abbeokuta, that he sought to annoy, defeat, and drive away, if possible, the friends of the mission, even threatening death to those who ventured to go to church. But the British Consul, Capt. Beecroft soon arrived at Abbeokuta, and effectually stirred up the chiefs to protect the converts.

The priests are inveterate against Christianity, and do what they can to oppose it; but they and the chiefs seemed to be held under a remarkable restraint. They have a way of consulting their gods, through an oracle, which is their great superstition. This oracle has again and again been consulted by them, in regard to the missionaries, but has never been induced to utter a word against them; but from first to last, it has said that the welfare of the country was in the hands of the white people, and that they must be permitted to teach what they please. Their oracles are in the hands of the heathen priests, who, by a certain process, arrive at a conclusion as to the will of the god. But, though they are open and avowed persecutors of Christianity, they are unable to make their oracles utter a word against it.

Toward the end of the year 1850, it became evident that the various parties interested in the slave trade were preparing for a desperate and combined attempt to crush the rising Christianity of Abbeokuta, and expel the missionaries from the land. At length, an invasion was attempted by the king of Dahomey. On the hostile army appearing before Badagry, some of the boys at the missionary boarding school were taken away to places of safety; but Rev. Mr. Gollmer remained at his post. On Sunday evening, March 2, the enemy approached Abbeokuta. Many of the Christian converts went from public worship and from their special prayer meetings, to man the walls, for the whole male population was summoned to the defence. Many of the timid inhabitants fled, but the missionaries remained at their posts, with a steadfast confidence in God. Masses of well trained warriors, male and female, armed with muskets, bore down upon the town, defended only with a mud wall. They fought with desperation, but were completely routed, with great loss; while the loss of the Yorubas was small. The missionaries exerted themselves to save the lives of the prisoners, and they were at length exchanged for the means of defence against future attacks. The immediate moral effect upon the inhabitants of Abbeokuta was most striking. The victory was by them unanimously attributed to the goodness of the Christian's God. All persecution ceased. The principal chiefs sent their children to the schools. And it was hoped that great advantage would accrue to the cause of Christ, from this deep and bloody plot against the very existence of the mission at Abbeokuta. It is thus that the Lord makes the wrath of man to praise him.

An attack was made on Badagry, and nearly the whole town reduced to ashes; but the premises of the mission escaped. At this stage, the British cruisers interfered, and drove away Kosoko, the usurper of Lagos, who made the attack, and the most decisive measures were taken to put down the slave traffic. Treaties were made with Abbeokuta and Lagos, in which protection was secured both to the missionaries and to lawful commerce. In the course of the persecutions which have been alluded to, many instances are mentioned of constancy in the converts, which would have done honor to the early Christian martyrs.

The mission is extending its operations on every side, and making exploring expeditions into the interior, and bringing to light constantly new fields of labor, to which the way is already prepared, by all these tribes being represented among the liberated Africans in the Colony; so that they are likely to prove Josephs, lost and recovered again, to save their people, not from temporal, but from eternal death.

Present State of the Missions.—The report of the society, for 1852, represents the work as going forward at the different stations, with a steady progress. The Yoruba country had continued to be the scene of "wars and rumors of wars;" but from the threatened danger Abbeokuta had been happily preserved. The missionary work has been successfully prosecuted, and several new stations commenced. But, in consequence of the war, and other circumstances, Badagry was reduced to a small and unimportant place; and the mission has been removed to Lagos, about 36 miles east of Badagry. Lagos is a large and populous town, having water communication far into the interior, as well as for hundreds of miles along the coast. It has hitherto been a great slave mart; but the British government have occupied the place, and driven out the traffic.

Several deaths occurred among the missionaries in 1852; but a considerable reinforcement was sent out, and Rev. O. E. Vidal, D. D., having been consecrated Bishop of Sierra Leone, arrived at Freetown Dec. 27, 1852, and preached his first ordination sermon on the admission of Messrs. Maser, Kefer, and Gerst to deacon's orders.

The report for 1853, represents the pastoral work within the colony as in a satisfactory state of progress, and the educational establishments as in a hopeful condition. Not much progress was making at the Timneh mission; but the year has been one of peace to the Yoruba mission. A good beginning had been made at Lagos.

The following table will show the state of these missions in 1853:

English Baptist Missionary Society.—Allusion has already been made to an unsuccessful effort of the Baptist Missionary Society to introduce the Gospel into Sierra Leone in 1795. From the failure of that enterprise to 1840, this society appears to have attempted nothing for West Africa. At length, however, it was resolved that measures should be taken, having in view the exploration and occupancy of an entirely new field. The Rev. John Clarke and Dr. Prince, who had both resided for some years in Jamaica, were invited to go forth as pioneers, and lay the foundation of the contemplated mission. They arrived at the island of Fernando Po, January 1, 1841 ; and on the following Sabbath public worship was held in Clarence, where they first landed. (See FERNANDO Po.) They subsequently visited the adjacent coast, to ascertain the feasibility of commencing missionary operations. Such was their report to the society at home that the latter soon sent out a number of additional laborers, a part of whom were stationed on the island of Fernando Po, and a part upon the main land. The agency of colored persons from Jamaica is to be employed extensively in this mission ; and a number have already joined their white brethren.

The prospects of this enterprise were quite flattering till near the close of 1845. At that time three stations had been commenced upon the main land ; making the whole number of stations four, and the out-stations five. There were also five missionaries, three male European assistant missionaries, and nine male colored teachers.

Early in the year 1846, however, all the missionaries on Fernando Po were ordered by the Spanish authorities to desist from their appropriate work, twelve months being allowed them to dispose of the mission property.

This year was also one of peculiar trial, in the removal of two of the missionaries, Messrs. Thompson and Sturgeon, by death. The Spanish consul regarding their labors as a great benefit to the people, consented to let them remain, provided they would give up preaching and cease to teach the Bible in their schools. But this proposition they declined, and employed the interval allowed them for removal in their usual labors. Two Catholic priests were left at Clarence, but they have since returned to Spain. Seven persons were baptized, during the year. Meanwhile, the providence of God was opening other doors at Bimbia and Cameroons. The former of these is healthy, and surrounded by 140 villages. The report for 1851 states that cheering information of success had been received from Mr. Johnson at Cameroons. The attendance on preaching was good, there were several inquirers, and 14 or 15 gave evidence of piety. This year the mission was again afflicted with the loss by death of two of its missionaries, Messrs. Merrick and Newbegin ; but one additional missionary was sent out, and Mr. Saker, who was on a visit to England, returned to his field of labor. In 1852, Rev. J. Wheeler returned home, not being able to endure the climate.

In the report for May, 1853, the committee say that, notwithstanding the reduction of missionary strength, the blessing of God evidently rests on the enfeebled labors of the remnant. At all of the three stations there have been conversions, and the labors of the negro teachers have been the means of salvation to many. The care of the churches has of necessity been committed to native helpers, who have shown no small capacity and fitness for the office. The work of translation has been prosecuted, and several thousand pages of the word of God printed. Yet, the work has met with opposition, and more than once, at the Cameroons, the lives of the people attending Christian worship have been threatened.

The latest complete returns from this mission are for the year 1849, as follows :

WESLEYAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—I. Sierra Leone.—The Wesleyan Missionary Society commenced a mission at Sierra Leone in the year 1796—(not in 1811, as stated in “ The Missionary Guide-Book,” p. 27). During the eleven years preceding, that Society had established missions in Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, and the West Indies ; and the success which God had vouchsafed to those efforts encouraged the Wesleyan Conference to attempt to open a field of missions on the west coast of Africa. Sierra Leone was chosen as the place where to begin these efforts ; and this was the first mission of any kind to that part of Africa.

In 1795, the venerable Dr. Coke, the father of Wesleyan missions, united himself with a scheme then on foot, by gentlemen of different denominations, for the civilization of the Foulahs, in West Africa. This expedition, which originated in motives so purely benevolent, proved an entire failure, not merely from the want of adaptation in the agents employed, but from a mistake akin to that of the Moravians, when they thought they could first civilize and then evangelize the Esquimaux. From similar causes, this expedition failed. The persons engaged and sent forth by Doctor Coke on this mission, were a band of mechanics, with a surgeon at their head ; and they were directed to teach the Foulahs the arts of civilized life. On arriving in the colony, they became discontented, and were soon dispersed. Some died, and others returned home, without ever having reached the scene of their intended labors in the interior. The enterprise “ came to naught,” for its fundamental principle was not that ordained by the great head of the Church, for establishing Christian missions among heathen nations. This was the only mistake of the kind, which, in their long experience, the Wesleyans ever fell into, and may be excused in view of the immature views entertained of the missionary enterprise nearly seventy years ago.* The Wesleyan Conference felt the rebuke, and promptly rectified the mistake, so far as it was connected with them, for, in the annual minutes of the Conference held in August of that year, (1796) we find the following entry: "Dr. Coke laid before the Conference an account of the failure of the colony intended to be established in the Foulah country in Africa; and, after prayer and mature consideration, the Conference unanimously judged, that a trial should be made in that part of Africa, on the proper missionary plan. The two brethren above-mentioned, Messrs. A. Murdoch and W. Patten, having voluntarily offered themselves for this important work, the Conference solemnly appointed them for it, and earnestly recommended them and their great undertaking to the public and private prayers of the Methodist Society."

Little information can now be obtained as to the extent or results of the enterprise thus set on foot by the Conference. No report was published for many years afterwards; and the only sources from whence to glean our scanty knowledge of this mission, are the "Annual Minutes," and the "Arminian Magazine." We cannot, therefore, tell how many agents were sent out, or what amount of success they continued to have. But, that a commencement was made, and considerable good accomplished, and that, too, very soon, is evident from the following notice, being part of a Narrative of Methodist Missions, first drawn up by a Christian of another denomination for the Edinburgh "Missionary Magazine," and thence copied into the "Arminian Magazine," for February, 1797:—"There are also in Sierra Leone, upon the coast of Africa, 400 persons in connexion with the Methodist Society, of whom 223 are blacks and mulattoes." The next reference to this mission turns up in 1804, when the preacher, Mr. Brown, appealed earnestly to Dr. Coke for ministerial help.

* In explanation of the above we find a note in the Missionary Magazine, published in Edinburgh in August, 1796, which says:—"We understand that the mission to the Foulah country, which is said to have failed, was not properly a Methodist mission; as the families that went out with Mr. Macaulay, with the design to settle on the borders of that country, were not sent by the Methodist Conference. They were mechanics, who had been members of the Methodist Societies in England, some of whom had officiated as local preachers, and who had been recommended by Dr. Coke to Mr. Macaulay. But it seems they had either not rightly understood the engagements they had entered into, or had not fully counted the cost. We, therefore, insert this note, lest any of our readers, by attaching the common idea to the phrase Methodist Mission, should be led to conclude that these persons must have been missionaries, sent out by that body of people, for the express purpose of preaching to the heathen: whereas, they were neither so sent, nor was their mission so immediately to preach, as to form a Christian colony, and open a friendly intercourse with the natives of the Foulah country." This explanation will also serve to correct a mistake in Mr. Moister's work, "Memorials of Missionary Labors in Western Africa," (London, 1850, p. 31,) where he seems to make Dr. Coke and the Conference responsible for the whole undertaking. Other writers besides Mr. M. have fallen into the same mistake.

Mr. B. was assisted by Mr. Gordon, and though only local preachers, they faithfully cared for the little flock that had been gathered. They had also the assistance of a colored preacher, a devoted young man. In 1808 we find a communication from this native preacher, Mingo Jordan, to Dr. Adam Clarke, giving an account of his labors as a missionary among the Maroons, from 1805 up to 1808, and stating that, including the Maroons that had been converted, the number of church members in and around Sierra Leone amounted to 100. He earnestly requests in his letter a supply of hymn-books and some wearing apparel for the preachers. Dr. Coke tried to sustain the mission until he could find a suitable man to go and take the general superintendence of it; and, in 1811, he sent out Rev. George Warren for this purpose, who, on his arrival in Sierra Leone, was received with open arms by the officers and members of the church which had been gathered there. Mr. Warren's report to Dr. Coke gives the following as the statistics of the mission, as he found it:—"The society, at our arrival, amounted to 110; a great proportion of these profess to enjoy a sense of the divine favor; and the society in general, as far as I can learn, conduct themselves with considerable propriety. I found among them, at my coming, three local preachers, two of whom meet classes, and six class-leaders besides. Since this, one brother, who had been in the country for his health, has returned. Seven have been admitted on trial, while several more appear to be under serious impressions.* Sierra Leone had then about 4,000 inhabitants, only about one in forty being European. The rest were Nova-Scotians, Maroons, Timnehs, Bulloms, Kroomen, and recaptured slaves. The places of worship were two Methodist chapels, one Episcopal, and one Baptist church.

To do anything like justice to our sketch of this mission, it is necessary that we be allowed to state briefly what was the condition of society then at Sierra Leone. Even at the present day, after the Gospel (like the disinfecting fluid acting on this mass of moral corruption) has removed so large a proportion of the elements of death, the population of Sierra Leone is unique, having no parallel in any other part of the world. But what was the state of that anomalous population, as a field for Christian missions, more than fifty years ago? All the elements of the worst forms of heathenism were here united to the most degrading vices of civilization. And, in the midst of these abominations, missionaries were set down to attempt to spread the blessings of a sanctifying Christianity through such "a hell upon earth" as this place then was. At that time the colony was but ten square miles in extent. It was originally settled with the avowed object of the moral improvement of the natives. But at the close of the war with the United States, the negroes who had served under the British flag, either on land or in the navy, were located in Nova Scotia, or the Bahama Isles. Being dissatisfied with their situation, numbers of them made their way to London, where they were found, collected together, in the most deplorable state, "subject to every misery, and familiar with every vice." Public attention was called to their condition, chiefly by the efforts of the celebrated Granville Sharpe, and, in 1787, "The African Company" was formed. The committee purchased land from the negro princes at Sierra Leone, on which to locate these pests of London society; and, a few months after, 400 blacks and about 60 whites embarked for Sierra Leone. The whites are said to have been chiefly women of the most abandoned character. Such were the materials of the first English colony in Western Africa. A company of American refugee slaves and London prostitutes sent out by British philanthropy to enlighten and civilize Africa! The results may be anticipated. From the combined influence of the climate and the vicious habits of the colonists, the mortality was fearful. In a few months, nearly one half of them had either died or escaped from the colony, and, in little more than a year, the whole were dispersed, and the town burnt to ashes by an African chief.

In the year 1791, another association was formed, by whose efforts a few of the dispersed colonists were again collected, and about 1200 more negroes were transported from Nova Scotia. About three years after, Sierra Leone was destroyed by a French squadron; and, in 1808, disappointed and dismayed by the spirit of the colonists, and the various disasters which overtook the colony, the company transferred their whole establishment to the British government. From this period may be dated the rising prosperity of Sierra Leone. Law and order soon reigned throughout the colony, and provision was made for its defence. The British crown had, just the year before, declared the slave trade to be piracy, and it now decreed that all captured slaves, rescued from slave ships by the English cruisers, should be brought into Sierra Leone, as their asylum. Such are the sources whence the population of Sierra Leone has been drawn, numbering 41,735 in the year 1847, and which presents in that place the representatives of about 200 different nations of Africa, each with its own language, superstitions, and abominable wickedness, and, when landed there, possessing no idea of order, discipline, honesty, or morality.

Among these wretched outcasts of mankind, the Wesleyan missionaries have been laboring from the first; and surely in such a place, whatever good has been achieved must be attributed alone to the hand of God. When to these considerations we add the deadly character of the climate, some idea may be formed of the nature of that sphere where the Wesleyan missionaries have been toiling for half a century. It has been the grave of our missionaries, and frequently at a time too when they had just become qualified for usefulness among this polyglot people. From 1811 to 1850, there were sent from England, as nearly as can be ascertained, by the Wesleyan Missionary Society, about 123 missionaries, including their wives; and of these there were no fewer than 54 who died, while many others returned home on account of the failure of their health. Nor was this merely after a lengthened course of labor. In consequence of the unhealthiness of the climate, the Committee, after a short trial of seven years, restricted the period of service first to three, and then to two years; and it was only in a few instances that this period was exceeded. Many died within the first year, some in a few months, a few weeks, or even a few days, after their landing. Instances were not wanting of husbands and wives lying ill in different rooms of the same house at the same time, and dying within a short time of each other. The frequent sickness and death of so many of the missionaries, and the early return of others to England, could not fail to affect materially the progress of the missions. Stations were sometimes left with only one missionary, or without any missionary at all.

The events and circumstances which we have placed before the reader will, in a great measure, explain why the 400 members connected with the mission in 1797 should have dwindled to 110 in 1811, when Mr. Warren arrived to take charge of the mission. He entered on his work with great zeal, and extensive prospects of usefulness, but fell a victim to the climate the year after he landed there. William Davis then offered himself for the vacant post, and Samuel Brown was sent out to assist him, in the various openings of usefulness which presented themselves. The work soon spread from Free Town to Wellington, Hastings, Waterloo, Murraytown, &c., on the east, and to York and Plantains Island on the South. And notwithstanding the occasional checks to which the mission has been subject, among the greatest of which, may be reckoned each fresh cargo of slaves, yet this mission has been crowned with continued prosperity. And some of the most remarkable instances of powerful awakenings and revivals with which the Wesleyan missions have been blest have taken place in Sierra Leone. Here thousands of the afflicted children of Ham, drawn up from the reeking holds of the slave vessels, have been made the joyful partakers of a richer liberty than British philanthropy could confer upon them. And it is the testimony of gentlemen who resided there for years, that the religious experience of "the converts to Christianity in that country is generally clear and satisfactory, and will bear a comparison with that of the professors of religion in more highly favored lands."

Schools have also been established for the training of the rising generation, in which over 3,600 children are receiving an evangelical education; and an Institution for the training of a native ministry is in successful operation.

Nor have the labors of the missionaries and their zealous associates, the native preachers, been restricted to the heathen within the colony. They have brought the word of life to thousands of idolators beyond the limits of the colony; so that the Kossos and the heathen round Murraytown have turned to God from "dumb idols." At the close of the year 1852, one of those remarkable movements took place at Sierra Leone, which occasionally startles the church and the world, evincing a special omnipotent agency over the minds of men, and indicating to us how vast are those resources of influence which God has in reserve and by which he may yet accelerate the conversion of the world to the faith of Christ. The nature of this movement may be best seen from the communications of the missionaries at Sierra Leone, under date of December 24, 1852. Rev. Messrs. Fletcher and Gilbert write, "The Committee will be glad to hear that the idolators of Sierra Leone are casting their idols 'to the moles and the bats.' The kingdom of Satan is falling as lightning to the ground. A few weeks since, Mr. George, our schoolmaster at Murraytown, came to the mission house, and requested that one or two missionaries would come immediately to that place, as the idolators were giving up their idols. As it was past five on Sunday evening when he came, we postponed it until the next day. On the following morning Mr. Reay and myself rose at four o'clock, and started off to the village. We arrived just as it was getting light, and proceeded at once to the constable's house. We were rather surprised to find his piazza full of idols, and other superstitious stuff which had been brought to him the day previous. He very kindly took us to the houses of the idolators. We talked to them about their souls, and exhorted them to look to Christ as their Saviour, Redeemer and God. One man who voluntarily gave up his idol to us, said he had been an idolator twenty-five years, but now he intended to go to the Chapel. On Sunday I went to Murraytown and preached to those people who had lately given up their idols. The Chapel, which had been lately rebuilt, was crowded; and all paid great attention, while I enforced the words, 'Little children, keep yourselves from idols.' On the same day I baptized 28 males and females, 25 of whom were adults; and I received 5 as members on trial; but some of these were backsliders. As I looked upon these people as they knelt down to be baptized, my feelings overcame me."

At Free Town such a number of idols were given up as no one suspected the place to have contained. The people took the matter into their own hands, and seemed to be simultaneously moved by an invisible impulse, becoming such enthusiastic Iconoclasts, that Mr. Fletcher tells us all other work was suspended. In crowds, but not tumultuously, they paraded through the streets, carrying the heathen deities in procession, to deliver them up to the magistrates and missionaries. Mr. Fletcher turned his apartments into a museum for the exhibition of those unsightly abominations, and thousands of people came to look at them. The fame of this movement has spread far along the coast, producing deep impression among the various tribes, and leading the relenting heathen in many instances to say with Ephraim—"What have I to do any more with idols?" The work is extensive and spreading and is another of those illustrations which frequently occur to show how powerful and efficient are the resources of Him in whose hands are the hearts of all men, and before whose Almighty Spirit every obstacle must give way. The proximity of Sierra Leone to Liberia, invests this great work with an additional interest, as both of these colonies bear a relation to the evangelization of Africa, the value of which is incalculable. Events like these give a powerful impetus to a mission; and it is so in this case. The prospects in Sierra Leone, were never so bright as now. The schools are well attended, and the chapels cannot hold all who desire the word of God. The Native Training Institution is also doing well. At a late public examination of the students, held in the presence of the Colonial Secretary and other official persons and residents in the colony, the students were examined as to their knowledge of Theology, Latin, Greek, Mathematics, English Grammar and Geography, and acquitted themselves most satisfactorily. One of their number has been just recommended by the district meeting as a candidate for the holy ministry.

Those who remember the struggles and difficulties which marked the early history of this mission, can best appreciate its present encouraging condition, and see with delight their hopes not only realized, but even far exceeded.

In 1811 there was but one missionary, three local preachers, 110 members, and about 100 children in the schools, with two small chapels. Now there are thirty-one chapels, (some of which are very large,) seven missionaries, 107 local preachers, over 6000 church members, 3608 scholars, and more than 11,000 persons in the pastoral care of the missionaries. "According to this time," it may well be said, "what hath God wrought?" For more definite information on the present state of the mission, see the Tabular View near the end of this article.

II. The Gambia District.—This mission was commenced by the Wesleyan Society in the year 1821. It lies further north than any other on the west coast of Africa; and the field is entirely in the hands of the Wesleyan Society. That portion of Western Africa which is drained by the rivers Senegal and Gambia, is named Senegambia. The tribes inhabiting this district of country are chiefly the Jaloofs, which lie to the north; the Mandingoes, who inhabit the sea-board; and the Foulahs, who are chiefly found deep in the country, to the east.

The Jaloofs and Mandingoes are mostly Mohammedans; but they are very different from each other in their opinions and dispositions. One portion of them, called Mura-boots, or "religious people," are excessively superstitious, and put implicit confidence in their "greegrees," (charms,) which they hang about them in great numbers and variety. They also practice witchcraft, of all sorts. Mohammedanism has been carried to the west of Africa by its priests in the capacity of schoolmasters, using the Arabic language; and, though grossly ignorant themselves, they have acquired a powerful hold over the native mind.

The Foulahs, who are a wandering people, are mostly Pagans, and are greatly oppressed by the Mandingoes, who abuse and plunder them without any ceremony. The French, the Portuguese, and the English, have settlements on the coast in these parts, as the rivers Senegal and Gambia are exceedingly advantageous for trade. The Gambia, especially, whose source, in the Tenda country is said to be only a few days' journey from the renowned Niger, can be navigated by vessels of large burden for nearly 400 miles, and with small craft for nearly 700 miles. Ships from Europe supply the whole country on both sides of its banks, on which lie numerous towns and villages, the centres of trade to the country for hundreds of miles inland.

The mission schools, which were established by the missionary Dart, about the year 1820, in the island of St. Louis, a French settlement at the mouth of the Senegal, were not kept up; neither were others that were established in the island of Goree, near Cape Verd; and the first standing missions that we meet with are these at the Gambia. Not far from its estuary, which is twelve miles broad, is the island of St. Mary, in lat. 30 degs. 30 min. north, and long. 15 degs. 10 min. west, close to the southern shore. It is four miles long by one broad. The English have had a settlement here since 1816. The principal town is Bathurst, on the north side, facing the main branch of the river. It contains a number of excellent houses, among which may be noted the government house, the hospital, the Wesleyan chapel, with the dwellings of the merchants, &c. The population in 1846 was 3689, of whom only 50 were white persons; the rest were Mandingoes, Jaloofs, and liberated slaves. Several missionaries have died here; and the schools which were opened here by the Society of Friends, in the year 1823, as also those which they established, at the same time, on the neighboring coast at Birkow, Mahmadi, and Sandani, have sunk under the unhealthiness of the climate. The immediate foundress of these schools was the celebrated Hannah Kilham, that spirited lady who, for ten years together, itinerated the west coast of Africa, commenced schools in many places, and in each of them devoted her particular attention to the languages and dialects, of which she printed a number of valuable specimens. She had herself brought up and educated two African youths in England, and it was with the assistance of these she opened the schools at Birkow. But she fell a victim to the country fever in the year 1832. The Wesleyan mission has stood better, inasmuch as it still continues; though one Christian messenger after another has sunk into the grave, and almost yearly some such mournful tidings reach us from this station. The Wesleyan mission commenced its labors in 1821, at a place called Mandaranee, in the territory of the king of Combo, on the south bank of the river, about eight miles from St. Marys. This locality, however, proved to be ineligible, and the health of the missionaries, Morgan and Baker, having failed, the mission was removed to Bathurst, where, as also in Melville Town and Soldier Town on the island, and in Berwick Town on the continent, they have new chapels which are very regularly frequented by native converts and the heathen.

The Rev. Richard Marshall and his wife were sent out, in 1823, to strengthen and extend the mission at St. Marys. Mr. Morgan and Mr. Hawkins were then laboring there; but in a short time we find Mr. Marshall laboring alone. He toiled on, however, assisted in the school department by his devoted companion. But in August, 1830, he was laid low, and in five days the malignant fever carried him off. As soon as an opportunity offered, the desolate widow, with her little infant, embarked for England, taking with her an African girl, Sally, to take care of them during the voyage. But great bodily weakness and extreme mental suffering soon prostrated her, and within 48 hours of the ship reaching the port of Bristol, Mrs. Marshall, unable to proceed to her friends in the north of England, died among strangers, though on her native shore, leaving her baby in the hands of his African nurse, both strangers in a strange land. One cold morning in the month of October of that year, several young men, candidates for the missionary ministry of Methodism, were passing through the streets of London, on their way to meet the secretaries and committee, to be examined in reference to their qualifications, and the fields of labor to which they should be sent. Just as they arrived at the Old Mission House in Hatton-Garden, they met a negro girl, carrying in her arms a poor, sickly-looking white child. They spoke to her, and while her sable arms were folded affectionately round her little charge, and the tears flowed down her face, she told them of her country, and of the missionary and his dear wife, whom she had so much loved; how they had toiled and suffered for Africa, and how they were dead, and no one to carry on the work; and here she stood before the committee, that had sent out the man of God and his wife, bearing back the missionary's orphan boy, and pleading that poor Africa be not given up. The devoted creature's appeal, uttered with an energy and a pathos truly affecting, produced an immediate and powerful impression upon the missionary candidates; and one of their number, William Moister, immediately offered himself to fill the vacated post. In a few weeks he was on his way; and when he arrived opposite Bathurst, and it became known that there was a missionary and his wife on board, the Christian natives gathered to the beach, plunging into the water to meet the boat, out of which they lifted them and carried them ashore. They set them down and then wept aloud for joy, kissing their hands again and again, and, as they bedewed them with their tears, exclaiming, "Tank God, tank God, Mr. Marshall die, but God send us nuder minister!" They proceeded to the mission house; but the wild flowers had grown upon the unused steps during the few preceding months. Mr. Moister entered upon his work in faith, and his labors were soon owned of God; and others having been sent to his assistance, he extended the mission to Macarthy's Island, a most important position for a mission. This move brought them into connexion with the Foulah tribe, the very people that were the objects of Dr. Coke's benevolent but unsuccessful enterprise in 1796. Macarthy's Island is situated in the Gambia river, about 250 miles from its mouth. It is nearly seven miles long and one broad, having the Gambia on both sides. From the central situation of this island its trade, in gold, ivory, hides, and beeswax—its being the resort of the shipping, and the facilities which its noble river affords for communication with the coast and the interior—no better position can be found in all Africa for a missionary station. Here, therefore, the Wesleyan committee established a strong centre of operation, including, as part of their plan, an institution for educating the sons of the neighboring kings and chiefs. The committee were encouraged to engage in this enterprise by the noble munificence of a single individual—Dr. Lindoe, of Southampton—and whose benevolent zeal is the more to be appreciated, inasmuch as he was not connected with the Wesleyan denomination of Christians. From 1833 to 1848, Dr. Lindoe and his family expended upon the Foulah Mission over $19,000. A tract of 600 acres of land having been given by the Government, the wandering and persecuted Foulahs were invited to settle upon it. School houses were built, and the Rev. Mr. Macbrair, formerly the Society's missionary in Egypt, was sent out to Macarthy's Island to translate the Scriptures into the language of the Mandingoes and Foulahs. Several able native missionaries were raised up, upon whom the work has since chiefly devolved, and the society there, with the genuine spirit of a missionary church, are laboring and praying that the nations contiguous to them may also be favored with the light of saving truth. The record of mortality in this mission is truly painful. During the past 32 years, out of 24 persons sent out, 15 have left the field disabled, and 12 have fallen into the arms of death! And yet men are found who, with their lives in their hand, rush forward and offer themselves for these posts as often as they are left unfilled by the ravages of disease and death. The longest term of service was that of Rev. W. Fox, who was enabled to stand his ground for ten years. And next to him was Rev. H. Badger, who, after spending twelve years in the South African missions, went to the Gambia in 1848, and remained there until the death of his noble wife last year obliged him also to retire. The late Mrs. Badger was one of the most devoted female missionaries that ever was sent out by any Christian society. Twenty years of her life she devoted to the instruction and salvation of the African race, in the West Indies, at Sierra Leone, and at the Gambia. The languages employed at the Gambia, beside the English, are the Jalof, the Mandingo, and the Foulah. For information as to the present state of this mission, the reader is referred to the table near the end of this article.

III. The Cape Coast District.—With the exception of the German Mission at Akropong and Ussa, the only missions on the Gold Coast are those of the Wesleyan Society. This coast runs from the mouth of the river Adirio or Volta, to Cape Appolina, a distance of about 240 miles. The leading power in this district of Africa is the Ashantee nation, the capital of which is Coomassie or Kumasi. The coast of Guinea, of which the Gold Coast is a part, first became known to Europeans in the sixteenth century. At that period the spirit of discovery, which during the middle ages, had been confined to the Arabs, manifested itself in Europe in a most remarkable manner. The Portuguese, who led the way, prosecuted their researches with enthusiastic ardor, and along the western coast of Africa, and from various points penetrated into the interior. The English first commenced trading with Guinea in the latter end of the reign of Edward VI.; but the merchants who engaged in such commerce were exposed to considerable risk, in consequence of the pretensions of the Portuguese, who having built the fort of St. George del Mina, endeavored to enforce their claim to an exclusive right to trade with the Gold Coast, as well as the other parts of Western Africa. The Dutch deprived the Portuguese of their forts and settlements, on the Gold Coast; and their attempt to serve the English in the same way, led to the war between the Dutch and English in 1667. At its conclusion the English company were left in possession of only one fort, that of Cape Coast Castle. But they soon extended themselves on the coast again. At this time the Fantees governed the whole country round Cape Coast—having the powerful and warlike Ashantees on the north of them. The eruption of the Ashantees into the Fantee country first brought them into collision with the British, in the year 1807. The Ashantees desolated the country—and their great military power may be imagined from the fact of the immense and disciplined armies they brought into the field. It is stated that, in some of the wars in which this powerful people engaged, often 30,000 men, and in two instances, as many as 100,000, have been left dead on the field of battle. In the war of 1807 they took the Dutch fort at Cormantine, they then fiercely attacked the British fort of Annamaboe, when a negotiation ensued, and Chibbu, the author of the war, had to be given up to them. A second and a third invasion followed, until the Fantees were completely subdued, and the British found that, to retain their own possessions they must conciliate these powerful conquerors. An embassy therefore was sent to Coomassie, a treaty concluded, and a resident appointed to represent British interests at the capital. Symptoms of disquietude, followed by another treaty, having occurred, the Home Government resolved to try harsher measures, and appointed Sir Charles McCarthy Governor of Cape Coast." He adopted a warlike policy. Hostilities were commenced between the British and the Ashantees, in which at first the British were successful, but in the fatal battle near Assamacow, Sir Charles was defeated and slain, and his army cut to pieces. As an illustration of the spirit and temper of the savage Ashantees, it may be mentioned that they cut the heads of Sir Charles and several of his officers from their bodies, and having seized the Secretary of the General, Mr. Williams, they confined him in a room where the heads were kept. They also tore open Sir Charles' body and took out his heart, and having divided it, it was eaten by the Ashantee Generals, in order that they might, as they imagined, imbibe his bravery. His flesh having been dried, was divided, together with his bones, among the captains of the army, who kept their respective shares about their persons, as charms to inspire them with courage.

About two years from this period, in September, 1826, another and a decisive battle was fought, in which the British were victorious. Among the trophies was a human head, enveloped in a silk handkerchief, and a paper covered with Arabic characters; and over the whole was thrown a tiger skin, the emblem of royalty. On the supposition that this was the head of the unfortunate General McCarthy, it was afterwards sent to England by Colonel Purdon; but it was really the head of the old king Osai Tutu Quamina, (a sovereign remarkable for his prowess) which the new king carried about with him as a charm. It is said that on the morning of the battle, he offered it a libation of rum, and invoked it to cause all the heads of the whites to come and lie near it; and during the day, when intelligence was brought to him of the death of any of his principal officers, he immediately, in the heat of the battle, offered human sacrifices to their shades.

But the blow struck by the British was so decisive that the Ashantee monarch had to submit to the terms imposed on him, which were, that he should lodge 4000 ounces of gold in the castle at Cape Coast, to be appropriated in purchasing arms and ammunition for the British allies, in case the Ashantees should again commence hostilities; and that two of the royal family of Ashantee should be sent to Cape Coast as hostages. To these terms he was obliged to conform, and in April, 1831, his son Quantimissah, and his nephew Ansah, arrived at the Castle. These princes were kindly treated; they received a good education, under the direction of the African Committee, by whom the British Government now conducts the affairs of the Gold Coast; and through the faithful ministry of Rev. J. Dunwell, the first Wesleyan missionary to the Gold Coast, they both became convinced of the truth and excellence of the Christian religion, the public profession of which they assumed during their subsequent visit to England,—Quantamissah receiving in baptism the name of William, and Ansah, that of John. They returned to Africa with the Niger Expedition, and were accompanied to Coomassie by the Rev. T. B. Freeman, Wesleyan missionary at Cape Coast Castle. The favorable impression produced on the mind of the Ashantee monarch, by these two princes, as well as by a few native Christians who had returned to Coomassie from Sierra Leone, to which they had been carried as rescued slaves, by the British cruisers, were thus the means employed by Providence for opening Ashantee to the labors of the Wesleyan Missionary Society.

Here we leave the narrative for the present, in order to glance at the work which had previously been begun in the regions on the south of the Ashantee kingdom nearer the sea. Between Coomassie and the South Atlantic Ocean there are several kingdoms, as Asin, Aquapim, Akim, Fantee, &c., over which the monarchs of Ashantee formerly claimed supreme sovereignty. And it is humiliating to reflect that though three Protestant powers of Europe—the Danes, the Dutch, and the English—have successively had intercourse with these and other parts of Guinea for three centuries, yet until a comparatively late period, but few attempts have been made to communicate to the native population the light and blessings of Christianity. In the year 1751, a clergyman of the Church of England went out under the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, to the Gold Coast, to see what could be done in establishing a mission there. During the four years of his stay he officiated as chaplain of the troops and residents at Cape Coast Castle, but was much discouraged in his attempts to establish the faith of the Gospel among the natives. His health having failed he returned to England in 1756, and published an account of his efforts. Before leaving, he had sent home three native boys from Cape Coast, who were placed by the society to which he belonged, in a school in Islington, under the care of Mr. Hickman, with whom they are reported as having made considerable proficiency in useful learning, and in the knowledge of the Christian religion. One of these youths, of the name of Quaque, was afterward sent to the University of Oxford, and having completed his education there, he received ordination, and returned to exercise the Christian ministry in his native country. He was chaplain at Cape Coast Castle for more than fifty years; but does not appear to have been instrumental in turning any of his countrymen to Christianity. Nor will this excite surprise, when it is known that on his death-bed he gave evidence that he had at least as much confidence in the influence of the Fetish, as in the power of Christianity. The case of this individual furnishes matter for grave consideration on the part of those who are anxious to promote the enlightenment and salvation of Africa. It yields no support to the theory of Christianizing heathen lands, primarily or chiefly, by bringing natives to England or the United States, for education, with a view to their being employed as the principal instructors of their countrymen; and shows that if on their return, they are left to their own resources, it is more likely that they will sink down again to the level of their former state, than that they will prove the regenerators of their country. Instructed natives may maintain their consistency, and act a useful part, where they are placed under the eye and direction of the missionaries; but if they be thrown back into heathen society without such support, it ought not to excite surprise, should the result prove that the time and care employed upon their culture have been expended in vain. Some English chaplains, who were sent to the Gold Coast after the decease of Quaque, successively died soon after their arrival at Cape Coast Castle.

About twenty-four years since, a mission was commenced by the Basle Missionary Society at Danish Akra, and in the adjoining country of Aquapim; but this truly philanthropic undertaking does not appear to have met with the desired success. The missionaries encountered opposition in quarters where they ought to have found encouragement and support; several of them were removed by death, and the last survivor, Mr. Rüs, returned to Europe in 1840.

Such was the state of the Gold Coast about the time that the providence of God directed the attention of the Wesleyan Missionary Society to it. It was in the autumn of 1834 that the committee of this society were induced, by a peculiar train of inviting circumstances, to send a missionary on a visit of observation to the Gold Coast. A few native youths, who had learned to read the English translation of the Bible, in the excellent government school at Cape Coast Castle, became so interested by the contents of the sacred volume, that they agreed to meet at regular times for the purpose of reading it together, and of carefully inquiring into the nature and claims of the Christian religion. The formation of this interesting society took place in October, 1831; and, in the year 1833, William De Graft, one of these native youths, and who himself had begun to read the Scriptures privately in the spirit of prayer and inquiry, received at Dix Cove, where he was then residing, a request from his young friends at Cape Coast Town, that he would engage some suitable person, who might be proceeding to England, to purchase for their use a number of copies of the New Testament. Shortly after, the late excellent Captain Potter, master of a merchant vessel from the port of Bristol, arrived at Dix Cove; to whom De Graft applied as one likely to execute with promptness and care the commission for the purchase of the Scriptures. The captain was surprised at receiving such an application from a native young man, and became so greatly interested by the information which his questions elicited, that he was led to ask whether the instructions of a missionary would not be highly appreciated by those native inquirers after the true religion? De Graft replied in the affirmative, but appeared doubtful whether so high a privilege was attainable. Captain Potter next proceeded to Cape Coast, where he saw the other members of the meeting or society, and, having consulted President Maclean, he returned to England, resolved to exert himself, in order that, on his next voyage, he might, together with copies of the scriptures, take out a Christian missionary who should "preach the word" to those who were already united in seeking the way to eternal salvation, and proclaim the gospel of Christ to other portions of the heathenish native population of the Gold Coast. Immediately after his arrival at Bristol, Capt. Potter communicated to the Wesleyan Missionary Committee in London his views as to the promising opening for missionary exertion in that part of Africa, and generously offered to take a missionary with him on the next voyage, who might make personal observation and inquiry upon the spot; and, should he conclude that the prospect was not such as to warrant his continuance for the purpose of commencing a mission, Captain Potter engaged that in that case he would bring him back to England without any expense to the missionary society. This noble offer met with acceptance on the part of the missionary committee, and the Rev. Joseph Dunwell was selected for the interesting service.

This devoted missionary embarked with Capt. Potter at Bristol, Oct. 17th, 1834. The entries in his private journal sufficiently indicate the views with which he entered upon his arduous undertaking. He landed at Cape Coast Castle on or about January 1, 1835, and immediately wrote to President Maclean informing him of his arrival, and stating the objects contemplated by the Wesleyan Missionary Committee, in sending him to that part of Africa. The President gave him a kind reception. By the native young men who formed the society for reading the Holy Scriptures, Mr. Dunwell was received "as an angel of God." They at once placed themselves under his care, and he commenced his ministry at Cape Coast town on the first Sabbath after he landed. Speaking of the congregation to whom he preached his first sermon, composed of the members of the above mentioned society and a few others, Mr. D. remarks, "The deepest attention was manifested; joy beamed on every countenance," and adds, "Their gratitude is without bounds, and they say, 'we never did think of the missionaries coming to teach black men.'"

One class of persons, however, the fetish men, speedily took the alarm, and used their influence to prevent the people from attending Christian worship, and many of their steadfast votaries employed ridicule and threats for the purpose of deterring their friends and neighbors from listening to the truths of the gospel. But in spite of such opposition, the people flocked to the ministry of Mr. D. at Cape Coast Castle, Annamaboe, and other places which he visited. And under the Divine blessing, the great doctrines of Christianity produced their salutary effect on many minds, and the number of those who felt interested in the subject of their personal salvation steadily increased. Mr. Dunwell, in his correspondence at the time, mentioned with much satisfaction a striking instance of decision in the case of a woman who brought out her household gods and publicly burned them in the presence of her heathen neighbors.

The mission soon assumed a most promising appearance. The large room in which public service was held in Cape Coast town proved too small, and a subscription was commenced among the natives for the erection of a suitable place of worship. Mr. Dunwell had secured great respect among all classes of society, and was receiving applications from distant places to afford them also the benefit of his labors. But in the midst of the anticipations which this hopeful state of things inspired, he was attacked by fever, under which he sunk in a few days; and left the societies which he had been instrumental in forming "as sheep without a shepherd." He died June 14, 1835. Upon his dying bed no word of discouragement or regret escaped his lips, on account of his having so early sacrificed his life in the missionary enterprise; but a quenchless zeal for the cause of his Divine Master sustained him to the last, and all the solicitude he manifested was for the infant church formed by his instrumentality.

This afflictive dispensation produced the deepest feeling among all who took any interest in the mission. On the following morning a native wrote, "Sad news in the town; the shepherd is taken away! The poor missionary is dead!" Great numbers of the native people and the resident English gentlemen attended his funeral, at which his Excellency, the President officiated. On the day after the funeral, the church met to take into consideration the painful circumstances of their bereaved state. The artless manner in which a record of this meeting was made in the minute-book of the Society, will best explain the conclusion that was adopted: "I met the class on purpose to know whether they would continue in the professions they had recently entered into, or return to their former ways, in consequence of the death of their missionary? They said, They would remain in the new profession: for though the missionary was dead, God lives." Another appeal was forwarded to London, which was replied to by the Committee in the appointment of Mr. Wrigley and his wife to the vacant station. They arrived in Sept., 1836, and were followed next year by Mr. and Mrs. Harrop; but in a short time Mrs. Wrigley sunk under the hand of death, and both Mr. and Mrs. Harrop, within a few weeks of their arrival on the coast, were attacked by fever and in a few days after were both laid in the grave. Mr. Wrigley was but just recovering from an attack of the fever when he was bereaved of Mr. and Mrs. Harrop. But though left alone he toiled on at the erection of the large new chapel, and preached the gospel till November, when he also was taken ill and died. The arrival of Rev. Thomas B. Freeman and his wife early in January, 1838, once more revived the drooping spirits of the native church. Mr. Freeman had zealously entered upon the duties of his mission when he was attacked with the seasoning fever; and while watching with solicitude at his sick bed, Mrs. Freeman was seized with a violent inflammatory complaint, which terminated her valuable life in a few hours. Mr. Freeman gradually recovered his health; and from that period to the present, except during his occasional visits to England, has been engaged in the execution of plans which have contributed greatly, under the Divine blessing, to the enlargement of the mission on the Gold Coast.

Mr. Freeman is a colored man, and though not born in Africa, yet of African parentage. He has received the benefits of a thorough education, which added to his great natural abilities, and all sanctified by a zeal for Christ and for Africa which nothing can quench, renders him an agent of preëminent ability. On his arrival at Cape Coast in 1838, he found that, notwithstanding the bereavements which death had made in the missionary ranks, the cause of God was in a state of increasing prosperity, chiefly by the labors of the local preachers and class leaders, so that there were over 450 church members scattered over the district where the missionaries and their devoted assistants had itinerated. There were also a few schools, with five or six places of worship, one of which could hold from 6 to 700 persons, and was well filled with attentive hearers. The new chapel at Cape Coast was completed soon after Mr. Freeman's recovery. This is probably the largest place of worship out of Sierra Leone, on the west coast of Africa; and on the day of dedication it was crowded to its utmost capacity by a deeply interested congregation of Africa's sons and daughters. The Gospel had been introduced in Annamaboe by the lamented Mr. Dunwell, and the claims of Christianity were first introduced to the inhabitants of Winnebah, on the east of Cape Coast Town, by William De Graft, who had now become a local preacher and a useful agent of the Society. Mr. Freeman had also the joy of seeing the gospel established and extended in Akra, and at Domonasi, Dix Cove, and several other places. But it is in connection with his visits to Ashantee (pronounced As-hanti,) that Mr. Freeman's name has come so prominently before the public of late years.

The territory over which the king of Ashantee reigns, including the dependencies of that power, are not much, if at all, inferior in extent to England and Wales united. The population is estimated by Mr. Beecham at over 4,000,000; while the capital city, Coomassie, (pronounced Kumási,) is said to contain at least 100,000 persons. They are a powerful race of men, but, to a frightful degree reckless of human life; and some of their manners and customs are not to be exceeded on earth for blood-thirstiness and brutality. Their monarchy is very powerful—they have a large army, of over 150,000 men, well disciplined, and also great wealth, which they delight to exhibit in truly barbarian magnificence.

This remarkable people claim a remote antiquity, but from the want of written records among them, little can be known of their early history. The mountains of Kong, on the north of their territory, seem to have opposed a successful barrier to the desolating tide of Mohammedanism as it swept over the regions through which the Niger rolls its course. During, or about, the thirteenth century, that portion of the pure Negro race which could not brook the Mohammedan rule, took refuge to the south of this great mountain range, and have there maintained their independence to the present day. Among all the negro kingdoms, Ashantee holds the foremost place; and the conversion of such a people to the faith of Christ, should it take place, would be "life from the dead" to the nations around them. And hence the surpassing interest which attaches to any opening for the Gospel, however small, among this remarkable people. (See Ashantee and the Gold Coast.)

Mr. Freeman felt the importance of attempting to introduce Christianity into Ashantee, and at length an opportunity offered; and leaving the mission at Cape Coast under the care of William De Craft, he made preparation for the arduous undertaking. As an evidence of their desire to spread the Gospel among their countrymen, it may here be mentioned, that the native Christians at Cape Coast not only were willing to relinquish the benefits of their missionary's care for several months, that he might perform this service, but they also contributed of their own little means $600 toward the expenses of his journey. Referring those who desire more information on this interesting subject than the limits of this article will allow, to the published Journals of Mr. Freeman, we will merely state a few facts in conclusion. He left Cape Coast on the 29th of January, 1839, accompanied by a few attendants, and, after being detained at various towns along his route by the superstitious fears of the Ashantee king, who could not comprehend why a missionary should want to see him and visit his capital, no stranger ever having gone there, except to trade or conclude a treaty, or for some secular object; and yet, under the idea that Mr. Freeman was a powerful fetishman, whose wrath it would be impolitic to provoke, the king at length gave consent that he might approach the capital. Mr. Freeman afterward learned, that previous to leave being granted for his approach, a sacrifice of two human victims had been made with a view to avert any evil that might, without such precaution, result from his visit. Great preparations were made for his reception. At length, on the 1st of April, he entered Coomassie, and was received in the spacious market place, by the king and his officers and army, with others, to the amount of over 40,000 persons. And there he stood, the first herald of the Gospel that had ever entered the dark and blood-stained capital of Ashantee to offer to its monarch and its people the religion of purity and peace.

The king, though kind, would not commit himself as to the establishment of schools and a mission station in his capital, but requested time to think of it, and wished Mr. Freeman to return soon again and he should give him an answer. After a delay of fifteen days, in consequence of a "custom" for a deceased relative, to whose shade 42 human beings were sacrificed in two days, while Mr. F. was there, he was allowed to depart; having striven to communicate to the monarch and his counselors, as far as they were disposed to give him audience, as full an exposition of the Gospel as he possibly could. He evidently made a good impression at Coomassie, and though the door was not opened, yet, by his being kindly received in his avowed character as a missionary, its bolts had been drawn, and he hoped a future visit would result in a free access for the Gospel. The publication of Mr. F.'s journal greatly increased the interest already existing on behalf of Ashantee, and a special fund of $25,000 was soon raised to open a mission in that kingdom. Accompanied by the two Ashantee princes, who had just returned from England, the youngest of whom is heir to the throne, Mr. Freeman set out on a second visit to Coomassie in November, 1841. He was kindly received, and succeeded in obtaining ground for a mission-house and permission to establish a school, and have the Gospel preached in the streets and markets of Coomassie without any restraint. And though little has as yet been accomplished in the way of gathering a church, yet the fact that ten or twelve hundred persons stately attend Christian worship in the capital of Ashantee is cause of great encouragement, and we look forward with hope that this citadel of the Powers of Darkness will yet be surrendered to the Captain of our Salvation.

In addition to introducing the gospel into Ashantee, Mr. Freeman was enabled the next year to visit Soleke, the powerful chief of Abbeokuta, and obtained permission to preach the gospel and open a school in the capital, which Mr. F. considers to be larger than even Coomassie; so that there are now Christian missions in Ashantee, Badagry, and Abbeokuta, besides Cape Coast Town, Dix Cove, Annamaboe, Domouasi, Akra and other important places. The queen of Jabin also, has lately applied to Mr. Freeman, very earnestly requesting him to establish a mission in her dominions.

Badagry and Abbeokuta have been described by travelers, particularly by Lander, as the seat of the most sanguinary superstitions, and the scene of the worst atrocities and cruelties of the slave-trade; and yet even here have the returned and christianized emigrants from Sierra Leone been kindly received by the savage monarch, and the foundation of a Christian church been laid. But for further information we must refer the reader to the foregoing tables. An institution for training a native ministry is in operation at British Akra, under the care of Mr. Wharton. All the reports for 1853 from this district speak of the continued prosperity of the work in highly gratifying terms. A recent letter of the general superintendent says: "Never has the work of God in this district been known to assume so cheering an aspect. The influence of Christianity is rapidly extending itself into the interior. All the out stations, except perhaps Kumasi, are in a healthy, vigorous, and flourishing condition—the pastoral visits to the stations in the interior delight us much; they are means of grace to ourselves." The writer goes on to exemplify this latter statement by the details of a recent journey taken for the double purpose of opening a new native chapel at Abuadi, which has been built by the chief of that town, at his own expense, and presented to the mission, and of laying the foundation of a chapel at Dunquah, where the Gospel is extending its power among the people.—Wesleyan Missionary Notices, Annual Reports, and the Annual Minutes and Magazine; Fox's History of Missions on the West Coast of Africa; Moister's Missionary Memorials of Western Africa; Blumhardt's Manual of Missionary History and Geography; and Beecham's Ashantee and the Gold Coast.—REV. W. BUTLER.

AMERICAN BAPTIST MISSIONARY UNION.—This mission is restricted to that part of the coast of Africa known as Liberia, and to the Bassa tribe of its inhabitants, a people occupying a strip of the coast, ninety miles in length lying between Junk river and the river Sesters, extending nearly seventy miles in the interior. They are supposed to be about one hundred and twenty-five thousand in number.

The first missionaries sent by the Board to Africa were Rev. Lott Carey and Rev. Collin Teage, two colored men, who were ordained at Richmond, Va., in January, 1821, and soon afterwards sailed for Liberia as emigrants of the American Colonization Society. This society had then no colony upon the coast, and Messrs. Carey and Teage went to Freetown, in the English colony of Sierra Leone. In February, 1822, they removed to Monrovia, a settlement planted by colonists from America, and commenced their labors as missionaries. During the following year a church was formed and six persons were added to it by baptism, and in 1824 nine more were baptized, and a house of worship was erected. Of this church Mr. Carey became the pastor, his associate having meanwhile returned to Sierra Leone. He was a man of unusual intelligence and energy of character, and his career was one of great usefulness to the people of his race, with whom he was brought in contact on the shores of Africa.

Early in 1825 Rev. Calvin Holton was appointed to this mission by the Board, and sailed for the American colonies which had been planted on the coast. He had, however, scarcely arrived, when he fell a victim to the fever which in that climate seldom fails to attack Europeans from other latitudes. Meanwhile, the mission was sustained by Mr. Carey with the aid of two or three pious assistants whom he found among the emigrants. He provided most of the resources by which it was kept alive, for the allowance of the Board was at this time, very small, and gave direction and character to all its operations. These embraced the emigrant colonists at Monrovia, also the natives dwelling upon the coast, especially those at Grand Mount, where he preached and established schools. In September, 1826, he was elected vice-agent of the colony, and subsequently, on the return of Mr. Ashmun to the United States, he was appointed for the interim to the post of governor, the duties of which he was discharging at the time of his death. Serious depredations had been made upon the property of the colony by some natives, and Mr. Carey had called out the troops, and was making arrangements for its defense when the accidental explosion of a large mass of gunpowder suddenly put an end to his life. At the period of his death the church of which he was pastor contained a hundred members. It was committed to the charge of Mr. Teage, who now returned from Sierra Leone, and of Mr. Waring, one of its members lately ordained a minister. The agencies which had been established by Mr. Carey, long survived his death, and continued to bless the race for which he had toiled. The church at Monrovia soon numbered two hundred members, and the influences of the gospel were extended to the natives of the coast, of whom nearly a hundred were united with the several churches of the colony.

In 1830, Rev. Benjamin Skinner was appointed a missionary to Africa, and arrived at Monrovia with his family in December. Soon after their arrival they were all prostrated with the fever of the coast, and in the course of the following six months they all fell victims to its ravages, Mr. Skinner himself dying at sea on his passage to the United States. After these disastrous issues of the attempts of the managers to employ missionaries in Africa, five years elapsed before any reinforcement was sent to the mission. During the interval the gospel was preached, and public worship and the ordinances of religion were maintained by preachers who were appointed from among the pious emigrants. The most conspicuous of these, in addition to those already named, were Rev. A. W. Anderson, Rev. John Lewis, and Rev. Hilary Teage son of Collin Teage. In the summer of 1834, Dr. Ezekiel Skinner, father of the missionary, went to reside in Liberia. He had been a physician, and also a minister in Connecticut, and now emigrated to Liberia from motives of philanthropy towards the race for whose interests his son had sacrificed his life. This gentleman was subsequently chosen governor, and exerted both his personal and official influence in favor of the mission and the spiritual objects it was intended to promote.

were appointed missionaries to Africa. Their proposal was a noble sacrifice, which the managers, though they did not feel at liberty to solicit it, yet were unwilling to decline. They were persons of education and of high qualifications for the service to which they devoted themselves. They sailed from Philadelphia on the 11th of July, 1835, and arrived after a brief passage, at Monrovia, and immediately repaired to Millsburg, a town in the vicinity, in order to go through with the process of acclimation. They were soon all attacked with the fever of the coast, which terminated the life of Mrs. Mylne, the only lady of the company. Mr. Mylne and Mr. Crocker, though with reduced strength, were soon able to enter upon their labors as missionaries, and for this purpose they selected, with the advice of Dr. Skinner, Edina as the place of their residence. This was a settlement of the Colonization Societies of Pennsylvania and New York, at the mouth of the Mecklin river, opposite Bassa Cove, the principal trading place of the Bassa tribe, a numerous people whose language was widely spoken along the coast and in the interior. They began to acquire the language with the aid of a young colonist who could speak both Bassa and English. They made themselves acquainted with the people of the country by several excursions into the interior, and at the same time preached and established schools among the emigrant colonists both at Bassa Cove and Edina. At the former place a house of worship was erected by funds which they collected, and during the year 1836 sixteen persons were baptized and added to the church of which Mr. Mylne was temporarily the pastor.

During the same period, also, Mr. Crocker was able so far to master the language as to prepare a spelling-book and small vocabulary of words and phrases; to which was also appended a brief outline of the facts of divine revelation. These were printed in December, 1836, and contributed very perceptibly to the progress of the schools and to the general intelligence of the tribe. It was not till June, 1837, that the mission buildings at Edina were ready to be occupied, and at this time the missionaries, who had suffered repeatedly from attacks of disease, established themselves there and commenced their work more immediately among the native population. They had also frequently visited a district up the river, whose chief manifested so great interest in their labors, that in October, 1837, Mr. Crocker took up his residence at Madebli, the principal village of the district. The chief's name was Sante Will, and he claimed to be an important patron of the mission, and was the first to entrust his sons to the care of the missionaries. The number of children now sent to the school at Edina was quite as large as could be provided for, and many of them were sons of the principal chiefs among the Bassas;

the son of king Kober being the most prominent, both for intelligence and for excellence of character.

The mission at Edina was now fully established, but its heroic conductors, though they appear to have taken a most hopeful view of their condition and prospects, yet found themselves in the midst of ignorance and stupidity, of degrading superstitions and brutal wrongs, such as could scarcely have been found in any other portion of the world. The colonists in the neighboring settlements often presented an example and exerted an influence most unfriendly to the interests of the mission; while the natives of the coast were so debased by barbarian passions, and so brutalized by superstitions, as hardly to be capable of comprehending spiritual truth. In addition to this, they were near the marts in which the horrid traffic in slaves was constantly carried on, in many instances by the very persons to whom they were engaged in preaching the gospel. They, however, were not disheartened, and even prepared to extend the influence of the mission to other tribes, both on the coast and in the interior.

In January, 1838, this mission was strengthened by the arrival of Rev. Ivory Clarke and his wife, who, so soon as they had recovered from the acclimating fever—which with them was unusually mild—entered upon the study of the language and the performance of such labors as their inexperience would admit. The prospects of the mission were brightened by this accession, but only for a brief season; for Mr. Mylne, who had suffered from repeated fevers, in the following May was obliged to return to the United States, and with a constitution hopelessly shattered, to withdraw from the service of the Board. The station at Edina was now committed to the care of Mr. Clarke, assisted by two of the emigrant colonists; while Mr. Crocker still dwelt at Madebli, engaged in preaching, teaching in the schools, and translating the Scriptures; in the latter of which he was assisted by the young prince already mentioned, the son of king Kober, the great chief of the Bassas. In September, 1839, the mission welcomed to Edina, Miss Rizpah Warren, a lady who had been appointed by the Board a missionary teacher. Early in the following summer she was married to Rev. W. G. Crocker, and went to reside with him at the village of Madebli, where she was soon attacked by the fierce fever of the climate and died in eight days, on the 28th of August, 1840. Mr. Crocker was first attacked, but recovering from the immediate violence of the disease, he was able, after the death of his wife, to escape to Cape Palmas, and thus to prolong his life by a change of climate. Thus enfeebled by disease and depressed by sorrow, he returned to Madebli in October, and again entered upon the labors of the mission. Early in 1840. Messrs. Alfred A. Constantine and Joseph Fielding offered themselves to the Board as missionaries either to the western coast or to the interior of Africa. An impression at that time prevailed that the climate of the interior might be found less injurious to European constitutions than that of the coast; and the British government was preparing an expedition to ascend the Niger for the purpose of introducing among the tribes of the country the arts and the commerce of Europe. In accordance with this impression, and the hopes which were inspired by the Niger expedition, the new missionaries were specially designated by the managers to the country lying upon that river. They accordingly sailed with their wives in September, 1840, and reached Edina on the 3d of December; and here they determined to pass the period of their acclimation, and also to await the results of the expedition that was about to ascend the Niger.

The African fever soon seized them with its accustomed violence, and within six weeks of their arrival, both Mr. and Mrs. Fielding became its victims. Mr. and Mrs. Constantine, though they survived the fever, were wholly unable to engage in the labors of the mission. They remained at Edina, hoping to regain their health by making excursions along the coast, and in which they were also able to extend their acquaintance with the character of its people. Meanwhile, the British expedition made its disastrous passage up the Niger, late in the summer of 1841. The frightful destruction of human life which attended it, and the reduced and disabled condition in which it returned to the coast, put an end to the hopes with which it had been undertaken, of finding a more salubrious climate in the interior. The design of establishing a branch of the mission there was entirely abandoned. Mr. Constantine, no longer able to endure the climate of Africa, returned with his wife to America in June, 1842, and soon after dissolved his connection with the Board.

In July of the preceding year, Mr. Crocker, in consequence of declining health, had returned to the United States. He had left the mission with the utmost reluctance, at what to him was the period of its greatest interest and promise. Much good had been accomplished; schools had been established, and were largely attended; prejudices and superstitions had been overcome; and more than all, the power of the gospel had been displayed in the conversion of several of the natives and a large number of the emigrants. The churches connected with the mission were multiplied and enlarged, and their members had begun to appreciate their obligations to spread the gospel among those who knew it not. A new station was also established at Bexley, a little town on the Mecklin, six miles from Edina; and a printing press had been received, and a printer only was wanted in order to put to press several portions of the New Testament, and other volumes which the missionaries had prepared in the Bassa language. Mr. Crocker, in hastening away, as he felt obliged to do in order to save the remnant of his enfeebled constitution, was compelled to abandon all these interests and prospects, over which he had long watched with the fondest care. After his departure, the entire charge of the mission devolved upon Mr. and Mrs. Clarke, who had under their direction three or four assistants employed either as teachers or preachers. The press was set in operation in September, 1842, under the superintendence of a printer obtained from the colony, and several books were printed for the schools, and also for circulation among the few who could read. Two schools were maintained, one at Edina and one at Bexley, containing, together, about 90 pupils, of whom 55 were natives. Companies were also assembled at both the stations on the Sabbath, and often on several evenings during the week, for instruction in the doctrines of the Bible and of Christian morals. An out-station was established at Duawi's town, a large village 30 or 40 miles in the interior, at which the chief promised to build a school-house, and to support a teacher, if Mr. Clarke would provide one. The school was begun by a young native, who had for several years been under the instruction of the missionaries.

Mr. Crocker, on reaching the United States, abandoned all hope of ever returning to the mission, so shattered did his constitution appear to have become. He however soon betook himself to the South, and after a residence of several months in a more friendly climate, he found himself so far restored that he again presented himself to the Board and asked to be sent back to his place in the mission which he had loved so well. His proposal was gladly accepted, and he sailed from Boston, January 1, 1844, in company with Mrs. Crocker, he having been married a little time before to Miss Mary B. Chadbourne, of Newburyport. He reached the coast on the 24th of February, apparently in excellent health; but on the second day after his arrival, while engaged in the services of the pulpit at Monrovia, he was fatally seized with a violent hemorrhage of the stomach, and died after an illness of two days. The fall of this rare missionary, in a manner thus unexpected, seemed to blight the prospects of the mission and almost to extinguish the hopes of its friends. Scarcely had the intelligence of his return been spread along the coast when the tidings of his death carried mourning to every village and almost every dwelling. He was a missionary of truly apostolic stamp, and his name deserves to be enrolled among the foremost of the heroic men who in different ages of the church have braved every peril and at length sacrificed life itself for the benefit of the benighted children of Africa.

Mrs. Crocker, thus early widowed on the desolate shore of a distant continent, attached herself to the family of Mr. and Mrs. Clarke, at Edina, and immediately set about preparing for the labors of the mission, on which she was soon able to enter. In January, 1845, the principal station was removed from Edina to Bexley, a locality deemed more favorable to health and nearer to the Bassa people; but a subordinate station was still maintained at Edina and new out-stations were commenced at Zuzo and at Little Bassa, the latter under the charge of the young Chief Kong Kober, or as he now chose to style himself Lewis Kong Crocker, in honor of his lamented teacher. At these several stations the assistants, under the guidance of the missionary and often associated with him, preached the Gospel to the people. The ladies of the mission were engaged in schools, while Mr. Clarke employed himself as much as possible in translating the Scriptures, and preparing books for instructing the natives in useful and religious knowledge. He compiled a dictionary of the Bassa language, and translated the gospels and some of the epistles of the New Testament, which by the close of 1846 were ready for the press; but which appear never to have been published.

The health of Mrs. Crocker was rapidly declining, and after one or two unavailing voyages along the coast she was obliged to abandon the mission and return to this country. Mr. and Mrs. Clarke, who had generally been blessed with better health than their associates, now began to experience the injurious effects of that pestilential climate. Mr. Clarke had often represented the condition of the mission, and appealed in the most earnest manner for its relief, but none had offered themselves for the perilous service, and the solitary missionary, fearing that if he went away, all would be lost, determined to remain at his post until his ability to labor was entirely exhausted. He carried forward the work of translating the Scriptures and preparing books; he increased the number of the schools, and perfected their organization, and in all the villages of the tribe he preached the gospel and urged the people to repent and be converted. These labors were attended with most beneficial results. The morals and manners of the people were greatly improved—all the interests of civilization were promoted, and many of the natives in the villages where the missionary had preached, embraced the Gospel and were baptized in accordance with its requirements. But the life of the missionary was rapidly wearing away; yet, though repeatedly urged by the Executive Committee to return to the United States, he lingered at his post in the hope that some one would at length come to take his place. The hope was constantly deferred, and without its being realized he was prostrated by disease, and compelled to leave the mission, in April, 1848. He died after a few days, at sea, on his passage to America, on the 26th of the same month.

Thus terminated another period of effort and trial, of hope and of disappointment for the Bassa people—a worthy succession of noble-hearted men had laid down their lives in the service of the mission till now none were left to carry forward the plans which had been formed and the labors which had been begun. Mrs. Crocker and Mrs. Clarke of necessity remained in the United States, and the interests of the mission were committed wholly to the care of native assistants. The station at Bexley was placed under the charge of Rev. Jacob Vonbrunn, assisted by two teachers, while that at Little Bassa was superintended by Lewis Koon Crocker. The schools at both were maintained, and were well attended. Public worship was also held on the Sabbath, and each year witnessed some accessions to the native church. The assistants proved themselves to be men of fidelity and discretion, but the mission, as was to be anticipated, was shorn of its energy by the bereavements it had sustained.

After many unsuccessful attempts by the Board to revive the mission, Rev. Messrs. J. S. Goodman and H. B. Shermer, were appointed for this purpose, and sailed with their families and Mrs. Crocker, from Norfolk, Va., November 27, 1852. They reached Bexley on the 15th of the following January, in excellent health, and were welcomed by the native assistants and the Christian disciples with enthusiastic delight. They found that the property of the mission had been carefully preserved by the assistants; that the schools and the public worship, on the Sabbath, were still well sustained, and that the persons who had represented the Board, during an interval of more than four years, had commanded the confidence and respect of their countrymen. Mrs. Crocker immediately put in requisition her previous attainments in the language and knowledge of the people, in reorganizing the mission, and the other members entered upon such labors as their circumstances would permit.

But the period of prosperity was again destined to be short, and as before, so now again, the little missionary band was soon to be invaded by death, and to be bereft of more than half its members within a year of their arrival in the country. Mrs. Shermer died at Bexley in September, 1853, and Mrs. Crocker at Monrovia, in November of the same year. Mr. Shermer was so reduced by repeated attacks of disease that he was soon obliged to return to the United States. Mr. and Mrs. Goodman are now the only missionaries remaining to occupy the stations, and prosecute the labors of the mission, and the health even of these has begun to yield beneath the noxious climate that perpetually reigns along that pestilential coast.—See Professor Gamwell's History of Am. Baptist Missions.—PROF. W. GAMWELL.

TABULAR VIEW.

AMERICAN PRESBYTERIAN MISSIONS.—The missions of the Board of Missions of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, (O. S.) in Africa are found in LIBERIA,—at Monrovia, Sinoe, Kentucky, and Setra Kroo; and near the Equator, on the island of Corisco. These are two distinct missionary fields, distant from each other more than a thousand miles. Each has its own features of interest, and both are highly important spheres of Christian benevolence.

The mission to Liberia was commenced in 1832, but has been repeatedly suspended, on account of the death or the return to this country of the missionaries. The Rev. Messrs. John B. Pinney and Joseph Barr were the brethren first appointed to this field. Mr. Barr was called suddenly to his rest by an attack of cholera in Richmond, Va., while on his way to embark for Africa. His removal was a serious loss, as he was a man qualified by nature and grace for eminent usefulness.

Mr. Pinney proceeded alone on his mission, and arrived at Monrovia, in February, 1833. After a few months spent in making the requisite inquiries and arrangements, he returned on a visit to this country to confer with the Committee concerning the plans of the mission, and to enlist recruits for its service. Previous to his return, two brethren had been accepted as missionaries for this field; and in November the missionary company, consisting of the Rev. Messrs. Pinney, Laird and Cloud, with Mrs. Laird, and Mr. James Temple, a colored young man, who was a candidate for the ministry, embarked at Norfolk for Liberia. Mr. and Mrs. Laird and Mr. Cloud were called to their rest within a few months after their arrival at Monrovia, leaving a memorial of piety singularly pure and devoted. Mr. Temple returned to the United States, and Mr. Pinney was again left alone in the mission. For a time he discharged the duties of Governor of the colony with great benefit to all its interests; but withdrawing from this post as soon as it was practicable for him to resign its duties, he resumed his missionary labors. Having been joined in September, 1834, by Mr. J. F. C. Finley, Mr. Pinney had a house built for the use of the mission on a small farm, at Millaburgh, a few miles from Monrovia. One or two colored assistants were engaged as teachers for schools among the natives; and Mr. E. Tytler, a colored man and a licensed preacher, was employed among the Bassas, a native tribe, at a station selected by Mr. Pinney on the St. Johns, eighteen miles from the sea.

The health of Messrs. Pinney and Finley having given way, they were compelled to return to this country in 1835. Mr. Tytler conducted a small school for two or three years longer among the Bassas, but no very encouraging results appear to have followed his labors. The mission was now virtually suspended.

Considerable hesitation was felt about resuming the work of missions in Africa. The loss of several valuable lives, and the failure of the health of other brethren, proved extremely discouraging to many persons. Yet others were clear in their convictions that the Church ought not to abandon this missionary field. The door was open, and all things invited the labors of the servants of Christ, with the exception of the deleterious climate. To guard against this, it was thought that a more healthy station could be found than those previously occupied, and it was considered expedient for missionaries to return after a few years to their native country, on a visit for the sake of health. Brethren of approved qualifications had offered themselves specially for this field. It appeared therefore to be the duty of the Board to make another effort to establish this mission.

Accordingly in 1839, the Rev. Oren K. Canfield and Mr. Jonathan P. Alward, with Mr. Pinney, the pioneer of the mission, made an exploring visit along the coast for nearly a hundred and fifty miles, during which they were led to select a station among the Kroo people, about half-way between Cape Palmas and Monrovia. An interesting account of the Kroos is given in the annual report of the Board for 1840. They are described as the most intelligent and enterprising of the natives on the western coast, having farms in a high state of cultivation, and always opposed to the slave-trade. Their distinctive name is probably derived from the fact that many of them are employed as crews on board of trading-vessels. This leads them to visit various parts of the coast, although they commonly return to their own country after a few years spent in this service.

The return of African fever soon forbade Mr. Pinney's attempt to resume his missionary labors; but the other brethren enjoyed good health, and after completing their exploration, they returned home, were married, and Mr. Alward was ordained; and then they proceeded, in February, 1841, to their chosen work, with many hopes of a useful if not a long life. These hopes were destined to be disappointed. Mr. Alward was called to his rest in the following April, and Mr. Canfield in May of the next year. They were both men of devoted piety, and were qualified to be eminently useful in the missionary work. Their bereaved companions returned to their friends in this country; and for a month the station was under the charge of a colored female teacher, who had accompanied Messrs. Canfield and Alward. The Rev. Robert W. Sawyer and his wife, who had arrived at Monrovia in December, 1841, then succeeded the brethren whom they had hoped to join at Settra Kroo; but in December, 1843, Mr. Sawyer was called to join them in the Saviour's presence. He was a man worthy to be their associate, both in the church on earth and in heaven. Previous to his death, schools had been established, and at one time thirty boys and six girls were boarded and lodged on the mission premises, enjoying the benefits of Christian instruction and example.

In the year 1842, three colored ministers became connected with the mission. One of these, the Rev. James Eden, had been for some years at Monrovia, where he was pastor of the Presbyterian church. This station he continued to occupy until his peaceful death, at an advanced age, in 1846. The Rev. Thomas Wilson and the Rev. James M. Priest reached Monrovia in 1842. Mr. Wilson's station was at Sinou, where, however, he was not permitted long to labor, having been called to his reward in 1846. He was a man of energy, and his talents and piety gave promise of no ordinary usefulness. Mr. Priest was at first stationed at Settra Kroo, but removed to the station at Sinou in 1846, where he has been much encouraged in his work. Mr. Washington McDonough, a colored teacher, was sent out also in 1842, and he has continued to be connected with a station among the Kroos until the present time.

At Settra Kroo the education of native youth continued to engage the attention of Mrs. Sawyer, who with great devotedness had remained at her post, although she was the only white woman in sixty miles of the station. She was assisted by Mr. McDonough, and by Cecilia Van Tyne, an excellent colored teacher, until the return of the latter for health in 1844. In the same year the Rev. James M. Connelly joined the mission, with whom Mrs. Sawyer was united in marriage in the following December. They continued at Settra Kroo, engaged in faithful efforts for the conversion of the people, but meeting with no marked encouragement, until they were compelled to return to this country by the failure of health in 1850. Since that time the station among the Kroos has been under the care of Mr. McDonough; a small school has been maintained, but no brighter days have been witnessed.

In January, 1847, the Rev. Harrison W. Ellis, a colored man, formerly a slave, who with his family had been redeemed from bondage by Christian friends in the South, was sent as a missionary to Monrovia. As he possessed considerable talent and energy, and had acquired more than ordinary learning for a person so unfavorably situated, it was reasonable to expect that his efforts to do good would prove encouraging to those who had taken such a kind and liberal interest in his welfare. He was for some time minister of the church in Monrovia, and gave some attention to a school; but he is not now connected with either. To the want of grace—more grace—may be ascribed his not fulfilling the expectations of his friends; but we would hope that he may yet become a useful laborer in the vineyard of the Lord. At Kentucky, a settlement a few miles from Monrovia, Mr. H. W. Erskine, a colored teacher and a licentiate preacher, has been stationed since 1849, and has met with much encouragement in his work. About twenty members are connected with the church at this station. Mr. B. V. h. James, another colored teacher, who had been for some years under the patronage of a society of ladies in New York for promoting education in Africa, became connected, at the instance of his former patrons, with the mission of the Board at Monrovia in 1849. He has continued to be faithfully and successfully employed in a large school at that place.

The Rev. David A. Wilson and his wife arrived at Monrovia in July, 1850. Mr. Wilson joined this mission with a special view to the work of Christian education, and he has had the charge of the Alexander High School, an academy established by the Board in 1849. The number of scholars has never been large, but their progress in study has evinced capacity to make respectable acquirements. This institution, it is hoped, will train up many young men for the Church and the State. It may form the germ of a college in future years. Besides teaching in this academy, Mr. Wilson preaches to the church, at present without a pastor. His work is one of vital importance to Liberia.

The repeated bereavements of the mission on the Liberia coast had led to the inquiry whether a more healthy location could not be discovered elsewhere; and the comparative exemption from fever enjoyed by the missionaries of the American Board on the Gaboon river, turned the attention of many to the region near the Equator. Accordingly, in 1849, the Rev. Messrs. James L. Mackey and George W. Simpson and their wives went out to form a new mission in this part of the African field. They were greatly aided in their inquiries by the counsels of the brethren connected with the American Board, and particularly of the Rev. J. Leighton Wilson, a respected minister of our body, who had been long a missionary—first at Cape Palmas and afterwards at the Gaboon—and who is now one of the Secretaries of the Board. After making full examination of various places, they were led to select the island of Corisco as their station. This is a small island, four miles long from north to south, and about the same in breadth at the south end, but at the north not exceeding a mile—having a circumference of about fifteen miles, and an irregular surface, diversified with narrow valleys and steep hills of no great height. It is fifty-five miles north of the equator, and from fifteen to twenty miles from the mainland. Its population is about 4,000, and its situation, midway in the sea-line of the Bay of Corisco, affords a ready access to people of the same language, the Benga, who live on the shores of the bay and on the sea-coast. In this part of Africa there are no roads, and journeys can be most conveniently made in boats along the coast or on the rivers, so that the situation of the missionaries on an island is rather an advantage than a hindrance to their intercourse with the natives. The chief inducement, however, for choosing Corisco as the site of the mission, was the hope that it would prove a healthy place. It contains few local causes of disease, while it is removed from the malaria of the coast on the mainland, and enjoys the atmosphere of the sea.

Thus far the missionaries have enjoyed remarkable health for foreigners in Africa. Mrs. Mackey was early called to her rest by a disease not connected with her new abode. Mr. and Mrs. Simpson, in the mysterious providence of God, were lost at sea with all on board the ship except a native sailor, their vessel having been struck by a typhoon. This sad event occurred in April, 1851, causing great sorrow to the friends of this new mission. The other missionaries—Mr. Mackey, and Miss Sweeny, who embarked for Corisco in August, 1851, and was married to Mr. Mackey in 1852, and the Rev. George McQueen, Jr., who joined the mission in the same year—have all enjoyed good health. The Rev. Messrs. Edwin T. Williams and William Clemens and their wives sailed for Corisco in August, 1853.

Small schools for boys and girls have been opened, religious worship has been conducted on the Lord's-day, and Mr. Mackey has exerted a happy influence over the natives by his medical skill. Already many of their superstitious practices have been abandoned, the Sabbath is in some degree honored, and the influence of the mission is visible in the improved conduct of the people. The principal employment of the missionaries, however, has been the acquisition of the native language. Some interesting tours have been made on the mainland, one extending nearly one hundred and fifty miles into the interior, which have tended to confirm the hope that this mission will afford a door of entrance to a very large population. Its location on an island may remind the reader of the celebrated island of Iona, on the borders

Scotland—the home of a Presbyterian and missionary clergy in the sixth century. May it also become to Africa what Iona was to

AMERICAN BOARD.—On the Sabbath evening following the meeting of the Board in 1833, Rev. John Leighton Wilson, their first missionary to Western Africa, received his instructions, in the presence of a numerous audience, in the First Presbyterian church in Philadelphia; and on the 24th of November following, he embarked at Baltimore, in company with Mr. Stephen R. Wyncoop, to explore his future field of labor. After examining the coast from Grand Cape Mount to Cape Palmas, a distance of 300 miles, they fixed on Cape Palmas as the site of the mission, and returned to this country, arriving at New York, April 13, 1834. In the commencement of this mission, the committee instructed their missionaries to have a primary regard to the preservation of health and life, and to extend their operations gradually, as their knowledge, experience, ability, and the blessing of God should enable them to do so. The object of this mission was, to prepare the way for an extensive system of operations among the populous nations of Western Africa.

Mr. and Mrs. Wilson, with a colored female, embarked from New York, Nov. 4, 1834, and arrived at Cape Palmas the following month, where they were received by the native population with joyful acclamations. The frame house, which Mr. Wilson had carried out with him on his former visit, he found erected on the spot he had selected, and furnished. They were subjected, during their acclimation, to considerable suffering from fever, Mrs. W. having had two attacks, and Mr. W. three, the last of which brought him to the borders of the grave. After their recovery, they enjoyed good health. Schools were commenced, and by the following year, Mr. W. had prepared a small elementary book in the native language.

On the 25th of December, 1836, Rev. David White and his wife, and Mr. James, a colored man, and a printer, arrived, as a reinforcement. In about a month after their arrival, Mr. and Mrs. White both died of fever; but they expressed no regret, in the prospect of death, that they had devoted themselves to Africa. Mr.

and Mrs. Wilson were prosecuting their labors, with good health, comfort, and success. During the year, Mr. W. made three tours of exploration in the interior, performing his journeys mostly on foot. Their boarding school numbered 50, one-fourth of whom were females. One boy gave evidence of piety, and others were inquiring. In April, there were four or five candidates for admission to the church. In 1837, Mr. Wilson succeeded, by his judicious interposition and influence, in suppressing a tumultuous rise of the native population against the colonists, before it resulted in bloodshed. And about this time, he commenced preaching to a native congregation of about 600. But this mission, in common with others, suffered from the crisis, which occasioned a reduction of the appropriations to the missions. Two of the day schools, and one-third of the boarding scholars in the seminary, were dismissed. The effect of this was disastrous upon the mission, the natives not being able to appreciate the cause.

Dr. A. E. Wilson having left the mission in South Africa, on account of the war between Dingaan and the Dutch boers, arrived with his wife at Cape Palmas, Oct. 4, 1839. Their attacks of fever, in the process of acclimating, were slight, and the mission generally enjoyed good health. Two native youths were admitted to the church during the year, and others were in an inquiring state of mind. Early in September, 1840, Dr. and Mrs. Wilson commenced a new station at Fishtown, ten or twelve miles from Fair Hope, the original and principal station. There were, also, three out-stations, and six preaching places connected with the mission. The church numbered 23, 12 of whom were natives. Religious knowledge was increasing, and many had discarded their greegrees. Yet, there was great apathy on the subject of religion. On the 13th of October, 1841, Dr. A. E. Wilson died of an epidemic dysentery, meeting death with much cheerfulness and joy. Stephen Williams, also, a native African, employed as an interpreter, died of the same disease, and in a similar state of mind. Mrs. Wilson removed to Fair Hope, and took charge of the female department of the seminary. On the 3d of February, 1842, Rev. Messrs. Walker and Griswold, with Mrs. Walker, joined the mission at Cape Palmas. Up to this time, the amount of printing in the native language, at this mission, was 2,252,132 pages. Mrs. Walker died of fever, May 2, 1842, her chief concern being lest her death should deter others from coming to the field.

But this mission experienced no small embarrassment, from being situated within the bounds of the colony. The native teachers and pupils, though from distinct tribes, and owing no fealty to the colony, were required to do military duty; and it became obvious that the leading object of the colony, and that of the mission, in respect to the natives of Africa, were far from being the same. There was also too much reason to believe that the colonists, as a body, regarded the missionaries and their enterprise with jealousy and ill-will. And, as it never entered into the plan of the West African mission that its principal operations should long be at Cape Palmas, it was determined to seek a location elsewhere; and, accordingly, Messrs. Wilson and Griswold, on the 17th of May, commenced a voyage eastward, with this object in view; and, after touching at a number of points, fixed on a location at the mouth of the Gaboon River, which seemed decidedly more favorable than any other they had seen. Though so near the equator, the climate at the Gaboon is more salubrious than at Cape Palmas.

The chiefs received them in a friendly manner, and they selected a site about eight miles from the mouth of the river, and 20 north of the equator. As soon as the necessary arrangements could be made, the mission was removed to this place, the stations at Fishtown and Rocktown being transferred to the Episcopal Missionary Society. At the new station, the first school was opened in July, 1842, with 15 pupils; and in the course of a year, three schools were established, with 50 pupils, and public worship was held at the station, and at three other towns, within the distance of three miles, where the people assembled in good numbers. They appeared friendly, and one head man renounced his greengreases in presence of the people of his town, and had them sunk in the river. They rested from labor on the Sabbath, and such was their regard for the commandment that they refused to furnish wood for a British war steamer on that day.

On the 23d of August, 1843, Mr. Griswold and Mrs. M. H. Wilson were united in marriage. On the 1st of January, 1844, Rev. Messrs. Campbell and Bushnell sailed from Boston for this mission, and arrived at Cape Palmas on the 9th of March, where they were both taken with the acclimating fever, of which Mr. Campbell died. Near the close of 1843, Mr. Griswold commenced a new station at Oshunga, Prince Glass's town, where a boarding-school for girls was opened with six pupils. The people were anxious for schools, and at King Duka's town, had built a school-house and residence for the teacher. This people had made considerable advances in civilization.

July 21, 1843, the members of the church who had removed from Cape Palmas, with a few others, met and organized themselves into a church, adopted articles of faith, and elected Mr. Wilson their pastor. On the 30th, B. B. Wisner, a native of Cape Palmas, was admitted to the church, and the Lord's Supper administered for the first time. The church consisted of fifteen members, of whom seven were native Africans. July 14, 1844, Mr. Griswold rested from his labors; and Mrs. Griswold, whose health was suffering from the climate, returned to the United States.

In July, 1845, Prince Glass's town was bombarded by a French brig-of-war, and taken possession of by armed men, the natives having fled to "the bush." The missionaries were exposed to great danger, both from cannon balls and musket shot, which were scattered profusely on their premises, and with apparent design. After this, the French admiral spent nearly three months at the Gaboon, without having any intercourse with the mission; but in February, 1846, the commander expressed his regret that the mission premises had been endangered; and in the following summer, Commodore Read, of the frigate United States, arrived off the mouth of the river, and during his stay, Mr. and Mrs. Wilson received much kindness from him; and he left a letter to the French admiral, which was delivered to him in September, and after that, they received the most civil treatment from the French officers and the local authorities. The Roman missionaries brought there by their ships of war, did not appear to be doing much.

The Committee have adopted a rule, in relation to this mission, similar to the one adopted by the Church Missionary Society, allowing a periodical return of the missionaries to their native land, to recruit their health; and in accordance with this rule, Mr. and Mrs. Wilson visited this country in 1847. Their visit was highly useful; and in June of the following year, they returned to their field of labor, with the greatest possible cheerfulness, accompanied by Rev. Messrs. Preston and Wheeler, and Mrs. Preston, as a reinforcement. April 23, 1848, Mrs. Walker departed this life, two months after the birth of an infant. She never regretted having gone to Africa. Early in the morning of the day of her death, Mrs. Walker sent for the head men in the towns, and they came, and wept like children; and nearly every man, woman, and child came, feeling that they were losing one of their best friends. She was followed, the last of January, 1849, by Mrs. Griswold, who was suddenly called home, speaking sweetly and confidently of her Savior, in her lucid moments, and manifesting entire submission to His will. February 25, 1850, Mrs. Bushnell entered into peaceful rest, she having returned from her visit to the United States, though in a consumption, that she might finish her course in the beloved field of her missionary labor.

In 1849 and 1850, the mission was reinforced by the arrival of Rev. Mr. Best and Dr. Ford, the former about six months before the latter. Mr. and Mrs. Preston, who had arrived in 1848, had commenced a new station among the Bakali, about 25 miles above Baraka, in August, 1849. Messrs. Wilson and Bushnell preached in Mpongwe, and Mr. Walker in Mpongwe and Bakali; and in these dialects, the Gospel was preached in ninety villages, in 1849. Eleven members were received to the church in that year. But polygamy, in its lowest forms, was found to be a great hindrance to the Gospel, and the evil was greatly aggravated by the introduction of American rum, which was exerting a most pernicious influence along the coast.

Rev. Mr. Porter and his wife arrived as a reinforcement, June 6, 1851; and early in the following year, Messrs. Walker and Preston returned to their field of labor. The Gospel of St. John, in Mpongwe, translated by Mr. Bushnell, was printed in New York, in 1852, under his superintendence, while on a visit to this country for his health. Mr. Wilson, being on his periodical visit to this country, was declared by physicians to be under the influence of a chronic disease, unfitting him for a longer residence at the Gaboon. He accordingly accepted the appointment of a secretaryship in the General Assembly's Board of Missions. The Committee, in their annual report for 1853, bear honorable testimony to his excellence as a missionary, and express their deep regret for the loss of his valuable services.

Early in 1851, the brethren at Baraka suffered from an unusual prevalence of fever. Mr. Porter, who had recently arrived, was called away by means of it on the 6th of July. He died in the full faith and consolation of the Gospel, and Mrs. Porter followed him on the 16th of the same month. Both of them said that they did not regret having joined the mission, and hoped that their early death would not deter others from entering the field. The Committee say, in their report for 1853, that the actual danger to life, as the Gaboon mission is now conducted, is not greater there than in many other missions, which awaken but little apprehension.

The labors of this mission are directed to three communities, each probably the representatives of migrations from the interior: the Mpongwes, Bakales, and Pangwes. The last of these have but recently made their appearance. The country has been explored to some distance in the interior, and found to be hilly and apparently salubrious; and the way is open for missionary efforts among numerous friendly tribes; but laborers are wanting, to enter in and reap the harvest. The labors of the mission have been, to a great extent, preparatory; and its direct results are not so clearly seen, as they will probably be a few years hence.

The report of the mission for 1853, represents the health of the missionaries to have been generally good throughout the year. And, though a spirit of opposition had begun to manifest itself among those who do not like the restraints of Christianity, yet, the truth is making progress. The intercourse of the missionaries with the people and with the government has been most friendly throughout the year. But, owing to the diminished force of the mission, they have been able to occupy but two stations.

UNITED PRESBYTERIAN SYNOD OF SCOTLAND.—When the converted negroes of Jamaica obtained their freedom, their thoughts were at once directed to their heathen friends in Africa. Many said, "We must carry the gospel to Africa." The missionaries constituting the Jamaica Presbytery, representing the Scottish Missionary Society, the United Secession Church, and the Scotch Free Church, entered fully into the feelings of the colored people around them, and resolved to embody them in action. Old Calabar was selected as their field of labor, the King and chiefs having sent a formal request that a mission might be commenced among them. The Secession Synod having also sanctioned the movement, Rev. Mr. Waddell was designated to take charge of the enterprise. He accordingly proceeded to Scotland, and was soon followed by five others. One of these was an Englishman, who had lived eighteen years in Jamaica, a printer by trade; another was his wife, a colored woman; another was a negro lad, about sixteen years of age; the remaining two were both persons of color. A merchant of Liverpool granted the free use of a fine schooner, the Warree, to the mission as long as she should be wanted; and he also subscribed £100 to keep her in a sailing condition.

The mission sailed from Liverpool, January 6, 1846; and arrived at Fernando Po, April 3. They proceeded with as little delay as practicable to Old Calabar, and were cordially received by the natives. On the 6th of May they opened a school in Duke Town, about fifty miles from the mouth of Old Calabar River, in a house of King Eyamba. Every thing seemed to be propitious.

This mission has been prosecuted with considerable success. In 1853, it had three stations, Rock Town, Duke Town, and Old Town. Its prospects are becoming more and more favorable. A few have applied for baptism, but, at the latest dates, none had been admitted to the ordinance. The number of scholars in the schools was about 200. There were connected with this mission, in 1852, ten European agents, including females, four of the number being ordained missionaries. From the beginning the missionaries have publicly preached the word on the Sabbath, and already several atrocious customs have fallen before its influence, among which is the use of the poisoned nut, as a test of witchcraft. The missionaries have made several exploring tours into the interior; and they say that these regions present a wide field for missionary labor; that they are easy of access, by water communication on the rivers; and that the country becomes more elevated, and the atmosphere purer and more bracing, in proportion to the distance from the coast.

AMERICAN EPISCOPAL MISSION.—The Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, as early as the year 1822, entertained the design of establishing a mission in Western Africa, and considerable sums were collected for the purpose. But the design was frustrated chiefly through the difficulty of obtaining suitable men, till 1834, when it was determined to establish a school at Cape Palmas, and Mr. James M. Thompson, secretary to the colonial agent, with his wife, were appointed teachers; and the Maryland Colonization Society made a grant of land, as a site for the mission, about two miles from the town of Harper, on the main government road leading to the Cavalla river. The situation is pleasant and salubrious, and well adapted to a manual labor school. The work of preparation was immediately commenced, the land was cleared, and suitable buildings erected.

In March, 1836, Mr. and Mrs. Thompson commenced a school in a small building, near their residence in the town of Harper, with 20 to 30 scholars. In the summer of this year, Mr. John Paine and Rev. L. B. Minor, of the Theological Seminary at Alexandria, Va., were appointed to this mission. Rev. Thomas S. Savage, M. D., who had the advantage of several years' practice as a physician, preceded them, in order to become acclimated and prepare for their reception before their arrival. Messrs. Minor and Payne, after spending some time in presenting the cause to the churches, and collecting funds, arrived at Cape Palmas, on the 4th of July, 1837. They found that Mr. Thompson had made a good commencement, having three acres of land under good cultivation, with a small thatched house on the premises, but still residing at Harper.

The Cape itself was at this time mostly occupied with houses belonging to the Agency, and older colonists. Commencing with the main land was a native town, of about 1,500 inhabitants. The houses or huts were constructed of narrow strips of boards, four or five feet in height, three or four inches wide, and half an inch thick, placed perpendicularly in the ground, arranged in the form of a circle. On this is placed the roof, made of palm leaves, running high up to a point, like a sugar-loaf. This town had its gree-gree place, where some sort of religious ceremonies were performed, said to be addressed to the Devil.

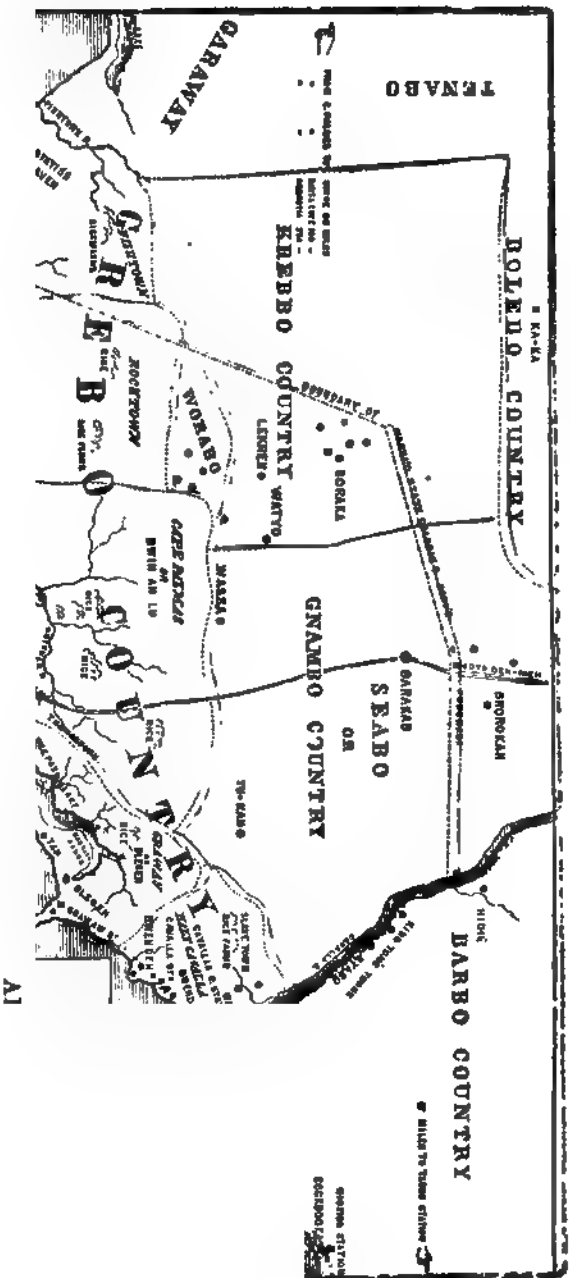

March 4, 1837, Dr. Savage, with the mission family, removed from the Cape, and took possession of the mission house at Mount Vaughan, as the station was named, after the foreign secretary of the society. The missionary operations were formally opened on Easter day, which was kept as a day of fasting, humiliation and prayer. Mr. and Mrs. Payne, and Mr. Minor, who arrived July 4, passed safely through the acclimating fever.

Dr. Savage made several tours among the native tribes, and found them friendly, and desirous of instruction. It was supposed that, within 50 miles, there were 70,000 accessible to missionary effort; all of whom belonged to one stock, and spoke dialects of the same language, (Grebo.)

The care of the newly arrived missionaries, during their acclimation, together with the responsibilities and labors of the mission, so affected the health of Dr. Savage, as to make it necessary for him to return to the United States, which he did in June, 1838. But he expressed the firm belief that, under different circumstances, his health would have continued good. He did not regard the climate as fatal to the white man's health. "With a moderate share of prudence," he says, "we can live here, and enjoy good health."

In 1838, Mr. E. S. Byron, of Boston, was sent out as a teacher. Dr. Savage having been united in marriage with Mrs. Metcalf, of Fredericksburg, Va., returned with his wife and Mr. George A. Perkins and wife, missionary teachers to Cape Palmas, where they arrived on the 19th of January, 1839. Mrs. Savage was removed by death on the 16th of April following.

The mission was embarrassed by the jealousies between the natives and the colonists: the missionaries being identified with the latter, found it difficult to gain access to the natives. This led them to the conclusion that, in the selection of mission stations, they should disconnect themselves from the colonies, and hold themselves neutral between the natives and colonists.

Two unsuccessful attempts had been made to establish a station at Garraway, a native town about 30 miles to the windward of Cape Palmas. It was opposed by the Bushmen, on the ground that the effect of it would be to stop the trade in rum. At the leeward, they succeeded in establishing two out-stations, with teachers in each.

Mr. Thompson, the colored teacher, who commenced the mission, died of a protracted and painful illness, which he bore without a murmur, and departed in the exercise of a firm hope and triumphant faith in the Redeemer. Mr. Minor returned to the United States for his health. On the 23d of January, 1840, he was united in marriage to Miss Mary Stewart, of Baltimore, and on the 15th of February, they sailed for Africa, accompanied by Rev. Joshua Smith, who was sent out by the Board to labor among the colonists.

This year, the mission commenced the formation of a native town, near the principal station, to be composed of such native families as were willing to abandon their superstitious and idolatrous practices, and come under the influence of Christianity and civilization. In this town, those educated at the mission afterwards settled; and it soon began to assume an appearance of civilization.

In 1839, three years from its commencement, there were in connection with the mission, nine missionaries and teachers, three stations, 70 native children in schools, a church of 17 members, and a population of 10,000 or 12,000, whom they were reaching with their instructions. Rev. Dr. Savage was rector of the Church at this station, by whom two services were held on the Sabbath. A Sunday school was held in the chapel for the colonists, and another for the children and other members of the mission; and religious services were regularly held at the out-stations and native towns.

For some time previous to March, 1840, an unusual seriousness had been observed at the principal station, which continued to increase; and in April, nineteen appeared to give evidence of a saving change. Many were inquiring the way of life; and at the station at Cavalla, unwonted attention to the word was manifested, and there was one case of deep conviction.

In 1841, a new station was commenced by Rev. Mr. Minor, at Taboo, on the coast, about 40 miles to the leeward, and beyond the bounds of the colony, where the people expressed a strong desire for a mission. The station at Garraway was abandoned, and the teacher removed to Rockbookah, the capital of the Bahbas, whose chief had two sons in the school.

The committee, in their report for 1842, complain of the restrictions put upon the mission, by the colonial government, and of their compulsory laws, requiring military duty of the youth in the schools, as threatening the mission with serious difficulties.

The year 1841 was a time of unusual sickness, both among missionaries, colonists, and natives, though less fatal than at some other times. During this sickness, Mr. Smith, at Cavalla, was roused early one morning by an unusual noise, and on looking out, saw men, women, and children, running towards the woods, shouting and making various noises, and when they seemed to reach the end of their race, the report of two guns was heard. On inquiry, he was informed that the native doctors had directed the people to beat their houses with sticks, and chase away the sickness to the bush!

In 1842, death again invaded the missionary circle. Miss Coggeshall, who had recently arrived, was stricken down, after a short illness. Rev. Dr. Savage had been united with Miss M. V. Chapin; who, after entering on her duties, and advancing the female department of the high school at Cape Palmas to a high degree of prosperity, was suddenly called to her rest, cheerfully yielding up her spirit to the Saviour whom she served. The following year, Rev. Mr. Minor, whose health had for some time been declining, was removed by death, uttering, with his last breath, prayers for the mission, and exhortations to his brethren to "go forward." Mrs. Minor returned to this country. Rev. Dr. Savage visited this country for his health, and returned with a reinforcement, consisting of Rev. E. W. Henning and wife and two female teachers. The reports of the missionaries this year were decidedly favorable, the divine blessing having followed their labors.

The report for 1846, in a review of the mission the 10th year from its commencement, says, "the result of past efforts is beginning to show itself in the growing up of a generation of young persons educated in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, who are already rendering assistance in the mission, and from among whom we may expect, at no distant day, to select candidates for the ministry." There were then 24 persons, including native assistants, engaged in the mission. Religious services were regularly held in five different places, and other points were frequently visited. The boarding schools contained about 150 children. More than that number attended the Sunday schools, and about 1500 were regular hearers of the gospel. The number of communicants was about fifty.

Since that time, the mission has been steadily progressing, without many marked incidents requiring notice. In 1846, the mission was again bereaved by the death of Rev. E. J. P. Messenger, of the acclimating fever, soon after his arrival, and also of Mrs. O. I. Patch.

days, at sea, on his passage to America, on the 26th of the same month.

Thus terminated another period of effort and trial, of hope and of disappointment for the Bassa people—a worthy succession of noble-hearted men had laid down their lives in the service of the mission till now none were left to carry forward the plans which had been formed and the labors which had been begun. Mrs. Crocker and Mrs. Clarke of necessity remained in the United States, and the interests of the mission were committed wholly to the care of native assistants. The station at Bexley was placed under the charge of Rev. Jacob Vonbrunn, assisted by two teachers, while that at Little Bassa was superintended by Lewis Kong Crocker. The schools at both were maintained, and were well attended. Public worship was also held on the Sabbath, and each year witnessed some accessions to the native church. The assistants proved themselves to be men of fidelity and discretion, but the mission, as was to be anticipated, was shorn of its energy by the bereavements it had sustained.

After many unsuccessful attempts by the Board to revive the mission, Rev. Messrs. J. S. Goodman and H. B. Shermer, were appointed for this purpose, and sailed with their families and Mrs. Crocker, from Norfolk, Va., November 27, 1852. They reached Bexley on the 15th of the following January, in excellent health, and were welcomed by the native assistants and the Christian disciples with enthusiastic delight. They found that the property of the mission had been carefully preserved by the assistants; that the schools and the public worship, on the Sabbath, were still well sustained, and that the persons who had represented the Board, during an interval of more than four years, had commanded the confidence and respect of their countrymen. Mrs. Crocker immediately put in requisition her previous attainments in the language and knowledge of the people, in reorganizing the mission, and the other members entered upon such labors as their circumstances would permit.

But the period of prosperity was again destined to be short, and as before, so now again, the little missionary band was soon to be invaded by death, and to be bereft of more than half its members within a year of their arrival in the country. Mrs. Shermer died at Bexley in September, 1853, and Mrs. Crocker at Monrovia, in November of the same year. Mr. Shermer was so reduced by repeated attacks of disease that he was soon obliged to return to the United States. Mr. and Mrs. Goodman are now the only missionaries remaining to occupy the stations, and prosecute the labors of the mission, and the health even of these has begun to yield beneath the noxious climate that perpetually reigns along that pestilential coast.—See Professor Gamwell's History of Am. Baptist Missions.—PROF. W. GAMWELL.

AMERICAN PRESBYTERIAN MISSIONS.—The missions of the Board of Missions of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, (O. S.) in Africa are found in LIBERIA,—at Monrovia, Sinoe, Kentucky, and Settra Kroo; and near the Equator, on the island of Corisco. These are two distinct missionary fields, distant from each other more than a thousand miles. Each has its own features of interest, and both are highly important spheres of Christian benevolence.

The mission to Liberia was commenced in 1832, but has been repeatedly suspended, on account of the death or the return to this country of the missionaries. The Rev. Messrs. John B. Pinney and Joseph Barr were the brethren first appointed to this field. Mr. Barr was called suddenly to his rest by an attack of cholera in Richmond, Va., while on his way to embark for Africa. His removal was a serious loss, as he was a man qualified by nature and grace for eminent usefulness.

Mr. Pinney proceeded alone on his mission, and arrived at Monrovia, in February, 1833. After a few months spent in making the requisite inquiries and arrangements, he returned on a visit to this country to confer with the Committee concerning the plans of the mission, and to enlist recruits for its service. Previous to his return, two brethren had been accepted as missionaries for this field; and in November the missionary company, consisting of the Rev. Messrs. Pinney, Laird and Cloud, with Mrs. Laird, and Mr. James Temple, a colored young man, who was a candidate for the ministry, embarked at Norfolk for Liberia. Mr. and Mrs. Laird and Mr. Cloud were called to their rest within a few months after their arrival at Monrovia, leaving a memorial of piety singularly pure and devoted. Mr. Temple returned to the United States, and Mr. Pinney was again left alone in the mission. For a time he discharged the duties of Governor of the colony with great benefit to all its interests; but withdrawing from this post as soon as it was practicable for him to resign its duties, he resumed his missionary labors. Having been joined in September, 1834, by Mr. J. F. C. Finley, Mr. Pinney had a house built for the use of the mission on a small farm, at Millsburg, a few miles from Monroemigrants who left the United States, at the commencement of the Liberian Colony, were several members of the Methodist E. Church, and with them several local preachers. On their arrival in Liberia they at once set up those religious services with which they had been familiar in this country. They built places of worship and held their class and other meetings. But they desired regular ministerial help, and the church in this country became increasingly interested in their case, until at length, in 1832, the Rev. Melville B. Cox was appointed and sent forth as the first missionary of the Methodist E. Church to Africa. He arrived there 9th March, 1833, and though in feeble health, entered at once upon the duties of his mission. He gathered together all the members and officers of the church then in Monrovia, and organized a branch of the Methodist E. Church, under the authority of the General Conference in America. The Swiss mission at Monrovia having been broken up by the sickness and death of most of its agents, the remainder of the missionaries were ordered to Sierra Leone, and Mr. Cox purchased their premises, and was thus furnished with the means of at once entering upon his labors. His love for the heathen soon led him to devise means for preaching the gospel in the regions beyond the colony. The plan of action which he proposed as sketched by himself, was, "(1) To establish a mission at Grand Bassa; (2) Another at Sego, on the Niger; (3) To establish a good school at Monrovia, on the model of the Maine Wesleyan Seminary; and (4) Another mission either in the interior, or at Cape Mount. He held a camp-meeting commencing March 29, the first probably ever held on that continent; organized Sunday schools; communicated with the Missionary Board at home; and was proceeding with his projects of usefulness, when he experienced the first attack of the African fever on the 12th of April. He rallied, however, but again took cold and was again reduced, and on the 21st of July, this devoted missionary slept in Jesus. This result, however, had not come upon him unexpectedly. He had contemplated it as probable before he left the United States. But when his own ease or life was weighed against the salvation of Africa, he conferred not a moment with flesh and blood. He was willing to sacrifice all, if by so doing the great cause in which he engaged could thereby be promoted—joyfully willing that Christ should be magnified in his body whether by life or death. On his way south, before leaving the United States, he visited Middletown University, and on taking leave of a young friend there, he said to him, "If I die in Africa, you must come and write my epitaph." "I will," was the reply; "but what shall I write?" "Write," replied Mr. Cox, "LET A THOUSAND FALL BEFORE AFRICA BE GIVEN UP!" These words, so worthy a missionary of the Cross, have become a motto for many who have followed him, even to an early grave in Africa. He had been appointed to superintend the mission, and Rev. Messrs. Spaulding and Wright, with Miss Farrington, were commissioned as his assistants. But they were delayed and did not arrive in Liberia until the 1st of Jan., 1834, nearly six months after the death of Mr. Cox. He had left a request that Bro. Spaulding, on his arrival, should preach his funeral sermon from the text, "Behold, I die; BUT GOD SHALL BE WITH YOU."

His successors entered into his labors, but were soon attacked by the African fever, and only five weeks after her arrival in Liberia the estimable Mrs. Wright was laid beside Melville Cox, and on the 29th of the next month her husband was carried to the same humble resting place. Shortly after, Mr. and Mrs. Spaulding were obliged, by prostration of health, to sail for the United States, and Miss Farrington was thus left alone, resolved, to use her own words, to "offer her soul upon the altar of God, for the salvation of that long-benighted continent." In 1834 the Rev. John Seys was sent out, accompanied by Rev. Francis Burns and Unice Sharp, (both colored,) Mr. B. being a local preacher and Unice a teacher. They found on their arrival, 13 preachers, 6 teachers in the schools, and a membership of 191. This year missions were established at New Georgia, Edina, and at Grand Bassa. Considerable prosperity attended their labors, and at the close of the year they reported an accession to their numbers of 160, of whom 20 were native Africans; but three of the preachers had been removed by death, and 18 of the colonists had been cruelly massacred at Port Cresson, by king Joe Harris. Arrangements were also made for establishing a mission in the Condo country, and another at Bushrod Island. Dr. Goheen, as missionary physician, arrived with two teachers in 1837; and at the close of that year the statistics of the mission were reported as follows: 15 missionaries, one physician, 7 school teachers, 221 scholars, and 6 Sabbath schools with 300 scholars, the church members being 418. The work of God was extended by the establishment of four new stations, at Jacks Town, Sinoe, Junk, and Boporo. In 1838 a printing office and a periodical (Africa's Luminary) were established, and an academy under the charge of Mr. Barton, of Allegany College, was organized. A manual labor school was established at White Plains, for the purpose of giving instruction in the various agricultural and mechanical branches. The steady light which shone forth to the dark regions around them, in connection with the few missions which they had already established among the heathen tribes, led to many earnest invitations from chiefs and people to give them also the benefits of the gospel. Deputations would frequently arrive from such tribes as the Dey, the Goulah, the Pessah, the

Having been joined in September, 1834, by Mr. J. F. C. Finley, Mr. Pinney had a house built for the use of the mission on a small farm, at Millsburgh, a few miles from Monro-

the former lived two years, and then fell a victim to the fever. Mr. Pingree joined the mission in 1842, and then returned; and in 1845, Messrs. Benham, Hoyt, and Williams, with their wives, arrived; but Mr. Williams died in a month after his arrival; and the rest, enfeebled by disease, returned at different times. Mr. Bastion and his wife next went out, but Mrs. B. and their child died, and he returned. Now during all this time, but four of the colored preachers have died, though their numbers have been to the whites as ten to one. Nor have they been under the necessity of leaving Liberia to recruit their health.

The General Conference of 1852, arranged to send Bishop Scott to visit the mission and preside in the annual Conference there in 1853. He went, and spent more than two months there, and gave the whole work a thorough inspection, and made such arrangements as it is hoped will tend to the greater efficiency of the mission. Here, in substance, is a description of his first Sunday and first sermon in Africa, with other leading points in his report. "Sabbath morning came, and at the sound of the church-going bell I repaired to the place of worship, and there, to a well-clad, well-behaved, intelligent assembly, preached my first sermon in Africa, from the text, 'For the promise is unto you,' &c. I said it was an intelligent audience. I will describe it. There sat the President of Liberia, and his wife, each having a Bible and Hymn Book, (and this was the case with all present;) just beyond sat the Vice-President; in the next pew was the tall and fine-looking figure of Chief-Justice Benedict, and near him the Speaker of the House of Representatives. And there we had our first interview, in God's name, with our colored brethren in Africa. I visited all the settlements, except Marshall, in which churches are established. These are luminous spots, ray-ing out light along the dark coast of that continent. I also visited Bexley, Louisiana, Lexington, Piddington, and Mount Tubman; all interesting places, and concerning which I have many pleasing reminiscences. In my interview with the King of Cape Palmas, the King treated me as the father of all America, and said:— 'Merica been here twenty years and yet (alluding to the colonists and the natives,) we are two people. We want one school for both. I want bring our people (said he, suiting the action to the word,) half round; by and by, bring them whole round: not do this all at once.' The Government of the Republic of Liberia, which is formed on the model of our own, and is wholly in the hands of colored men, seems to be exceedingly well administered. I never saw so orderly a people. I saw but one intoxicated colonist while in the country, and I heard not one profane word. The Sabbath is kept with singular strictness, and the churches are crowded with attentive and orderly worshippers."

The Bishop also gives an account of the meeting of the Conference, and of the value of our African missions. He says, "At length the time of meeting the Conference arrived, and we entered on business. The Conference had its president and secretary, and proceeded to business with as much form and accuracy as we are accustomed to do at home. On Sabbath our religious exercises were held under the shade of two large tamarind trees, at the conclusion of which I ordained eight to the office of elder." After having surveyed the whole ground, I am well satisfied with the church in Liberia. While there I witnessed some of the clearest, brightest and strongest evidences of religion I ever became acquainted with in my life. The African mission is one of great promise to the church of God; it is not only destined to bless Liberia, but to pour the blessings of light and salvation all over the continent of Africa; and God designs to awaken and Christianize its millions through the agency of her own sons."

The Bishop enumerates the leading difficulties with which this mission has had to contend. The first is the want of missionaries who can speak the language of the natives, and the consequent necessity of still employing interpreters—then there is the custom of dashing (or making presents,) which the natives tenaciously endeavor to keep up; then there is the difficulty of polygamy which keeps hundreds from deciding for God; then their vicious domestic organization which makes the wives the mere slaves of their lazy husbands; then their superstitions, their groogrees and witches; and then there is the vice and debasement which the natives constantly contract in their intercourse with the ships and traders on the coast. Holding offices under government, and engaging in trade, by the preachers, used formerly to exist—but of late it is discontinued.—Annual Reports, and Missionary Advocate; National Magazine; London Watchman; Car's Life; Hoyt's Land of Hope.—REV. with his family had been redeemed from bondage by Christian friends in the South, was sent as a missionary to Monrovia. As he possessed considerable talent and energy, and had acquired more than ordinary learning for a person so unfavorably situated, it was reasonable to expect that his efforts to do good would prove encouraging to those who had taken such a kind and liberal interest in his welfare. He was for some time minister of the church in Monrovia, and gave some attention to a school; but he is not now connected with either. To the want of grace—more grace—may be ascribed his not fulfilling the expectations of his friends; but we would hope that he may yet become a useful laborer in the vineyard of the Lord. At Kentucky, a settlement a few miles from Monrovia, Mr. H. W. Erskine, a colored teacher and a licentiate preacher, has been stationed since 1849, and has met with much encouragement in his work. About twenty members are connected with the church at this station. Mr. B. V. h. James, another colored teacher, who had been for some years under the patronage of a society of ladies in New York for promoting education in Africa, became connected, at the instance of his former patrons, with the mission of the Board at Monrovia in 1849. He has continued to be faithfully and successfully employed in a large school at that place.

The Rev. David A. Wilson and his wife arrived at Monrovia in July, 1850. Mr. Wilson joined this mission with a special view to the work of Christian education, and he has had the charge of the Alexander High School, an academy established by the Board in 1849. The number of scholars has never been large, but their progress in study has evinced capacity to make respectable acquirements. This institution, it is hoped, will train up many young men for the Church and the State. It may form the germ of a college in future years. Besides teaching in this academy, Mr. Wilson preaches to the church, at present without a pastor. His work is one of vital importance to Liberia.

The repeated bereavements of the mission on the Liberia coast had led to the inquiry whether a more healthy location could not be discovered elsewhere; and the comparative exemption from fever enjoyed by the missionaries of the American Board on the Gaboon river, turned the attention of many to the region near the Equator. Accordingly, in 1849, the Rev. Messrs. James L. Mackey and George W. Simpson and their wives went out to form a new mission in this part of the African field. They were greatly aided in their inquiries by the counsels of the brethren connected with the American Board, and particularly of the Rev. J. Leighton Wilson, a respected minister of our body, who had been long a missionary—first at Cape Palmas and afterwards at the Gaboon—and who is now one of the Secretaries of the Board. After making full examination of various places, they were led to select the island of Corisco as their station. This is a small island, four miles long from north to south, and about the same in breadth at the south end, but at the north not exceeding a mile—having a circumference of about fifteen miles, and an irregular surface, diversified with narrow valleys and steep hills of no great height. It is fifty-five miles north of the equator, and from fifteen to twenty miles from the mainland. Its population is about 4,000, and its situation, midway in the sea-line of the Bay of Corisco, affords a ready access to people of the same language, the Benga, who live on the shores of the bay and on the sea-coast. In this part of Africa there are no roads, and journeys can be most conveniently made in boats along the coast or on the rivers, so that the situation of the missionaries on an island is rather an advantage than a hindrance to their intercourse with the natives. The chief inducement, however, for choosing Corisco as the site of the mission, was the hope that it would prove a healthy place. It contains few local causes of disease, while it is removed from the malaria of the coast on the mainland, and enjoys the atmosphere of the sea.

Thus far the missionaries have enjoyed remarkable health for foreigners in Africa. Mrs. Mackey was early called to her rest by a disease not connected with her new abode. Mr. and Mrs. Simpson, in the mysterious providence of God, were lost at sea with all on board the ship except a native sailor, their vessel having been struck by a typhoon. This sad event occurred in April, 1851, causing great sorrow to the friends of this new mission. The other missionaries—Mr. Mackey, and Miss Sweeny, who embarked for Corisco in August, 1851, and was married to Mr. Mackey in 1852, and the Rev. George McQueen, Jr., who joined the mission in the same year—have all enjoyed good health. The Rev. Messrs. Edwin T. Williams and William Clemens and their wives sailed for Corisco in August, 1853.

Small schools for boys and girls have been opened, religious worship has been conducted on the Lord's-day, and Mr. Mackey has exerted a happy influence over the natives by his medical skill. Already many of their superstitious practices have been abandoned, the Sabbath is in some degree honored, and the influence of the mission is visible in the improved conduct of the people. The principal employment of the missionaries, however, has been the acquisition of the native language. Some interesting tours have been made on the mainland, one extending nearly one hundred and fifty miles into the interior, which have tended to confirm the hope that this mission will afford a door of entrance to a very large population. Its location on an island may remind the reader of the celebrated island of Iona, on the borders part of it which lies near the coast is low, with numerous rivers running into each other, by which it is really divided into several islands. Ascending the Jong river some 30 or 40 miles from the ocean, we reach the high lands at Wela, or following the line of the Boom for a much greater distance, the highlands are reached as you enter the Boompe country. At the native town Tissana, or the mission station Mo-Tappan, there is a considerable fall of water, as there is also at Wela, on the Jong. At these places indian corn, beans, melons and many other kinds of vegetables that are common to the gardens of the United States are easily cultivated. Of some of them three or four successive crops are produced in the same season. Small villages, or African towns, are very frequent all along the numerous rivers. The population of these towns varies from 50 up to 1000, or more, inhabitants. There are also scores of sites of towns destroyed in the numerous wars instigated by the slave trade, that curse of Western Africa.

The general condition of the people of that part of Africa, before the establishment of the mission, was that of heathen. Many of the chiefs, however, are Mohammedans some of whom can read the Arabic readily, and possess parts of the Koran. The government of the country is generally in the hands of these men. The last few years has developed the existence of idolatry much more wide spread than the missionaries had previously any idea of. Many of their idols, of the most hideous and revolting form, have been voluntarily given up to the missionaries.

The history of this mission properly commences with the seizure of the schooner Amistad, by Lieut. Gedney, U. S. N., near the east end of Long Island, in 1839. He found on board the vessel about forty Africans and two Spaniards, one of whom declared himself the owner of the negroes and claimed the Lieutenant's protection.

After an examination before a judge of the United States District Court, for Connecticut, the Africans were committed to the jail at New Haven, for trial on a charge of murder on the high seas. When it was ascertained that they were recently from Africa, and had been illegally bought at Havana, to be carried to Principe, to be enslaved, and that they had risen upon their enslavers, and recovered their liberty, much interest was excited in their behalf. A few friends of freedom met at New York and appointed a committee to receive donations, employ counsel, and act as circumstances might require. Legal counsel were employed, native African interpreters were obtained, and a committee of gentlemen at New Haven undertook to secure suitable instruction for these unfortunate and benighted pagans.

Hon. John Quincy Adams, at the solicitation of the Committee, consented to act as senior counsel, and the cause was finally argued by him and Hon. Roger S. Baldwin before the Supreme Court of the United States, at the city of Washington, February and March, 1841. The following letter addressed to a member of the Committee, gives the result :

"WASHINGTON, 9th March, 1841

"The captives are free!

"The part of the decree of the District Court, which placed them at the disposal of the President of the United States, to be sent to Africa, is reversed. They are to be discharged from the custody of the Marshal—free.

"The rest of the decision of the courts below is affirmed.

"'Not unto us—not unto us,' &c.

"But thanks—thanks! in the name of humanity and of justice, to you. J. Q. ADAMS."

As these Africans had been instructed in the elements of knowledge, as particular care had been taken to enlighten them on the subject of Christianity, and as they all expressed a strong desire that some of their religious teachers should accompany them to their native land, the Committee deemed it a duty to make their return, after such a providential train of circumstances, the occasion of planting a mission in the heart of Africa. As the funds had been contributed by persons of various denominations, most of whom were of anti-slavery principles, it was thought proper to make the mission anti-slavery and anti-sectarian in its character. Accordingly the following resolution was adopted :

"Resolved, That it would be contrary to the feelings and principles of a large majority of the donors to the Amistad fund, and of the friends of the liberated Africans, to connect their return with any missionary society that solicits or receives donations from slaveholders."

A passage was secured for them in a vessel bound for Sierra Leone, and a farewell public meeting held in the Broadway Tabernacle, New York, Nov. 27, 1841; by the Union Missionary Society; when the instructions of the Committee were delivered by S. S. Jocelyn to the missionaries under appointment, viz., Rev. James Steele, Rev. William Raymond and Mrs. Raymond; and parting counsels were given to the Mendians, some of whom took part in the exercises.

They arrived at Sierra Leone, January 15, 1842, after a passage of fifty days. All their stores, tools and implements of agriculture were admitted free of duty, and even without examination. Governor Ferguson proffered every necessary assistance. Soon after arriving, Messrs. Steele and Raymond became satisfied of the impracticability of their reaching the Mendi country, and, ascertaining that part of the Amistads belonged to the Sherbro country, and that all were willing to go there, Mr. Steele, accompanied by Cinque and several others, visited Sherbro. King Henry Tucker, to whom they went, lived at Kaw-Mendi, (a town of the Sherbro) and seemed willing to receive the people into his territory. The conditions were, however, too hard to be accepted, and Mr. Raymond, with the Africans, spent the next rainy season at York, Sierra Leone. Mr. Steele was compelled by ill health to return to the United States.

In November, 1842, a location was selected for the mission about a mile below the village of Kaw-Mendi, and 160 square rods of land were obtained, half a mile on the river, extending a mile back, for which was paid an annual rent of $100.

On the arrival of the missionary and the Africans at Kaw-Mendi, the King ordered a swivel to be loaded and fired, as a token of joy. The women and girls began to sing and dance. A multitude of men, women and children flocked around to see the white woman, having never seen one before. In the morning, many people were drawn together by their singing and praying at family devotions. On Lord's day, Mr. Raymond held religious services, and preached his first sermon here from John iii. 16: "For God so loved the world," &c. The king attended, and seemed much impressed.

The influence of the mission on the slave-trade, on the king, and on the people, quickly became apparent. A flourishing school was soon in operation, and Mr. Raymond felt greatly encouraged. His language was, "This mission is evidently planted by God himself. I am more and more satisfied of it. It will prosper."

On the first Lord's day in January, 1845, he organized a church with five members. His cares and labors were great; but he was permitted to see fruits abounding amidst the difficulties with which the mission was surrounded.

A terrible war commenced in the Sherbro country in 1845. Many towns were burned. Hundreds fled from the scenes of war to the mission, as a place of refuge. The persons and property of all connected with it were respected. Its character as a place of freedom, peace, temperance, and Christianity, was kown far and wide. Rev. Henry Badger at that time wrote, "Did you ever hear of a mission being established in the midst of war? Here is one, and it has advanced during the war more than previously. A school has been formed, and is doing well. The Mission Establishment, at first regarded with much suspicion, is now looked upon with great respect. It is a sanctuary. And while other towns and places are consumed by fire, and their inhabitants destroyed by sword, or carried into slavery, this flourishes and improves."

After the death of Mr. Raymond, in Nov. 1845, the mission, with its school of over sixty children, was for eight months under the care of Thomas Bunyan, a native Mendian, who had previously acted as an interpreter and teacher. Two missionaries sailed from New York for the mission, April 8, 1848. One of them, Mr. Carter, died eight days after his arrival at the mission; the other, Geo. Thompson, labored there alone for two years, suffering much of the time from sickness. During this time, there was much deep religious interest manifested by those about the mission, and many were received into the mission church: the first one was Te-me, one of the girls taken in the Amistad. The next reinforcement consisted of Mr. and Mrs. Brooks, and Mar-Gru, another one of the girls taken in the schooner, who had been at school in Ohio. Mrs. Brooks died before reaching the mission. They were followed to Africa in Dec. 1850, by a company of eight; and Dec. 25, 1852, another company of seven newly appointed missionaries sailed from New York for that mission. Since that time, only one missionary has joined the mission.

BASLE MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—The Basle Missionary Society turned its attention to the Gold Coast in 1826; and four of its agents arrived at Christiansborg, near Akra, in 1828. Three of them soon died; and the fourth found himself under the necessity of taking the place of the Danish chaplain, who had also deceased, only to follow him, however, in 1831. In 1832 three other laborers reached Christiansborg; one of them, a physician, soon fell a victim to the climate; and another did not long survive. In 1835, Rüs, who alone remained, went to Akropong, which is a considerable place in the Aquapim mountains, north-east from Akra. He was kindly received by the king and his people, and he commenced his labors among them. Two fellow-laborers came to his aid in 1836, but both soon deceased. At length, after many disappointments, a new plan was adopted. Rüs (accompanied by Widmann, and a colored man who had been educated in Switzerland,) conducted twenty-four Christian negroes from Jamaica to Akropong, where they arrived in 1843. A chapel was erected at this place in 1844. This mission has been prosecuted to the present time; and at the anniversary of the Society, held July 6, 1853, its affairs were in a prosperous and hopeful condition. The number of laborers was 16, and the congregations had increased. The station at Christiansborg had been particularly favored. It has stations at Akropong, and at Ussu, (Danish Akra.)

It will be seen, by the foregoing statements, that a good beginning has been made in the evangelization of Western Africa. Many valuable lives have been sacrificed, in the attempt to plant the gospel on these inhospitable shores. But they have not been sacrificed in vain. If more than 13,000 souls, or a moiety of them, have been saved through the instrumentality of these missions, it would be worth the sacrifice of every missionary who has landed there. But, the results of these self-sacrificing labors reach far beyond what appears in these statistical tables. A large amount of preparatory work has been accomplished; native helpers have been raised up; communications have been opened into the interior, and the way prepared for establishing missions among a great number of large tribes, inhabiting the more elevated and healthy portions of the continent, who are in a more hopeful condition for missionary labors than those on the coast. And, experience has removed, in a great degree, the dangers of acclimation on the coast. A large number of the native languages have been mastered, and a number of them reduced to writing. A good beginning has also been made in the departments of translation and printing.

Rev. Dr. Krapf, of the mission of the Church Missionary Society in Eastern Africa, has made to the mission at Gaboon a deeply interesting proposal—the forming of a South African continental mission line, from the Gaboon to the starting point of their mission in the neighborhood of Zanzibar. North of the equator, this would be difficult, on account of the variety of languages and the hostility of the different tribes. But it is a remarkable feature of all the dialects south of the equator, spoken by the black man as distinguished from the Hottentots and Kaffres, that these dialects all have a common language for their basis. The people, likewise, are essentially one people in manners and customs. It has been discovered, that, by an intercourse of a few weeks, the natives of the eastern coast, and of the Gaboon, converse with each other. This great family of languages seems also to be remarkable for the excellence of its structure. The place of meeting on this continental mission line would be some one of the central mountains, supposed to divide the great basins from which flow the waters of the Nile, and of the Zaire, and of the shorter rivers running into the Indian ocean. These mountains may be 800 or 1000 miles from either coast; and it is a cheering fact that three or four hundred miles of the eastern portion have already been traversed by Dr. Krapf and his associates. The missionary aspects of the two opposite sides of the continent have some strong points of resemblance. On the east, a healthful upland was found much nearer the coast than was expected; and mountains are seen from more than one of the Gaboon stations. The shores of the Gaboon are healthful, compared with most rivers of Africa, but will probably not compare with the elevated table lands of the interior; and no more will the coast from the east. A thick jungle covers the plains and valleys on both sides, creating the necessity of traveling on foot. But the opening of the rivers to navigation, may, in a measure, obviate this. And the increasing desire for missionaries among the interior tribes, shows that Providence is opening wide the doors for the entrance of the gospel on every side.

AHMEDNUGGUR: The city of Ahmednuggur is situated on the table land of the Ghauts, in Hindoostan, in a plain 12 or 15 miles in extent each way, and is about 175 miles north-east from Bombay. It contains about 50,000 souls, and the population is increasing since it has become a military station. It was once the seat of the Mussulman power in this part of India, and appears, from its palaces, mosques, aqueducts, and numerous ruins, to have been a place of much splendor. It is four or five miles in circuit, and entirely surrounded by a high wall of stone and clay. It was occupied as a mission station by the American Board in 1831.

AHURIRI: A station of the Church Missionary Society in New Zealand.

AINTAB: A large garrison town on the northern frontier of Syria, in the pashalic of Aleppo. It is 65 miles north of Aleppo, 50 miles east of Scanderoon, and 30 miles west of Bir. It has a population of 35,000 to 40,000. It is one of the most interesting stations of the American Board among the Armenians.

AITUTAKI: One of the Hervey islands, and a station of the London Missionary Society.

AK-HISSAR: An out-station of the American Board among the Armenians; it is the ancient Thyatira, the seat of one of the Apocalyptic churches; population 7000.

AKRA: A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society in Africa, on the Gold coast, a short distance to the east of Cape Coast Castle.

AKROFUL: An out-station of the Wesleyans in West Africa. (See Annamaboe.)

AKROPONG: A station of the Basle Missionary Society, on Cape Coast, Africa.

AKYAB: The name of a district and a city in Arracan, one of the provinces of British Burmah. The city contains from 16,000 to 20,000 inhabitants. Since 1840 the city has been a station of the American Baptist Mission in Arracan.

ALBANY: A district and town in Sierra Leone, West Africa, occupied by the Wesleyan and Church Missionary Societies.

ALDERVILLE, in Upper Canada: A station of the Wesleyan Miss. Society among the Indians; commenced in '817; has now two missionaries, several out-stations, 80 members, an industrial school with 54 pupils, and over 700 attendants on public worship.

ALEPPO: A town of Syria, the capital of a pashalic situated in the vast plain which extends from the Orontes to the Euphrates. It is built on eight hills or eminences, and is three and a half miles in circumference, surrounded by an ancient strong stone wall forty feet high. It is a station of the London Jews' Society, and some Protestants are found among the Armenian and Greek population.

ALLAHABAD: A large city at the junction of the Ganges and the Jumna, in Northern India, a station of the Presbyterian Board.

ALLEN TOWN: Station of the Church Missionary Society among the liberated Africans in the river district of Sierra Leone, W. Africa, south-east of Freetown.

AMALONGUA: Station of the American Board among the Zulus, near Port Natal, in South Africa.

AMAPURA: The ancient capital of the Burman Empire, situated on the Irrawaddy, seven miles below Ava, the present capital. The government was removed in 1824.

AMBALA: A station of the Presbyterian Board in Northern India, nearly equi-distant from Lodiana, Saharunpur, and Sabatten.

AMBOYNA: One of the Molucca or Spice islands, in lat. 3° 41' south, and long. 128° 10' east. It belongs to the Dutch, and contains a population of 29,660. The Netherlands Missionary Society have a flourishing mission on this island. (See Indian Archipelago.)

AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS: Of all the foreign missionary boards and societies now preëminent among the benevolent institutions of the United States, the A. B. C. F. M. was first in the date of its organization. Yet it must not be supposed that the spirit of benevolence—or even what may be regarded as more specifically the missionary spirit—had previously no existence in the American churches. Nor must it be supposed that all the influence on the churches, which led them to enter on the foreign missionary work, was exerted by any one, or any few individuals. The missionary spirit is but the Christian spirit looking upon the unevangelized; and from the first settlement of New England there had been much of this spirit in the churches. Earnest, and by no means unsuccessful, efforts for the evangelization of the native Indian tribes, had been made by the Mayhews, Eliot, Sargent, Brainard, Wheelock, Kirkland, and many others, extending through a period of more than 160 years, from 1643 to 1808, before Mills or Hall, Judson or Newell, offered themselves as missionaries to the heathen.

About the commencement of the present century it began to be obvious that the missionary feeling was rising and extending in the United States, and would be likely soon to open for itself new channels of effort; and "no man was the leader of the movement;" God was working for his own cause. In 1799, the Massachusetts Missionary Society was formed at Boston. In 1804 the constitution was modified, and the object of the society was defined to be "to diffuse the gospel among the people of the newly-settled and remote parts of our country—among the Indians of the country, and through more distant regions of the earth, as circumstances shall invite and the ability of the society shall admit." Under this constitution this society, had the means been furnished it, might have sent missionaries to any of the "distant regions of the earth;" and some of the sermons preached at the annual meetings of the society, as also sermons before other missionary societies in the earlier years of this century, and especially one by Dr. Griffin before the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in 1806, urge the claims of the heathen, and the greatness and excellency of a universal missionary work, with eloquence and earnestness which have seldom, if ever, been surpassed. Dr. Parish, the preacher before this society in 1807, alludes to "five societies in Massachusetts for propagating the gospel," to "similar societies in all the states of New England," and to "missionary societies in the middle states," as then existing. The Connecticut Evangelical Magazine, commenced in 1800; the Massachusetts Missionary Magazine, commenced in 1803; the Massachusetts Baptist Missionary Magazine, commenced the same year; the General Assembly's Missionary Magazine or Religious Intelligencer, commenced in 1805; diffused among the churches much intelligence in regard to missionary operations in foreign lands. Mr. Norris, of Salem, when applied to by Dr. Spring, in 1806, to aid in endowing a Theological seminary at Andover, found himself embarrassed by a previous determination as to the use of his means. "My great object," he said, "is the foreign missionary enterprise;" and he gave $10,000 to the Theological school because convinced that the effort to establish it was one with this enterprise, for "we must raise up ministers if we would have men to go as missionaries." The same year, 1806, Robert Ralston remitted for himself and others of Philadelphia $3,357 to aid the Baptist Mission at Serampore. Dr. Carey, of that mission, acknowledged the receipt of $6,000 from American Christians in 1806 and 1807.

There were thus many indications of a missionary spirit in the churches of the United States. Still it is true, that as yet, "American Christians had never combined in any great enterprise or plan for spreading the knowledge of Christ, or advancing his kingdom; had never sent, from their shores, a single missionary, with the message of heavenly mercy, to any portion of the widely extended pagan world" abroad. The different efforts which "had been made for the benefit of some of the native tribes of the American forest" had been "scattered and transient," and "without any general union, or any expansive and systematic plan of operations."

In 1806, Samuel J. Mills became a member of Williams College. While a child he had heard his mother say, "I have consecrated this child to the service of God as a missionary," and from the time of his conversion, in 1802, he had ardently desired to engage in the missionary work. In college, while laboring faithfully to promote true piety among the students, he kept this work constantly in mind. In 1807 he invited Gordon Hall and James Richards to a walk, and led them to a retired spot in a meadow, where they spent all day in fasting and prayer, and in conversing on the duty of missions to the heathen. He was surprised and gratified to learn that the subject was not new to these brethren, but that their hearts were already set upon engaging in such a work. September 7, 1808, a society was privately formed at Williams College, by these and a few other pious students, the object of which, the constitution says, "shall be to effect, in the persons of its members, a mission or missions to the heathen." The 5th article provided that "no person shall be admitted who is under an engagement of any kind which shall be incompatible with going on a mission to the heathen;" and the 6th article was, "Each member shall keep absolutely free from every engagement which, after his prayerful attention, and after consultation with the brethren, shall be deemed incompatible with the objects of this society, and shall hold himself in readiness to go on a mission when and where duty may call."

Designing now so to operate on the public mind as to lead to the undertaking of a foreign missionary work, and proceeding with great modesty, and great practical wisdom, they republished and circulated some impressive missionary sermons, and opened a correspondence with some of the eminently wise and good men among the clergy of the country, such as Rev. Messrs. Griffin, Worcester, Morse, and Dana. With the same end in view, and to influence young men, one of the number transferred his relation to Middlebury College in Vermont. Mills visited Yale College, and some efforts were made at other institutions.

In the autumn of 1809 Richards became a member of the Theological Seminary at Andover, and "labored with diligence and success in promoting a spirit of missions among the students." Mills followed him to Andover in the spring of 1810, and Hall soon joined them. At least one other young man was there also, whose thoughts had been independently directed to the same great subject—Samuel Nott, Jr. "There seemed now to be," says one who was there, "a movement of the Spirit, turning the attention and the hearts of the students in the seminary to the condition of the perishing heathen." Several had already come, or soon came to the resolution of spending their lives in pagan lands, among whom were Adoniram Judson, Jr., and Samuel Newell. The faculty of the seminary were consulted and approved the design, and on the 25th of June, 1810, according to previous arrangement, Rev. Dr. Spring of Newburyport, and Rev. Samuel Worcester of Salem, met with the professors and a few others, for further consultation. It was thought the time for action had come, and the young men were advised to present their case to the General Association of Massachusetts, which was about to meet at Bradford. The next day Rev. Messrs. Spring and Worcester rode together in a chaise to Bradford, and during that ride, between those two men, "the first idea of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions was suggested; and the form, the number of members, and the name, were proposed." On Thursday, June 28th, Messrs. Judson, Nott, Newell, and Hall, came before the Association and presented a written paper in which they stated "that their minds had been long impressed with the duty and importance of personally attempting a mission to the heathen;" and they solicited the opinion and advice of the Association as to their duty, and as to the source to which they might look for support in their contemplated work. The subject was referred to a committee, who reported the next day, recommending "that there be instituted by this Association a Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, for the purpose of devising ways and means, and adopting and prosecuting measures for promoting the spread of the gospel in heathen lands." The report was adopted, and the following persons were chosen to constitute, in the first instance, that Board: His excellency John Treadwell, Esq., Rev. Timothy Dwight, D. D., Gen. Jedediah Huntington, and Rev. Calvin Chapin, of Connecticut; Rev. Joseph Lyman, D. D., Rev. Samuel Spring, D. D., William Bartlett, Esq., Rev. Samuel Worcester, and Dea. Samuel H. Walley, of Massachusetts.

The commissioners had their first meeting at Farmington, Connecticut, on the 5th of the following September, five only being present. A constitution was adopted, and officers were chosen. The Prudential Committee appointed consisted of William Bartlett, Esq., and Rev. Messrs. Spring and Worcester. Mr. Worcester was chosen Corresponding Secretary, and an address to the Christian public was prepared, accompanied by a form of subscription.

A beginning was thus made; but though the objects of the Board were regarded with favor by some liberal individuals, it was doubtful whether means could be very soon secured in this country to send out and support a distant mission. Yet four young men were ready and waiting to be sent. The eyes of the Prudential Committee were turned to the London Missionary Society, which was already in successful operation, and in Jan., 1811, Mr. Judson was sent to England to confer with the Directors of that society on various points, and to ascertain whether any satisfactory arrangement could be made for prosecuting the work of missions in concert; so that American missionaries might for a time receive their support in part from the London society without committing themselves wholly to its direction. No such arrangement, however, was made.

In June, 1812, an act of incorporation for the Board was obtained from the Legislature of Massachusetts. The second annual meeting was held at Worcester, Mass., Sept. 18, 1811; seven members being present. Donations to the amount of $1,400 had been received. Messrs. Judson, Nott, Hall and Newell were appointed as missionaries to labor under the direction of this Board; and it was resolved, as soon as practicable, to establish a mission in the East, attention being turned specially to the Burman Empire, and another in the West, among the Indians of this continent. Late in January, 1812, Messrs. Newell and Hall, who had been attending to medical studies in Philadelphia, returned hastily with the intelligence that a vessel was to sail from that port in about two weeks for Calcutta, and would accommodate the missionaries. The Prudential Committee immediately met. It was short notice, and only about 1,200 dollars were at their disposal; yet, on the 27th of Jan. they resolved to send out the four missionaries. Then another, Mr. Luther Rice, desired to join the mission, and they "dared not reject his request." Measures were at once taken to secure, if possible, the requisite funds, and in about three weeks, more than $6,000 was collected. The missionaries were ordained on the 6th of Feb., in the Tabernacle at Salem, and after some delay sailed, Messrs. Judson and Newell, with their wives, in the Caravan, from Salem, Feb. 19, and Messrs. Nott, Hall, and Rice, with the wife of Mr. Nott, in the Harmony from Philadelphia, about the same time.—See Tracy's History of the A. B. C. F. M.; Life of Dr. Worcester, Vol. II, Chap. 2; Memoir of Dr. Judson, page 39 and on; and Reports of the Board.

From this small beginning the Board has gone on until now its annual receipts are about $300,000, and it has under its care, in different parts of the world, near 400 missionary laborers, male and female, sent from this country, and more than 200 native helpers. The annual meetings, which are held in September, from being attended by seven members, as in 1811, or by nine as in 1812, in the parlor of a private dwelling, have come to be occasions of fully as deep and extensive interest as any annually recurring religious occasion in the United States. They commence usually on Tuesday afternoon and close in the forenoon of the next Friday. They are always open to the public, and can be held only in towns of considerable population, that lodgings may be furnished for the many hundreds who come together from every section of the country. The largest houses of worship are not sufficiently large to accommodate all who wish to hear, and usually on Wednesday and Thursday evenings simultaneous meetings, for popular address, are held in two and sometimes in three different houses. This is the case also on Thursday afternoon, when the Lord's Supper is celebrated.

Organization, Mode of Operation, &c.—The officers of the Board are chosen annually, by ballot, and are, at present, a President, Vice-President, Recording Secretary, Treasurer, two Auditors, four Corresponding Secretaries, and a Prudential Committee of eight. This committee, whose members receive no compensation for their services, meets at the missionary house at least once every week, on Tuesday afternoon, for the transaction of business. There are now about 200 corporate members of the Board residing in at least 21 different States of the Union. These alone, by the charter, are voting members, forming the body corporate; but the payment of $50, if the person be a clergyman, or $100, if a layman, constitutes any one an honorary member, who may share fully in the deliberations of the annual meetings. About 9,000 persons have, since the beginning, been thus constituted honorary members. There is also a small number of corresponding members, residing mostly in foreign lands, and chosen, as are the corporate members, by ballot.

This Board is neither an ecclesiastical nor a denominational body, and is not supported by denominations as such, but by individual Christians. The Commissioners were at first appointed by the General Association of Massachusetts, which is Congregational, with power to adopt their own form of organization and their own rules and regulations. By its charter, obtained from the Legislature of Massachusetts, in 1812, the Board elects its own members without limitation as to numbers, or residence, or religious denomination; but not less than one-third of the members must at all times be respectable laymen, and not less than one-third respectable clergymen. In 1812, the Secretary, in behalf of the Board, suggested to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, "the expediency of forming an institution similar to theirs, between which and theirs there might be such coöperation as should promote the great object of missions amongst the unevangelized nations." The Assembly, however, while they urged the churches under their care to aid in this good work, thought "the business of foreign missions might probably be best managed under a single Board," and so declined forming any separate institution. At the very next meeting of the Board, (Sept., 1812) thirteen new members were elected, from seven different states, of whom eight, 4 from New York, 2 from New Jersey, and 2 from Pennsylvania, were Presbyterians. In 1831, of 62 corporate members, 31 were Presbyterians, 24 Congregationalists, 6 Reformed Dutch, and one Associate Reformed; and of the 70 ordained missionaries, 39 were Presbyterians, 29 Congregationalists, and 2 Reformed Dutch. Until the division of the General Assembly in 1837, most of the efforts of Presbyterian churches in the United States for foreign missions were made through this Board; and this is still true of what are called New School Presbyterian churches, and also of the Reformed Dutch and the Associate Reformed churches. Missionaries from these different denominations have always been sent out without distinction, and generally without even considering their ecclesiastical relations in designating them to their fields of labor.

The missions thus formed, are not controlled by ecclesiastical bodies; though they may themselves be considered as in some sense, such bodies. They are organized and governed as communities, the votes of a majority of the missionaries and male assistant missionaries deciding all questions, in their regular meetings. Thus the missions provide for the organization, government and care of churches, which they form, and may enter into organizations among themselves, for fraternal or ecclesiastical purposes, as associations or presbyteries, according to circumstances and the views and preference of the majority. So far as any use of the funds of the Board is involved, the action of the mission is, of course, subject to the revision of the Prudential Committee.

By its charter the Board is limited to the work of "propagating the Gospel in heathen lands, by supporting missionaries and diffusing a knowledge of the Holy Scriptures." Its missions are conducted with reference to the ultimate complete evangelization of the nations or communities to which they are sent. They are not regarded as permanent institutions, but are established to plant the institutions of the Gospel, and to prepare the people themselves to support these institutions;—to gather churches which are expected to be ultimately self-supporting churches, sustaining their own religious teachers, and acting for the still further propagation of the truth. A leading object therefore, has ever been, as fast as possible, to educate and train a pious native ministry, who may be fitted to act as pastors of the native churches, and as evangelists in gathering churches. For this purpose not only have schools of a lower order been established, but seminaries, in which native young men of piety and promise might be thoroughly educated, and also boarding-schools for girls, from which educated native preachers and teachers might obtain suitable partners for life.

With the same end in view, to raise up Christian churches and communities, which shall be independent of all foreign aid and foreign instruction, much labor has been expended to reduce unwritten languages to a written form, to prepare faithful translations of the Scriptures, and to give a Christian literature to those for whose evangelization the missions have been established. By the missionaries of this Board fifteen different languages have been reduced to writing, and the Scriptures have been translated wholly or in part into more than twenty languages. Still it is ever inculcated upon the missionaries that they are to regard themselves as sent, emphatically, to preach the Gospel, and thus, with Divine assistance, to turn men individually, and at once, "from darkness to light; and from the power of Satan unto God;" and that, in all ordinary cases, every other work is to be subordinate to this in the labors of the missions. In relation to other societies the Board acts strictly upon the principle of non-interference; in agreement with others considering "certain great centres of human society and marts of commerce, as common ground" to some extent, but in all other cases avoiding fields of labor which are already occupied by others.

Results—Statistics, &c.—The operations of the Board have been crowned with many tokens of Divine favor. This is not the place to give particular accounts of revivals, with which the missions have been favored; these accounts will be found in the notices of the several missions; but simple reference may here be made to revivals at Ceylon in 1819, 1821, 1824, and '25, 1830 and '31, and 1835; to the great revival at the Sandwich Islands, in 1838, '39 and '40, as the fruits of which more than twenty thousand persons, giving hopeful evidence of piety, were received into the churches; to revivals among the Nestorians in 1846, 1849, 1850, and 1851; to repeated revivals among the Choctaws and other tribes of Indians on this continent; and to the reformation among the Armenians, obviously, a work of Divine grace, and a work of deep interest and great promise, though differing from many of the revivals already referred to, which has been in progress for the last ten or twelve years. In all, from the beginning, more than forty thousand hopeful converts have been gathered into churches connected with the different missions. None but those who are thought to give evidence of true piety are received to the churches and much care is exercised by the missionaries in receiving members.

The receipts and expenditures of the Board, for each year since its organization, and for each period of four years, are presented in the following table.

It is a fact of great significance, that all missionary societies and boards, after a certain period in their history, begin to receive back their expenditures from the missions which they have planted. The sum thus received by this Board in 1853 was $12,905, which is more than one twenty-fifth part of their whole receipts. And this proportion is much greater in the case of the large London societies, which have been much longer in operation.

It will be seen, that with only one exception, in each period of four years there has been an advance upon the receipts of the previous period. But though there has been, on the whole, constant progress, the receipts have often fallen below the expenditures, and there have been seasons of great pecuniary embarrassment in the operations of the society. In 1837 embarrassments of this kind occurred, the sad effects of which were deeply and widely felt. For some years previous to 1836 the means provided had been sufficient; the Prudential Committee felt encouraged to enter upon new and enlarged operations, and the call was specially for men, while the churches supposed there would be no difficulty in regard to means. In the mean time laborers, in answer to the call, offered their services in increasing numbers, and within four years, from 1833 to 1836 inclusive, no less than 185 new laborers, male and female, were sent abroad. Expenses were thus greatly increased, and the receipts did not increase in proportion. At the annual meeting in 1836 it was announced that 64 missionary laborers were then under appointment, who were expecting soon to be sent abroad; but there was a balance of about $39,000 against the treasury at the close of the financial year, (July 31,) and that balance was increasing. The voice of the meeting, however, and the voice of the churches, still was "let the missionaries be sent;" and the means seemed likely to be provided. From October, 1836, to February, 1837, the receipts greatly increased, and in the mean time 60 laborers, male and female, had embarked for their respective fields. But now there came a financial crisis in the affairs of the country. Pecuniary difficulties began to press upon the business community with very great severity; the receipts of the Board rapidly diminished, and the debt rapidly increased. The committee felt obliged to stop. Laborers under appointment were detained, and new missionaries were appointed only on condition that they would not be sent out, and must be at no expense to the Board, until the state of the treasury should warrant it. Thus discouraged, many turned from regarding the heathen world and looked for other fields of labor, and never since have there been so many ready to offer themselves for the foreign service. But this was not all. Difficulties still increasing, the committee felt called upon, in June, to curtail the appropriations which had been made in the missions for the year 1838, by $40,000; and the missions were informed of the painful necessity, and required to contract their operations. With 60 more laborers to be supported, the pecuniary means of the missions were thus reduced $45,000 below what had been allowed in 1836. The effect was deeply painful. Every missionary was embarrassed, and every branch of missionary operations crippled. Schools were broken up or greatly reduced, and in Ceylon alone 5,000 children were dismissed from under Christian instruction "to the wilderness of heathenism;" the facilities for preaching were abridged; the operations of presses were greatly diminished; native teachers and other helpers were deprived of employment; native Christians were disheartened, and the opposing heathen triumphed.

Still the influence of this reverse was not simply evil. The missions, the Christian public at home, and the Prudential Committee all learned some important lessons; and a new impulse was given to missionary effort, particularly in the rural districts of the country, where the intelligence of the disastrous influence of such reduced appropriations was received. The financial embarrassments were felt first and most severely in the cities and larger towns; those in such communities who would have given liberally, found themselves deprived of the means of giving; the country churches were thus called upon to come with more liberality to the support of the missionary work, and in these churches the amount contributed, and doubtless also the number of contributors, greatly increased.

Such painful consequences of financial difficulty have never since occurred, and it is believed will never again occur in the history of this society. The treasury was not fully relieved until 1842. Indeed, in 1841 the debt had increased to $57,000; and for five years again, from 1847 to 1851, there was a constant balance against the treasury. In 1848 this balance was $59,890. But while all proper economy has been used, and the appropriations to the missions have been limited to the lowest safe amount, the operations have been steadily carried forward, and contributions have been so increased as again to relieve the Board.

Until 1838 the Board had no permanent building for the accommodation of its business at Boston, which has ever been the centre of its operations; and much inconvenience and loss had been experienced from frequent removals. This year an eligible site was purchased in Pemberton Square, and a substantial building erected; the whole expense being met from permanent funds, which could not be used to sustain the missions or to pay the debts. In addition to this building, the Board now has invested funds, of which the interest only may be used, amounting to $96,000.

The missions now under the care of the Board are the following, of each of which a particular notice will be found in its appropriate place:

The mission to the Zulus, and the Gaboon mission, in Africa; the mission to Greece, and the mission to the Jews, in Europe; the mission to the Armenians, the Syrian mission, the Assyrian mission, and the mission to the Nestorians, in Western Asia; the Bombay, Ahmednuggur, Satara, Kolapur, Madras, Arcot, Madura, and Ceylon missions, in Southern Asia; the Canton, Amoy, and Fuh-chau missions, in China; missions to the Choctaws, the Cherokees, the Dakotas, the Ojibwas, the Senecas, the Tuscaroras, and the Abenakis, among the North American Indians; and the Micronesian mission in the North Pacific Ocean. The large and successful Sandwich Islands mission has just passed from under the care of the Board as an organized mission, it being merged in the Christian community of the islands, which have been virtually christianized; but necessary aid is still furnished for the support of religious and educational institutions.

The following table presents the more important statistics of the missions at different periods, separated by intervals of ten years, commencing with 1823, eleven years after the first missionaries were sent out.

REV. I. R. WORCESTER.

AMERICAN BAPTIST MISSIONARY UNION: This is the name at present adopted by the Foreign Missionary Association of the regular or Calvinistic Baptists of the non-slaveholding States, and with few exceptions, it is entirely dependent on them for its maintenance and direction. Existing, at first, with a different organization, and under the name of the Baptist Triennial Convention, it was founded at Philadelphia, in May, 1814, near the date at which the Baptists of the United States entered upon the work of propagating the Gospel among the heathen. It owes its origin to a series of events which have always been deemed extraordinary and providential, and are, on that account, worthy of a brief narration.

In the earliest company of missionaries sent to the east, by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, were Rev. Adoniram Judson and Rev. Luther Rice, who in separate ships, sailed from the United States in 1812. During the passage to Calcutta, Mr. and Mrs. Judson found reason to change their sentiments respecting the mode and the subjects of Christian baptism. On their arrival in India they repaired to Serampore, and on making known their views, were baptized by immersion by Rev. Mr. Ward, one of the missionaries of the English Baptist mission, who were stationed there. A few weeks later Rev. Mr. Rice avowed a similar change in his sentiments, and was also baptized at Serampore. It was this unexpected announcement that these American Missionaries, who had already arrived in the East, had become Baptists and had thrown themselves on the Baptist churches of the United States for the means of prosecuting the self-denying and heroic mission they had undertaken, that first enlisted the general sympathy of that denomination in this country, and led to the formation of their earliest foreign missionary organization.

Immediately on the receipt of letters from Messrs. Judson and Rice, containing this announcement, a society was formed in Boston, which was styled, "The Baptist Society for Propagating the Gospel in India and other Foreign Parts." The new Society, which was designed to be the parent of numerous auxiliaries, immediately pledged to Mr. Judson an adequate support in the prosecution of his mission, whenever the Commissioners of the American Board should discontinue their patronage; and at the same time, thinking that such an arrangement might be more acceptable to him as well as more advantageous in its results, they proposed that he should become connected with the English Baptist Mission at Serampore. This proposal was very wisely and fortunately declined by the managers of that mission, who urged upon their American brethren the formation of a general missionary society, in the United States. At this juncture, early in the year 1814, Mr. Rice arrived in America from Calcutta, having returned for the special purpose of enlisting the Baptist churches of the country in the enterprise of forming missions among the heathen. He was immediately appointed traveling agent of the society already formed, and was directed to visit the churches in the middle and southern states, and at the same time, an address to the members of the denomination was prepared by the society's managers, setting forth the obligations which God in his providence had imposed on them, in consequence of the secession of Messrs. Judson and Rice from the missions which they had been sent to establish. Through the agency of these causes, numerous local societies for missions were soon formed in nearly all the older states, most of them auxiliary to the society originally established at Boston. The appeal which had been made was not disregarded, and as a consequence of the awakened sense of obligation, a general meeting of ministers and laymen, delegates from societies and religious bodies in different parts of the Union, assembled at Philadelphia, in May, 1814. At this meeting was formed, "The General Missionary Convention of the Baptist Denomination in the United States of America, for Foreign Missions." The Constitution provided that the Convention should meet once in three years and that it should be composed of persons who should annually contribute one hundred dollars or who should represent societies contributing that sum. The affairs of the Convention were entrusted to a board of managers who were to be elected once in three years, and in whom was vested the appointment of the Secretary, Treasurer, and other officers, and also of all the missionaries. By a subsequent alteration in its Constitution, the Convention for a considerable period, embraced not only the foreign, but also the home missions of the Baptist denomination, and also, for a still longer period, the management of the Columbian College, an institution of learning established at Washington, in the District of Columbia. These latter objects, however, were always regarded as secondary, and were at length entirely laid aside, and the Convention left to its own proper work of founding and directing foreign missions.

The Triennial Convention, thus collecting its members from all parts of the country, continued, with the slight exceptions already stated, unchanged in its organization till the year 1845, when, in common with similar associations in other denominations, its councils became distracted and its treasury embarrassed by the sectional feuds generated by the discussion of the institution of slavery. At this time the churches in most of the slaveholding States, becoming dissatisfied with the principles avowed by its managers, united in a separate organization, under the name of the "Southern Baptist Convention." In November, 1845, at a special meeting of the Triennial Convention, an entire change was effected in its composition and a new Constitution adopted, which declared its single object to be to "diffuse the knowledge of the religion of Jesus Christ, by means of missions, throughout the world." According to its new Constitution, the principle of representative membership is laid aside, and the association is now composed of life members who are made such by the payment of one hundred dollars. Its name has likewise been changed to the "American Baptist Missionary Union." Its meetings are annual, and its affairs are committed to a board of managers composed of 75 persons, of whom at least one-third must not be ministers of the Gospel, and who appoint from their own number an executive committee of nine persons, by whom, in connection with two corresponding secretaries and a treasurer, missionaries are appointed, missions are established, and all the actual business of the society is transacted. The members of the Union, as has been stated, generally belong to the Baptist churches in the non-slaveholding States, but this results from the influence of common sentiments and not from any provision of its Constitution. It is in reality as comprehensive as was the convention which preceded it, and of which it is the legal and lineal successor.

Thus organized and composed, the American Baptist (Foreign) Missionary Union, from the humble beginnings with which it commenced, has steadily advanced in its work and has extended its missions from Rangoon in the kingdom of Burmah, where the first was established, to all parts of that kingdom, to Siam, China and Assam, to the Teloogoos in India, to the western coast of Africa, to Greece, Germany and France, and to the Indians of the American continent. In the number of its missions, in the extent of its resources, and the amount of its annual revenues, it ranks second only to the American Board of Commissioners among the foreign missionary organizations of the United States. Its missionaries have been sent forth for the simple purpose of preaching the Gospel. They have been in all cases instructed to make this their great object and to regard the introduction of science and art, the education of the young and even the translation of the Scriptures as subsidiary to it. The number of those who have been appointed and sent from this country, and who are now in the employment of the managers of the Union, is sixty-six missionaries and sixty-four female assistants, exclusive of two hundred and twenty preachers, teachers, and other assistants who have been appointed from among the native converts in the several countries where the missions have been established. These missionaries are now engaged in preaching the Gospel in the languages of upwards of twenty different divisions of the human race. They have established twenty-one organized missions, embracing 84 stations and five hundred and thirty-nine out-stations, and in the churches, 192 in number, which they have planted in the different parts of the world, are embraced about 15,219 persons who have been converted by their labors. Their schools are 88, and contain 1,992 pupils.

Of these missions the most interesting and successful are those among the Burmans and Karens in the kingdom of Burmah and the neighboring provinces, and those in several of the states of Germany. The Karens present a singular example of a people for the most part without any form of idolatry, but possessed of singular moral sensibility and unusually disposed to receive the doctrines of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Oppressed and despised by their Burman masters, they have hailed the advancement of English power in the East, and have entered with gladness into the freedom and security which it everywhere brings. They have received Christianity from the teaching of the missionaries with an eagerness which has seldom been paralleled among any other portion of mankind. After these no other missions of the Union have had a success equal to that which has been bestowed on the mission in Germany. It was commenced by the baptism of a devoted and liberal minded German, Mr. J. G. Oncken, in the waters of the Elbe at Hamburg, in 1833, by Rev. Dr. Sears, who at that time was residing in Germany as a student. Since then, by the persevering labors of this earliest convert, a mission has been established which, without a single missionary sent from the United States, now extends through nearly all the states of Germany and into Denmark and Holland.

The following table presents a comprehensive view of the missions of the Union, and their results :

The officers of the American Baptist Missionary Union chosen at the annual meeting in May, 1854, are as follows, viz. :

Hon. George N. Briggs, L.L. D., President ;
Rev. Bartholomew T. Welsh, D.D., Rev. Silas Bailey, D.D., Vice-Presidents.

Rev. Win. H. Shailer, D.D. Recording Secretary.

The Board of Managers is composed of 75 members, who are annually elected, and of whom at least one-third are not ministers of the Gospel. Of this Board, the officers in 1854 were as follows :

Hon. Ira Harris, Chairmain.
Rev. Sewall S. Cuttting, Recording Secretary.

EXECUTIVE OFFICERS :
Rev. Solomon Peck, D. D., Corresponding Secretary for the Foreign Department.
Rev. Edward Bright, D.D., Corresponding Secretary for the Home Department.
Richard E. Eddy, Treasurer.

The subjoined table will present a complete view of the financial growth and present resources of the "Missionary Union" :

PROF. W. GAMMELL.

AMERICAN AND FOREIGN CHRISTIAN UNION: This Society was organized in the city of New-York in the month of May, 1849. It was formed by the union, or fusion rather, of three societies which had existed for several years. (1) There was THE FOREIGN EVANGELICAL SOCIETY. The history of this society is as follows: Shortly after the French Revolution of July, 1830, several Christian brethren in Paris wrote to gentlemen in New-York,—some of whom had formerly resided in France, in pursuit of commercial business, and others had visited that country as travelers,—to say that the new constitution to which that Revolution had given existence, granted to Protestants a large amount of religious liberty, and thus opened the door for evangelical effort. The communication of this cheering intelligence was accompanied by an earnest entreaty for help, from Christians of this land—a land which had been blest by receiving into its bosom thousands of the excellent but persecuted Huguenots, at the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, and for whose liberties La Fayette and thousands of other brave Frenchmen had suffered and bled.

This appeal was not made in vain. The sum of $2,000 was raised and sent, and the suggestion was made that a Home Missionary Society, or something equivalent, should be formed, to carry forward the work in France. This led to the formation of The Evangelical Society of France in the year 1833. In 1834, at the request of that Society, a small association was formed in New York, called The French Association. This association two years later took the name of The Evangelical Association. In the month of May, 1834, at the request of that committee, the Rev. Mr. Baird, (now the Rev. Dr. Baird,) agreed to go to France in the spring of 1835, with his family, for three years, and make Paris his home, for the purpose of learning what could be done by the American churches to aid their Protestant brethren in France. This mission was fulfilled, and not only was much information acquired in relation to France, Belgium, Italy, and other Papal countries on the Continent, but a good deal was done in that period to promote the cause of temperance in the northern portions of it. Besides what The French Association was enabled to do for the cause of the gospel in France during those three years, the American Home Missionary Society was induced to make grants to the amount of $4,500; whilst the American Bible and Tract Societies also did much.

In the spring of 1838, Dr. Baird returned and reported to two public meetings in New York the state of things in France and other parts of Europe. In the month of May, 1839, The Foreign Evangelical Society was organized, for the promotion of the work in Papal countries generally. The gentlemen who formed it were members of the Presbyterian, Congregational, and Reformed Dutch Churches. This Society existed from 1839 to 1849. During this period of ten years the interest which was felt in the evangelization of the Papal world, steadily and perceptibly increased. The Rev. Dr. Baird returned to Europe, and his family made Paris and Geneva their home for four years more, whilst he on the one hand traveled extensively on the Continent in prosecution of the work, and on the other, returned twice to this country for the same object. At the end of ten years the society had missionaries in France, Belgium, Sweden, Canada, Hayti, and South America, besides having aided the work in Germany, Poland, Russia, and Italy. The receipts of the Society were $10,127 in 1840, $13,725 in 1841, $15,733 in 1842, $9,303 in 1843, $12,392 in 1844, $16,037 in 1845, $19,930 in 1846, $14,670 in 1847, $19,214 in 1848, and 23,805 in 1849: making in all, the sum of $154,345, received during a period of ten years; all of which sum was expended in the various branches of the Society's operations. The receipts of The French Association, and The Evangelical Association, which preceded The Foreign Evangelical Society, were $19,759. Besides all this, there passed through the hands of Dr. Gurdon Buck, a member of the Board, for the Grande Ligne Mission in Canada from first to last, nearly if not quite, $20,000, not including some $6,000 which were granted to that mission by the Foreign Evangelical Society, and which also passed through Dr. Buck's hands.

(2) In the year 1843, THE AMERICAN PROTESTANT SOCIETY was formed. It owed its existence to the fact that the immigration of Roman Catholics from Europe had become very great, and was increasing every year with a fearful rapidity. It was felt that this foreign and un-Protestant element was becoming very large, and demanded special and appropriate effort. Indeed, a similar movement in some respects, had been made some years earlier, when an "American Reformation Society" was formed by the exertions of the Rev. Dr. Brownlee and others. And although that Society did not exist long, it prepared the way for The American Protestant Society, of which we are speaking.

This Society existed from 1843 to 1849. Its objects were: 1. To enlighten Protestants of this country in regard to the errors of Rome; 2. To convert and save the votaries of Rome who are among us. In prosecution of these objects, the press was employed and a goodly number of colporteurs and other missionaries were maintained—laboring among the Irish,

German and other foreign Romanists in the country. The Society interested itself greatly in the winter of 1848-'49 in behalf of the Portuguese exiles from Madeira, who were in Trinidad, and took measures to bring them to this country. The receipts of the Society were about $4,000 in 1844, $6,742 in 1845, $9,014 in 1846, $19,365 in 1847, $24,672 in 1848 and $28,363 in 1849; making a total of $92,160, all of which was laid out in prosecuting the good work in our own country.

(3) In the year 1843 also, an association was formed, in New-York, called The Philo-Italian Society, which afterwards took the name of The Christian Alliance. This society, as well as the American Protestant Society, embraced good men of many if not all the evangelical denominations. It is known that its object was to aid in causing the truth to enter into Italy—a difficult work before the year 1848, as regards all parts of that country, and still a difficult work excepting in the kingdom of Sardinia alone. As this society did not publish its proceedings, we are not able to say anything of them further than that it employed an active agent, a Protestant Italian, for years on the confines of Italy, who lost no opportunity for sending tracts and the Sacred Scriptures into that country. Nor are we able to state the amount of its receipts.

It was by the union of these three societies in the month of May, 1849, that The American and Foreign Christian Union was formed. The new Board of directors as well as the officers, were chosen from among the boards and officers of the three societies. The new society undertook the work and assumed the responsibilities of the three societies, and entered at once upon its appropriate labors.

It will be seen, therefore, that the field of this society's operations includes our own country and foreign lands. As to its objects, and the mode by which it aims to accomplish them, the following article (No. II.) of its constitution is full and explicit: "The object of this society shall be by missions, colportage, the press, and other appropriate agencies, to diffuse and promote the principles of religious liberty, and a pure and evangelical Christianity, both at home and abroad, wherever a corrupted Christianity exists."

The society contemplates imparting, so far as it may be able, a pure Christianity to those who now only know a corrupt form, whether in this land or in foreign countries. It may well deem its field a great and important one. The present Pope says that there are two hundred millions of Roman Catholics in the world. The present Emperor of Russia says that there are fifty millions of followers of the Greek Church in his vast empire. These two estimates make two hundred and fifty millions, and equal the fourth part of the human race. And although his holiness may make quite too high an estimate of the number of his "children," yet if we include all the members of the Oriental Churches, (in the Turkish Empire, Independent Greece, the Ionian Isles, and the Austrian Empire) we shall certainly find that the Church of Rome and the six Oriental Churches embrace not much less than one quarter of the inhabitants of the globe. And how important that these two hundred and fifty millions should have the true gospel! They embrace powerful nations—France, Austria, Russia, to say nothing of the Italian, the Spanish, and the Portuguese races.

The society has made a noble beginning. In the year ending in May, 1854, (the fifth of its existence,) it employed between 130 and 140 missionaries of all classes, at home and abroad, (more than half of whom were ordained ministers) belonging to seven different nations and speaking as many languages. Of these, 90 labored among the Romanists in the United States. Besides this, the Society aided the work directly and indirectly in many ways, both at home and abroad. In the two first years of its existence, 1850 and '51, it expended nearly $15,000 for the removal to Illinois of some 500 or 600 Portuguese exiles, to whom we have already referred. It publishes a monthly Magazine of 48 pages, The American and Foreign Christian Union, which has a large circulation, and two monthly sheets, one in English and the other in German. It has issued quite a number of excellent books and tracts relating to Romanism, and is constantly publishing more. Its receipts were $57,223 in 1850, $45,707 in 1851, $55,653 in 1852, $67,597 in 1853 and $75,751 in the year ending in May, 1854. Making a total of $301,931 in five years, all of which, save a balance of $2,706, was expended in the prosecution of the work at home and abroad.

This important society, still in its infancy, has indeed a great work on its hands. Besides all its other objects, it has the cause of "Religious Liberty," the "Protection of American citizens when abroad in their rights of conscience and public worship," the "Defence of the public schools," and the proper "Tenure of church property" to look after. The great meetings which it held in the city of New-York, in behalf of some of these objects, in January, 1853 and 1854, (the Madiat, and religious rights of Americans when abroad) excited a happy influence, and are an earnest of what it may, with God's blessing, be expected to achieve in the future.—OFFICER OF THE SOC.

AMERICAN INDIAN MISSION ASSOCIATION.—This Association is connected with the Baptist churches in the South-west. It was organized in Cincinnati, on the 26th of October, 1842, and the Executive Board located at Louisville. At its first annual meeting, the year following, six missionaries were under appointment, four of whom were in the field, and the amount of receipts was $3,000. The next report gives 15 missionaries and assistants; 75 bapusms; receipts $8,090. The third, seventeen laborers, two small schools, and about forty baptisms. The report for 1852, shows $15,811, receipts; four missions, located among the Choctaws, Creeks, Weas, Piankeshaws, Miamies, and Putawatamies; with six stations and eight out-stations; 28 missionaries and assistants; 21 churches; 126 baptisms during the year; 165 pupils in schools; and over 1300 communicants. (See Indians.)

AMERICAN MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.—This society was formed at Albany, N. Y., September 3, 1846, by a convention of friends of missions, who were dissatisfied with what they understood to be the position of existing missionary bodies, relative to slavery, oppression, idolatry, polygamy, caste, &c., &c. Among the declared objects sought to be attained by the Convention, were the following: To institute arrangements for the propagation of a pure and free Christianity, and for gathering and sustaining churches in heathen lands, from which these and other like forms of iniquity should be excluded by terms of admission, or by disciplinary process; to unite evangelical Christians in an effort to give the Gospel to those who were destitute of it, without insisting upon those points on which the best and most enlightened friends of Christ still differ; and to secure a more direct responsibility in the management of the society, by giving to its evangelical supporters a vote in the control of its operations.

In the address issued by the Convention, it was said that the crisis then apparent in the cause of missions, afforded a favorable opportunity "for the review of existing usages and methods of missionary effort; of comparing them with the New Testament standard; of discarding whatever might be found wrong or defective, and supplying their place in such manner as might be found to accord with primitive teachings and examples." The Constitution of the Association provides that "any person of evangelical sentiments, who professes faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, who is not a slaveholder, or in the practice of other immoralities, and who contributes to its funds, may become a member of the society." Its affairs are managed by an Executive Committee of twelve, subject to the revision of the annual meeting. Churches or local missionary bodies, agreeing to the principles of the society, may appoint and sustain missionaries of their own, through the agency of this body. "The society, in collecting funds, in appointing officers, agents, and missionaries, and in selecting fields of labor, and conducting the missionary work, will endeavor particularly to discountenance slavery, by refusing to receive the known fruits of unrequited labor, or to welcome to its employment those who hold slaves."

Soon after the formation of the Association, the Union Missionary Society, the Committee for the West Indian Mission, and the Western Evangelical Missionary Association were merged in it, and their missions were transferred to its care. These missions were in the island of Jamaica; among the Ojibwa or Chippeway Indians of Minnesota; and in Western Africa. The society has now, in addition to these, a mission in the Sandwich Islands; in Siam; among the fugitives in Canada; among the Chinese and other foreigners in California; and a number of home missionaries in the destitute parts of the United States; it has also recently undertaken a mission to the Copts in Egypt.

Missionaries and assistant missionaries, male and female, in Africa 13; Jamaica 21; Siam 6; Sandwich Islands 2; Canada 2; California 2; among the Ojibwa Indians 19; for the Copts 2: Total, - - - - 90

The following table shows the receipts of the society, for each year since its formation:

First year ending Sept. 1, 1847,	$13,033 67
Second " " " 1848,	17,095 74
Third " " " 1849,	21,982 96

Fifth " " " 1851,	34,535 47
Sixth " " " 1852,	30,233 54
Seventh, " " 1853,	42,496 20
Total,	184,537 14

It will thus be seen that the aggregate of the society's receipts for the first seven years of its existence, has been $184,537 14, and its average increase about 24 per cent. per annum.

The home missionaries of the Association are specially instructed to discourage intemperance and slavery, and labor for their removal. The churches to which they minister, as well in the slave states as elsewhere, regard slaveholding as a disciplinable offence, and exclude those who practice it from their communion. Twelve churches have been formed on these principles in Kentucky and North Carolina, and are reported to be in a prosperous condition. The number of home missionaries aided by the Association, the first year of its existence, was four; in the seventh year, ninety. The number of churches under their care was one hundred and eight. The whole number of church members is not known, a portion of the missionaries having made their reports to an auxiliary society.—REV. GEO. WHIPPLE.

AMHERST: A town in the province of Maulmain, in British Burmah. It was founded in 1826 by Lord Amherst, at which time it became a station of the American Baptist Mission in Burmah. It is the burial-place of Mrs. Ann H. Judson.

AMOY: A city of China, situated on an island of the same name, on the coast northward from Canton; being one of the five ports open to the foreign trade.

ANEITEUM: An island of New Hebrides, where is a station of the London Missionary Society.

ANNAMABOE: On the Gold Coast, West Africa, lat. $5^{\circ} 10'$ N. long. $1^{\circ} 5'$ W. A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, commenced in 1835: has now 1 missionary, 3 chapels, 5 local preachers, 15 teachers, 237 scholars, 254 members, and 900 attendants on public worship.

ANTIGUA: One of the West India Isles, lat. $17^{\circ} 8'$ N. long. $61^{\circ} 52'$ W. A district of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, commenced in 1786; has now 17 missionaries, 8 stations, 44 chapels, 42 local preachers, 508 teachers, 12,000 members, 5,523 scholars, and 33,650 attendants on public worship.

AOTEA: (Beecham-Dale) in New Zealand. A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society. Commenced in 1823. Has now one missionary, 10 chapels, 26 local preachers, 315 members, 590 scholars, and 600 attendants on public worship.

APIA: A station of the London Missionary Society on the Island of Upolu, one of the Samoan group.

ARABIAN COAST: An out-station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, in South America. (See Demerara.)

ARABKIR: A station of the American Board among the Armenians, in the Eastern part of Asia Minor, not far from the Euphrates. Population 6000 in the town, and 15,000 including the immediately surrounding district.

ARCOT: A city of Eastern Hindoostan, seventy miles S. W. of Madras. It is the centre of a very populous district, and was occupied by the American Board in 1852.

ARMENIANS: Armenia, in the most flourishing period of its history, was divided into fifteen provinces, the central one of which was Ararat, the second cradle of the human race. (Gen. 8: 4, Jer. 51: 27, and in Heb., 2 Kings 19: 37, Is. 37: 38.) Its situation is at the eastern extremity of Asia Minor, lying at short distances from the Mediterranean on the south-west, the Black sea on the north-west, the Caspian sea on the north-east, and at a much greater distance from the Persian Gulf on the south-east. Its western boundary is not far from six hundred miles east of Constantinople. It extends about 430 miles in longitude, and about 300 in latitude; having on the north the ancient Albania, Iberia, and Colchis; on the west, Pontus and Cappadocia; on the south, Mesopotamia and Assyria; and on the east, Media Atropatane, or the modern Aderbaijan. It is an elevated region, abounding in lofty mountains, and having a climate of considerable severity. Several large and celebrated rivers go out from it; the Euphrates and Tigris towards the Persian Gulf; the Jorokh (Akampsis) to the Black sea; the Aras (Araxes) and the Koor (Cyrus) to the Caspian Sea. Some portions of the country, particularly the province of Ararat (Ararat) which in the Bible gives name to the whole of Armenia, are of great fertility.

History.—The Armenian race is claimed to be, and probably is, of the highest antiquity. The father of it, according to their own tradition, was Haig, a son of Togarmah, the son of Gomer, who was one of the sons of Japhet. Hence to this day, in their own language, they call themselves Haik; their country, also, they designate by the same name, or by the derivative Haiasdan. The seventh of the dynasty of Haig was the famous hero Aram, from whom the names Armenia and Armenian originated, by which the country and people have been known among foreigners for many ages. That distinguished monarch, after freeing his own territory from invaders, against whom the Armenians seem to have had to maintain a constant resistance, extended his arms into Cappadocia, and gave laws and his name successively to the regions called, First, Second, and Third Armenia; which, united under the general name of Armenia Minor, extended from the Euphrates to Cæsarea, and from the mountains of Pontus to those of Cilicia. Armenia Minor passed early into the hands of the Romans, but deserves even at this day, on account of the number of its Armenian inhabitants, to retain its ancient name. —

The principal foreign relations of Armenia, during the early part of its history, were doubtless with the neighboring kingdoms of Assyria, Media, and Babylon. The minute details given by Armenian historians of this traditionary period, are, of course, entitled to little confidence, although the occasional intermingling of this portion of their history with that of Scripture, gives us certain stand-points of interest and certainty from which to view it. In 328 A. C., Alexander, whose empire absorbed so many oriental monarchies, extended his conquests over Armenia, and extinguished the dynasty of Haig, which is said, with a few grafts upon it of foreign stocks, to have held during eighteen centuries uninterrupted possession of the throne. After the death of Alexander, Armenia was ruled by governors, sometimes of Greek and sometimes of native origin, who derived their authority from Seleucia and Macedonia, and at times laid claim to entire independence. It was next subdued by the power that overturned the empire of the Seleucidæ in the East and formed an impassable barrier to the ambition of Rome. A. C. 149, Arshâg the Great, (Arsaces, called also Mithridates I.) grandson of the founder of the Parthian Empire, placed his brother Vagharshâg (Valarsaces) upon the throne of Armenia. Thus commenced this branch of the Arsacidæ, under whose reign of 577 years, the Armenians enjoyed greater prosperity than during any other period of their history. Dikran (Tigranes) the fourth of this dynasty, was an ally of Mithrad, (Mithridates) the great king of Pontus, in his wars with Sylla and Lucullus. Thus he became involved in a war with Rome, which Pompey ended by imposing upon him humiliating conditions of peace. New alliances against Rome led to the over-running of his country by Anthony, in his Parthian wars, 34 A. C. The part north of the Aras was given to his son, who was soon expelled, and the remainder became permanently tributary to Augustus. With this division the reigning family, after the leading members had died in captivity, was also divided. The northern branch, alternately upheld and dethroned by the Romans and Persians, was at length supplanted by Georgian princes, who again yielded to a brother of the king of Persia, and finally after a separation of 85 years the whole country was reunited under the southern branch. This branch had its capital at Medzpin, (Nisibis.) From a remote antiquity the north-west part of Mesopotamia was inhabited by a race resembling the Armenians in person, manners, and language; and at the commencement of the Christian era, constituted, according to Armenian report, under the name of Mesopotamia of the Armenians, an integral part of their kingdom, and was the residence of the court for 228 years. (Abgar, one of their sovereigns, they say, transferred the seat of government to Oorfa, and was there converted to Christianity. Having believed in Christ from mere report, he corresponded with him, received from him his portrait miraculously impressed upon a handkerchief, and was then instructed and baptized, together with many of his people, by Thaddeus, whom the apostle Thomas, in obedience to the command of Christ, sent on this mission, and who extended his labors, with success, to other places. But the successors of Abgar apostatized from the faith, and martyred, besides many common Christians, several of the apostles and disciples of our Lord, and nearly exterminated Christianity from the country.) The third in succession from Abgar having obtained from Vespasian, A.D. 75, the dominion of the whole of Armenia proper, by ceding to the Romans his possessions in Mesopotamia, removed his court to the province of Ararat. / In A.D. 302 Durtad (Tiridates) the king and his court were baptized and the nation received Christianity. The instrument of this great work was Gregory the Illuminator, since the highest saint in the Armenian calendar. Without receiving the stories of his numerous and wonderful miracles, we must admit him to have been a remarkable man. / Their conversion to Christianity increased their hatred to the Armenian royal house of the Sassanian dynasty of Persia, which inflicted on the country unspeakable misery until A. D. 381, Armenia was divided between the king of Persia and the emperor of Constantinople. It was not, however, until A. D. 428 that the Arsacidæ dynasty came to an end and the country was reduced to the condition of a dependent province.

This brief sketch allows no details of the subsequent conflicts of the Armenians against their Magian persecutors of Persia; their fall into the hands of the khalifs of Mohammed, A. D. 637; the miseries which they suffered from the rival claims of the courts of Damascus and Constantinople; their varying fortunes to the invasion of the Seljookian Turks, from which they suffered terrible massacres, A. D. 1049; of the petty independent kingdom in Cilicia with its changing relations to Moghul, Crusader, Turkish, etc., neighbors, to its overthrow by the sultans of Egypt and its annexation to that dominion, A. D. 1375; of the awful devastations inflicted by the waves of invasion that rolled over them under the guidance, successively in the 13th and 14th centuries, of Chingiz Khan and Timurlane; and the final conquest effected by the Turkmen and Osmanli Turks, the latter of whom still rule over a large part of Armenia; Russia since the beginning of the present century, having obtained a large portion of it from Turkey and Persia, between whom it was for a long time shared. Few countries have a history more painful than Armenia.

The Armenian Church.—Receiving Christianity in the beginning of the fourth century, the Armenians received it in the form which had then become common in the East. Its subsequent development was naturally in the same line of direction as in other national churches starting from substantially the same point of departure. While soon separated, on the doctrine relating to the person of Christ, from the Roman and Greek churches, it has never ceased to be much influenced by them. Previous to the invention of the Armenian character by the learned monk Mesrob, A. D. 406, writing was done among them in the Syriac and Greek characters, and the state of letters was very low. This invention introduced a new era, the first and most important literary effort being the translation of the Bible into Armenian, A. D. 411, by Mesrob and Isaac the Catholicos. The version was made from the Septuagint, and of course has all the faults of the latter with some serious ones of its own. It is still in use, and has been a boon of immense value to the nation. It is held in considerable estimation by Biblical scholars. It is the oldest Armenian book extant, the next being the history of the nation by Moses Chorenensis, which was written about half a century later. The Armenians were unaffected by the Arian and Nestorian heresies, but in the year 491 a synod of their bishops rejected the decisions of the council of Chalcedon, while, most inconsistently, it also anathematized Eutyches. Although strenuously contending for the formula of one nature in Christ, and thereby cut off as heretical and schismatical by the Greek and Romish Churches, modern missionaries are generally disposed to regard the Armenians as differing more in terminology than in idea from the orthodox faith on that point. They agree with the Greeks and other oriental Churches in rejecting the "filio-que" from the Nicene creed and maintaining the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father only. With some difference in forms and modes of worship, the religious opinions of the Armenians are mostly like those of the Greeks. The sign of the cross is used on all occasions; but made by the Greeks with three fingers, by the Armenians with two, by the Jacobites with one—the Greek usage pointing to the Trinity, the Armenian to the two natures made one in the person of Christ, and the Jacobite to the Divine unity. They profess to hold to the seven sacraments of the Latin church; but in fact extreme unction exists among them only in name, the prayers so designated being intermingled with those of confirmation, which latter rite is performed by the priest at the time of baptism. Infants are baptized, as commonly in the Greek and other oriental churches, by a partial immersion in the fount and three times pouring water on the head. Converted Jews, etc., though adults, are baptized in the same manner, for the reason that, according to the tradition of their church, the Saviour was thus baptized in Jordan. They readily admit to their communion Romanists and Protestants baptized by sprinkling, differing in this from the Greeks, who, claiming orthodoxy to their church alone and denying salvation to all others, receive none, however previously baptized, without rebaptizing them. They believe firmly in transubstantiation, and adore the host in the mass, which stupendous perversion of the sacrament is followed by the same evils that are witnessed from it in the Romish Church. The people partake, however, in both kinds, the wafer or broken bread (unleavened) being dipped in undiluted wine, (the Greeks use leavened bread and wine mixed with water,) and laid carefully on the tongue. It must be received fasting. They reject the Latin purgatory, but believing that the souls of the departed may be benefited by the aid of the Church, (which, of course, must be paid for,) they pray for the dead. Saint-worship is carried to an extraordinary length, the addresses to saints being often grossly idolatrous, and the mediation of Christ lost sight of in the liturgical services of the Church as it is in the minds of the people. The cross and pictures of the saints are also objects of worship as possessing inherent efficacy. The Supreme Being is likewise represented under the form of an aged, venerable man, with whom, and the Son under the form of a young man, and the Holy Spirit symbolized as a dove, the Virgin Mary is associated in the same picture. The perpetual virginity of the latter is held as a point of preëminent importance. Confession to the priesthood, in order to absolution, is deemed essential to salvation. Penances are imposed; but absolution is without money, and indulgences are never given. Baptism confers regeneration and cleansing from sin, original and actual; spiritual life is maintained by penances and sacraments; and the priest holds in his hand the passport to heaven. The merit of good works is acknowledged, particularly of asceticism. Monachism, celibacy, fasting, etc., are viewed as in other Eastern and Western churches; the number of fast-days, when no animal food of any kind can be eaten, is 165 in the year. On the fourteen great feast-days the observance of the day is more strict than that of the Sabbath, which last is as in Roman Catholic countries. Minor feasts are even more numerous than the days in the year. The church services are performed in the ancient tongue, not now understood by the common people, and in a manner altogether perfunctory and painful to an enlightened mind. There are nine different grades of clergy, each receiving a distinct ordination by the laying on of hands. Four of these are below the order of deacon, and are called porters, readers, exorcists, and candle-lighters. After these come the sub-deacons, the deacons, the priests, then the bishops, and last of all, the catholicos. The catholicos is ordained by a council of bishops. He is the spiritual head of the church, who alone ordains bishops, and can furnish the meiron or sacred oil used by bishops in ordaining the inferior clergy, and in the various ceremonies of the church. The priests are obliged to be married men, and can never rise higher than the priesthood, except in case of the death of a wife, when, not being allowed to marry a second time, they may enter among the vartabels, an order of celibate priests, who are attached to the churches as preachers, (the married priests do not usually preach,) or live together in monasteries, and from among whom the bishops, etc., on whom the law of celibacy is imposed, are taken. The ecclesiastical polity is modified somewhat according to the political governments under which, in the countries of their dispersion, the Armenians live. Originally, there was but one head to the church, whose residence was at the seat of the imperial or kingly government. Subsequently, in the distracted condition of civil affairs, rival catholicos rose up. At present three are acknowledged—one at Aghtamar, in the Lake Van; one at Sis, with a small body of followers in the ancient Cilicia and neighboring territory; and one at Echmiadzin, acknowledged by the Armenians in Europe, Asia Minor, and Armenia proper. There are two patriarchs, one at Constantinople and the other at Jerusalem; the latter, however, being of little account compared with the former. This office is not an ecclesiastical, but a civil one, as an ecclesiastic the patriarch being only a bishop, having properly no spiritual authority above that of any other bishop. He receives his appointment from the Sultan, on a nomination of the primates of the nation. His powers are defined by an imperial firman, and he ranks, civilly, with the great pashas of the empire. The Armenian patriarchate of Jerusalem, the jurisdiction of which is very limited, dates back to A. D. 1311, and owes its existence to the Sultan of Egypt. Mohammed II., on the capture of Constantinople in 1453, finding a patriarch with spiritual jurisdiction over the whole Greek church, sagaciously continued him at the head of the Greeks that he might govern them through him; and transferring the Armenian bishop of Brusa to the capital, he made him, in like manner, patriarch of the Armenians. As this officer is made responsible for the good conduct of his people, he is clothed with such prerogatives as are necessary to enable him to maintain his authority. Important limitations have recently (see article on Turkey) been imposed, but his powers are still great. Heretofore there has been so little check that his power has been almost absolute in respect to the infliction of punishment. A prison exists within his own precincts, over which he has had entire control. A note from him to the Porte (Turkish government) has been, in most cases, sufficient to secure the banishment of any person, ecclesiastic or layman, to a distant part of the empire. If, owing to the rank or influence of the individual, difficulty interposed in procuring the order, a bribe was ready and generally settled the question. The patriarch's sanction being required to such applications, it has been easy to practice the heaviest oppressions by defeating attempts to procure the official passports needed to go from place to place, or licenses for occupying houses or shops, or prosecuting trades, marrying, burying the dead, etc., etc.; and as our history will show, the power to oppress thus possessed, has been wielded with terrible severity, to prevent the introduction of a purer faith and practice among this people. The despotic power of the patriarchs is practically, however, much modified by the power of the primates of the community, who are chiefly bankers, and all of them men of great wealth. The patriarch is really the creature of the primates, and can do little without their approval. A permanent centralization of power, like that of Rome, is hindered by the intrigues of rival parties in this body, making and unmaking and controlling the patriarch, who is thus, in general, merely the tool of the party, which, for the time being, by influence derived from its relations to those in high places of the Turkish government, or by its more liberal use of money, happens to be in the ascendant. As circumstances change and parties fluctuate, measures in process, or in prospect, are liable to be interfered with and frustrated; and it will be seen how persecution has often been averted, and quiet secured to missionaries and their native coadjutors in the prosecution of their evangelical labors, by jealousies and party feuds among the spiritual and temporal leaders of the Armenian community. The patriarch enjoys the title of archbishop, and has the appointment of bishops to their sees, but, as before stated, does not ordain to the office. One of the darkest features of the state of the church is the universality of simony in practice, although condemned in its standards, and denounced in words; but it is notorious that the patriarch has to expend large sums in obtaining and retaining his office, to reimburse which, and for his own emolument, he sells to the bishops their sees, who again ordain to the priesthood for money. The moral character of the priests (being married men) is superior to that of the vartabeds and higher clergy, that of the latter being generally confessedly bad. Their acquaintance with the scriptures is very limited; many among them are unable to read them in the ancient tongue. The state of education in general is lamentably low. A gross superstition has taken the place of true religion, and the light of truth and holiness, recently rekindled, beginning to shine with more than its pristine splendor among that people, had well nigh gone out in utter darkness. The annals of the Armenian church for the last few centuries are a record of corruption, intrigue, and crime, that cannot be contemplated without the deepest sorrow and disgust. There is little, indeed, in its history, from the beginning, to cheer the heart, but the unshrinking firmness with which it has in successive ages adhered to the profession of its faith and the Christian name, under the dreadful oppression of pagan and Mohammedan conquerors and the strongest worldly inducements to apostatize; and it has also resisted wily efforts, repeatedly put forth, and in some instances with sanguine expectation of success, to subject it to the iron rule of Rome.

Language and Literature.—Many of the Armenians claim, for their nation, that it has preserved the language of Noah, unaffected by the confusion of tongues at Babel, and therefore, that it has the original speech of our first parents in Paradise; without conceding this modest claim we are probably safe in allowing their language a very early origin. Its relations with other languages are fewer than those which obtain in the case of most others; yet it clearly belongs to the Indo-Germanic family. It is enriched very considerably from the Sanscrit; and it has no affinity with the Semitic tongues. As found in its earliest existing, as well as later forms, it abounds in gutturals, and is harsh to the ear of the foreigner; but it has strength, flexibility, and compass, and is capable of expressing thought by evolving from itself, without drawing from abroad, new terms for the purpose. The conversion of the nation to Christianity, led naturally to the introduction of certain words from the Greek, and impressed a new character upon it in several respects. It has also received accessions from other languages, and as now spoken, differs very considerably from the ancient tongue preserved in books. The Ararat, or eastern dialect, spoken in Armenia, (excepting the pashalic of Erzurum,) and to the east of it, has departed less from the ancient than the Constantinopolitan or western dialect. The latter has become moulded in its idioms and construction by the Turkish, and is usually spoken with an infusion of Turkish words. As now cultivated, it is becoming purified from these, and receiving, as needed, added wealth from the ancient or original Armenian. There has been little published in this dialect as yet, by adherents to the Armenian Church, but the publications of convents at Vienna and Venice and Romish and Protestant missionaries have ushered in a new era for this form of the Armenian tongue, and the new intellectual life called into action by missionary labors, and the contact of the occidental civilization with that of the Orient, has begun the creation of a valuable literature in it. The modern dialects differ from the ancient language, chiefly in the disuse of certain words, the introduction of certain words and phrases not known to the ancient, and a change in grammatical forms, collocations of words and idiomatic expressions. The literature of the ancient consists mainly of historical, ecclesiastical, liturgical, doctrinal, and polemical writings of the so-called Christian Fathers; and of these some are well worthy the study of the learned.

Amount of Population and where found.—The number of the Armenians is variously estimated at from 2 1-2 to 6 or 7 millions. It is impossible to ascertain it with any degree of accuracy. They have become widely dispersed from their original seat, everywhere, like the Jews, preserving their distinct nationality and characteristics. Multitudes of them were carried away captives, by Saracens and Greeks; Toghrul and Timurlane carried thousands to unknown countries; the Egyptians removed 60,000 to Egypt; and it is known that the Persians have always carried their captives into servitude. Multitudes, moreover, have, at various periods, been induced by oppression at home, voluntarily to seek an asylum in distant countries, to say nothing of other multitudes that commerce has enticed away. We are not surprised, therefore, at finding them, not only in almost every part of Turkey and Persia, but also in India, as well as in Russia, Poland, and many other parts of Europe.

Character.—A sad depravation of morals prevails among all the populations of the East; but in respect to moral traits the Armenians compare favorably with other races. Physically, they are athletic and vigorous; the Armenian porters of Smyrna and Constantinople, are men of great strength. In the mountains of Cilicia and in some other localities, we still find traces of the martial spirit, for which once the nation was distinguished; but in general, ages of subjection have disposed them to quiet submission, and abandoning hope of political restoration as a nation, to seek compensation in the diligent cultivation of the arts of peace. The Armenians are cultivators of the soil, artisans, and merchants; in industry, enterprise, shrewdness, and perseverance they take precedence of other populations in the East, and make themselves indispensable to the Turks who rule over them. They build palaces for the Sultan and his ministers, make his powder and cast his cannon, collect and disburse his revenue, and in fine, make themselves every where indispensable to the government, and in the business transactions of society. They have supplanted the Jews in their special prerogative of dealers in money. The Armenian bankers of Constantinople, from their wealth and relation, as creditors, to pashas and ministers of state, have much consideration and influence, while in demeanor servile to those from whom their wealth is gained, and often made to suffer under the pressure of despotic power. The employment most congenial to the Armenian, and in which he reaps the most sure and richest harvest of success, is that of traffic. Through the agency of the merchants of this class the products of the far East and the West are exchanged across the countries of Western and Central Asia, and by means of the constant intercourse thus kept up, a bond of sympathy is maintained between the most distant portions of the race. Sedate and staid, the Armenian is a striking contrast to the vivacious and talkative Greek; but in solid qualities of mind and heart is, to say the least, not his inferior. With less of imagination and emotion, the bent of his mind is more to the practical and the real. He learns languages with less facility than many others, but in mathematics, in the physical sciences, and in intellectual and moral science, he shows an aptitude, and makes proficiency equal to that of any European race.

The Armenians show a high degree of religious sentiment, manifesting itself not merely in a zealous and bigoted devotion to a religion of forms, but in an impressibility under the presentation of the great truths relating to man's spiritual condition and prospects. In this respect they differ greatly from races like the Greek, Persian, and others; and furnish a ground of hope, which the remarkable progress of an evangelical reformation among them is daily strengthening, that they will receive, and spread throughout the vast regions over which they are scattered, the blessings of a pure and saving Christianity.

Preparation for a work of Evangelization.—It was a favorable circumstance that the errors and corruptions introduced into the Armenian Church had never been reduced to systematic form and set forth by authority of Synod or Council, as was done in the Council of Trent for the Romish Church. No Synodical decision had ever rejected the word of God as the ultimate authority to bind the conscience; and, however practically the traditions of men and authority of the Church were exalted above the Bible, the sentiment has been inwrought into the Armenian mind, too deeply to be eradicated, that the Scriptures, (not including the Apocryphal books, which though sometimes read in the churches, have never been considered canonical) are the court of last resort, against whose decisions nothing can be made to stand. The writings of their own fathers contain abundant testimony to the true Protestant doctrine on this point. The Bible was locked up from the mass of the people in the ancient language, but the educated among them could read it, and there was no ecclesiastical rule to forbid the reading on the part of any. The New Testament was even used as a common textbook in commencing the study of the language in the schools. The honor of having made the first attempt in modern days for the reformation of the Armenian church, is due to a priest by the name of Debajy Oghlâ, about A. D. 1760. He lived in the quarter of Constantinople called Psamatia. He appears to have been acquainted with the character of Luther, of whom he speaks in terms of decided approbation, in a book which he wrote on the errors of the Church, and in which he castigates both clergy and people with an unsparing hand. But while he makes constant reference to the Bible, testing every principle and ceremony by that high standard, and severely reproves superstition and vice, he exhibits no correct appreciation of the only weapon that can overthrow error, the doctrine of justification by faith alone through grace. His book was never printed, but copies of it were circulated from hand to hand, and at the beginning of the present reformation in the Church they were brought out from the obscurity in which they had been kept, and used with considerable effect. How much influence this book may have had in preparing the way for the reformation now in progress, cannot be known.

- In the year 1813, the British and Russian Bible societies, becoming interested in the Armenians, undertook to aid them with a supply of the word of God, copies of which were very rare and dear. An edition of the Armenian Bible (the version of the 5th century,) was commenced by the latter society at St. Petersburg, and by the former at Calcutta. In 1815, the former edition, (of 5,000 copies) was completed; the latter edition (of 2,000 copies) was furnished two years afterwards. The Russian Society also soon published an edition of 2,000 copies of the ancient Armenian New Testament by itself.) The report of the British Society for 1814, says, "The printing of the Armenian Testament nas awakened great attention among the Armenians, particularly in Russia; and a fervent desire has been manifested on their part to possess that invaluable treasure." The Emperor Alexander being at that time a warm promoter of the objects of the Bible Society throughout his dominions, archbishops and bishops, governors and generals, and nearly all the nobility of the empire were among the patrons and supporters of the institution. Among the rest was Eprem (Ephraim) the Catholicos of the Armenian Church, having his residence in Russian Armenia, who was elected one of the vice-presidents of the society, and strongly favored its efforts in behalf of his own co-religionists. The British Society also put into circulation among the Armenians of Turkey large numbers of New Testaments previous to 1823; and in that year we find it publishing at Constantinople an edition of 5000 copies of the New Testament, and of 3,000 copies of the four gospels alone. These were widely distributed through various agencies. The teachers of schools, some of the priests and deacons and all of the higher clergy, having made the ancient language their special study, were prepared to be benefited by these; and in the sequel the reformation began among the teachers.) But the discovery then made that that language was not understood by the mass of the people, led to the issuing by the Russian Society of the New Testament translated into the Armeno-Turkish, in 1822, and in the following year by the British Society in the vulgar Armenian tongue.) A portion of the Armenians of Turkey (perhaps one-third, chiefly in the more southern parts of Asia Minor,) have lost entirely the use of their vernacular tongue, and speak only Turkish; and it was for them especially that the first named translation was intended, being in the Turkish language written with the Armenian character. These translations were very defective, yet were useful. They have since been supplanted by new and greatly improved translations made and published under the auspices of the British and American Bible Societies by missionaries of the American Board. Up to this period, the Armenian ecclesiastics made no opposition, so far as is known, to the circulation of the Bible among their people, and some of them favored it; but when Messrs. Lewis and Baker, agents of the Bible Society in 1823, sought the approbation of the Patriarch at Constantinople to the printing of a version of the New Testament in the modern Armenian, which the common people could understand, that dignitary refused his sanction in the most positive terms. He even threatened that if such a work were attempted, he would prohibit the perusal of it, and punish such as should be found in the possession of it; and the clergy generally, so far as they were consulted, unanimously reprobated the plan of such a translation. Hierarchism dreads the light of God's word, and must change its nature before it can tolerate any movement towards truly spiritual reform.

MISSION OF THE AMERICAN BOARD.—Early in 1821, Mr. Parsons, of the mission to Syria and the Holy Land, on his first visit to Jerusalem, found there some Armenian pilgrims, with whom he had an interesting conversation on religious subjects. Deeply interested in their appearance, he ventured to suggest the thought of having a mission from the American churches sent to Armenia itself. The suggestion was favorably received. Mr. Fisk soon after wrote from Smyrna to Boston, recommending this measure. Before any thing had been heard from them on the subject, it had also been thought of in Boston, and subsequent events decided the adoption of the plan. One of these events was the conversion, at Beirût, of three Armenian ecclesiastics, as the first fruits of the labors of the brethren there. Considering the small number of Armenians in Syria, and that the brethren of that mission were not sent to them, that the first conversions should be from among them is a singular fact. Two of the converts, Dionysius Carabet and Hagop (Yacob or Jacob Agha) were bishops; the other, Krikor. (Gregory Wortabet) was a distinguished preacher (vartabed). These persons, by their correspondence with Constantinople and other parts of Turkey, did much towards preparing the minds of their countrymen for the interesting spiritual work which afterwards commenced among them. Another circumstance was also influential. Mr. King,—now Rev. Dr. King, of Athens,—on leaving Syria in 1825, addressed a farewell letter to the Roman Catholics, stating the reasons why he could not be a Papist. This letter was translated into Armenian by Bishop Dionysius, and a copy in manuscript was sent to some Armenians of distinction in Constantinople. An extraordinary effect was produced on those who read it. A meeting, it is said, was called in the patriarchal church, at which the letter was read, and the references to Scripture examined, and, as if by common consent, it was agreed to do something for the improvement of their church. Out of this grew immediately the famous school of Peshimaljian. This individual was, in many respects, an extraordinary man. He was a critical and accurate scholar in the ancient Armenian tongue; deeply versed in all the lore of his own nation; familiar with the theology of the Eastern and Romish churches,—the doings of their councils, and the general history of the Church;—and, withal, a diligent student of the Bible. Disgusted with the superstitions around him and the character of the clergy, he was easily led, by the writings of certain French infidels, for a time to regard all religion as a delusion and a lie; but afterwards was brought back to the ground that the Bible is the true word of God, and the only standard of faith. It is a remarkable circumstance that such a man should have been placed at the head of a school established within the precincts of the Patriarchate, and had committed to him the training of the candidates for the priesthood, the completion of the regular course of study in this institution being required as a condition to ordination. Cautious although he was, in speaking of the errors of the Church,—and even timid and sometimes time-serving in the presence of the bigoted,—in a silent, unostentatious manner, he gradually led his pupils into new paths of inquiry, and, almost before they were aware of it themselves, they came to believe that the church may err, and actually does err, in many of her teachings. Afterwards, when the Gospel began to take effect, and he saw some of his former pupils boldly advocating the doctrines of evangelical religion, he became alarmed, and tried to keep them back; but, subsequently convinced that they were right, and, in fact, only carrying into practice what they had learned of himself, he ever after strongly, though still privately, encouraged them in their endeavors for the spiritual regeneration of their countrymen. Never, till the day of his death, in the year 1838, did he so far overcome his native timidity, as openly to avow himself an evangelical man; but it is impossible to calculate the amount of influence exerted by him, in preparing the minds of men to experience the power of the gospel, as taught by foreign laborers when they came into that field of evangelization. All the first converts under the labors of the missionaries of the Board in Constantinople, and many of the later ones, were from among the alumni of Peshtimaljean's school.

The establishment of a mission among the Armenians of Turkey was resolved upon by the Prudential Committee of the Board in the year 1829. As a preparatory step, Rev. Eli Smith and Rev. H. G. O. Dwight were sent to explore the field. The tour was commenced in the spring of 1830, and occupied somewhat more than a year; and a mass of new information was obtained, both in regard to the Armenians and the Nestorians, which has since been of essential service in prosecuting missionary operations in that part of the world. Early in the year 1831, the Rev. W. Goodell, then at Malta, was instructed to proceed to Constantinople with his family. They arrived on the 9th of June of the same year; and shortly after, he called upon the Armenian patriarch, and sought his coöperation in establishing schools on an improved plan among the people. The patriarch received him with true oriental politeness, and promised to furnish some schoolmasters, or priests, to learn the new system of instruction, so as to be able to open schools; but the promise was all he did in the matter. On the 5th of June, 1832, Rev. H. G. O

Dwight took up his permanent residence at Constantinople, with his family, having been appointed to labor among the Armenians. Rev. W. G. Schauffler joined the Constantinople station the last of July of the same year, his labors being confined chiefly to the Jews.

The number of Armenian visitors at the mission gradually increased; and early in the year 1833, Hohannes Sahakyan, a pupil in the school of Peshtimaljian, became a deeply interested inquirer, and an earnest student of the Scriptures, in which he found sympathy and aid from his beloved preceptor. The following year he found a friend to whom he communicated his views, and who, after some opposition, embraced them. Mr. Sahakyan soon became a most efficient instrument in promoting the truth, as he has continued to be up to the present time; and never, from that moment, has the mission been without the most satisfactory evidence of the special presence of the Holy Spirit among the Armenian people. On the 18th of July, 1833, Mr. Sahakyan and his companion, in a very solemn manner, committed themselves to the instruction and guidance of the missionaries. One of them was employed as a translator of the mission, and the other as teacher of a school for Armenian youth. They were soon brought into the clear light of the gospel, and led to trust, with a calm and joyful confidence, in Jesus Christ as the only and all-sufficient Saviour.

But opposition now began to manifest itself. By secret clerical interference, both Armenian and Romish, the school was broken up. An Armenian jeweler of great respectability and influence, and strongly attached to the doctrines and rites of his church, had his mind wrought up into a state of great alarm, in reference to the course of these two young men, by the secret insinuations of a Roman priest. They were represented as being the hired tools of certain foreigners, employed to seduce the people, and lead them into dangerous heresy. The jeweler prevailed upon Peshtimaljian to summon the delinquents before him, in order to examine them as to the alleged heresy. He himself was present, and began the examination with great sternness and severity; charging them with violating their obligations to the church, and dishonoring God. They were proceeding to vindicate themselves, when Peshtimaljian took the business wholly out of their hands, and poured upon the astonished jeweler such a flood of light, from history as well as Scripture, to show that their church is wrong, and in many things idolatrous, that even the young men themselves were amazed. They afterwards had an opportunity of speaking for themselves, Peshtimaljian aiding them in their references to the Scriptures whenever their own memories failed; and the result was, that the jeweler was not only entirely satisfied that they were in the right, but immediately became himself an open and powerful advocate of the evangelical doctrines. The circumstance of the closing of the school became a subject of some notoriety, and some minds were by this means put upon a new train of thought. Mr. Sarkis Varjabed, teacher of grammar in the school of Peshtimaljian, became a convert at this time, and was afterwards highly useful to the mission as a translator.

In the autumn of 1833, the missionaries were invited to witness the ordination of fifteen Armenian priests at the Patriarchal church in Constantinople. None had been ordained for many years, in consequence of the new rule which required that only such as had received a regular education at the school of Peshtimaljian should be eligible for ordination. Nearly all the candidates on the present occasion were comparatively well educated men; and one of them had a high reputation for learning. He had a peculiarly serious and devout appearance, and when, some days afterwards, the missionaries called upon him in one of the cloisters of the patriarchate, he seemed deeply impressed by the remarks made to him on the solemn responsibilities resting upon the office-bearers of the church of Christ, and feelingly begged an interest in their prayers. This was Der Kevork, a man whose subsequent influence in promoting the reformation was highly important.

Up to this period, the missionary press had remained in Malta, and had been chiefly employed in printing in Greek and Italian. On the 23d of December, 1833, the Rev. Daniel Temple, and Mr. Homan Hallock, missionary printer, arrived in Smyrna with the press, accompanied by bishop Dionysius, as Armenian translator. But a combination of Armenian and Romish influences induced the Pasha peremptorily to order Mr. Temple's departure from Smyrna with only ten days' notice. The Pasha, however, who had acted hastily and under a misapprehension of the facts in the case, revoked his order, on hearing the explanations of the American consul; but it was thought best that the bishop should return to Beirût, where he had formerly resided; the Armenians being incensed against him on account of his having married and become a Protestant.

The indications of the special presence of the Holy Spirit became more numerous and decisive. The meetings at Mr. Goodell's residence had been gradually increasing in solemnity and interest. On the first Monday of Jan. 1834, the monthly concert was observed, for the first time, in the Turkish language. Intelligence was communicated from the missions, and every heart seemed deeply interested, and many eyes were suffused with tears. The native brethren there received a new impulse to go on with their labors for the salvation of their own countrymen. The number steadily increased of those who frequented the houses of the missionaries, and the main topics of inquiry were deeply practical and spiritual, relating directly to the salvation of the soul. In the course of the year, two or three priests in Constantinople were awakened, and thoroughly convinced of the truth of the evangelical system. The Bible was much sought for and read; many eyes were opened to see the folly of their own superstitions; and a few, it is believed, were added to the number of sincere believers in Jesus Christ. The two young men whose interesting history has been briefly given, and who became native assistants, were active in spreading the truth, and exerted no small amount of instrumentality in bringing about the results that followed.

Every effort made to induce the Armenian ecclesiastical authorities to take the lead in enlarging and improving their schools having proved a failure, the mission at length determined to establish, independently, a high school in Pera, the objects being to educate promising boys and young men in useful branches, to stimulate the Armenians to efforts in this department, and to furnish a model school for them to imitate. The school was opened, October 27, 1834, under the superintendence of Mr. Paspatis, a native of Scio, who had been educated in America, and who, by his religious character, as well as his intellectual training, proved himself to be well fitted for this post.

Rev. John B. Adger joined the Smyrna station in the month of October, 1834. Two new stations were occupied, one at Brûsa and the other at Trebizond. Rev. B. Schneider arrived at Brûsa with his family on the 15th of July, 1834. The Greek bishop forbade his people furnishing the missionary with a house, although one had previously been pledged to him by a prominent member of the Greek community. But the independence of the owner enabled Mr. Schneider to secure a residence in spite of the bishop. And, after some opposition, he was enabled to open a school of 70 children, his labors at first being divided between the Armenians and Greeks. Rev. T. P. Johnson first visited Trebizond in November, 1834. Through priestly interference, he was foiled in three successive attempts to procure a house, and at last he only secured a contract for one, on condition that he should obtain a firman or imperial order, from Constantinople, which he succeeded in doing, through the kind interposition of Commodore Porter, the United States Minister at the Porte; and he removed there with his family in the spring of 1835. The breaking out of the plague, however, prevented him from having much intercourse with the people for some months. At the capital, the number of those who declared themselves Protestants rapidly increased. Not only in the city proper, but throughout the suburbs and the villages on the Bosphorus, wherever Armenians were found, there was an increasing disposition to talk on religious subjects. The missionaries avoided controversy about forms and ceremonies; and instead of attacking directly the superstitions of the church, determined to "know nothing but Christ and him crucified." Cases of true conversion were every now and then occurring, among whom was Der Kevork, before alluded to. He had charge of a school of about 400 boys, supported by the Armenians themselves, and in no way connected with the missionaries. He soon introduced the custom of reading the Scriptures daily, and explaining them to the whole school; and he also formed a class of twenty of his most promising scholars, for the critical study of the New Testament under his immediate direction.

One room in Mr. Goodell's house was always open for Armenians to come together for prayer; and in some instances family prayer was established by the new converts, and a prayer-meeting was maintained by a few pupils in the high school, which had now increased to thirty pupils, and had also grown greatly in favor with the people. The English, French, Italian, Armenian, Turkish, Greek, and Hebrew languages were taught, as well as the mathematics, geography, &c., and lectures were given, illustrated by experiments on various branches of the natural sciences. Mr. Paspatis having left for Paris, Mr. Hohannes Sahakyan was appointed to the superintendency of the school, assisted by several other teachers. Visitors of all classes were numerous, and the lectures were attended by many deeply-interested spectators. Externally, friendly relations were still preserved with the ecclesiastical authorities of the Armenian church; but they already began to manifest their uneasiness at the circulation of the Bible, and the popularity and success of the school established by the mission. Matteos, the newly appointed bishop of Brûsa, was one of the earliest friends of the mission, having imbibed many enlightened views of the truth. Even after his removal to Brûsa, he expressed, by letter, the most friendly sentiments; and when Mr. Schneider called upon him, soon after his arrival, he avowed, in very decided terms, his approbation of the school recently established by the mission in Brûsa. Not many months elapsed, however, before this school was entirely broken up, through the influence of this same prelate, who also endeavored, in other ways, to circumscribe the operations of the missionaries. He afterwards made himself notorious as MATTEOS PATRIARCH, THE PERSECUTOR OF THE PROTESTANTS IN TURKEY. This fact shows how little dependence could be placed upon professions of friendship made by the high ecclesiastics, who, though often convinced of the truth, yet having no fixed principles, are ready to do any thing to please the rich and influential among their people.

The Brûsa station was strengthened by the arrival of the Rev. P. O. Powers and wife, in February, 1835, who took up their abode in the Armenian quarter of the town.

The preparation of books and tracts in Armeno-Turkish and the modern Armenian language, became more and more an object of attention, and Mr. Hallock, the missionary printer, visited the United States to superintend the manufacture, at New York, of punches for making Armenian type for the press in Smyrna; and the liberal sum of $5000 was appropriated to this object, and for the purchase of materials for a foundry and printing office, by the Prudential Committee. Mr. Sarkis, one of the pious Armenians in Constantinople, and an eminent scholar in his own language and literature, removed to Smyrna, to be employed as translator, in connection with the press, under the superintendence of Mr. Adger.

Early in 1836, two weekly meetings were established in Constantinople, one of which was conducted by Mr. Goodell, and the other by Mr. Schauflier, in the Turkish language, which afforded constant evidence of the progress of the work. The houses of the missionaries were frequented by ecclesiastics, as well as laymen, some four of the former, chiefly from among the parochial clergy, appearing to be sincere inquirers after the truth. One of these, attached to the Patriarchal Church, proposed, of his own accord, that the missionaries should publish a new and revised edition of the modern Armenian New Testament, so that all the people might have access to the Word of God in an intelligible language. He offered to subscribe 500 piastres, (about $23) himself, towards the object, and to procure more from others. Some of the most influential vartabeds at the patriarchate were disposed to encourage, rather than hinder educational efforts.

It was now not an uncommon thing, to hear of one and another of the bishops and vartabeds, preaching what were called evangelical sermons. Subsequent facts, however, have shown, in regard to most of them, that public opinion, at that time somewhat clamorous for reform, more than personal conviction and interest in the subject, led to this new style of address.

One of the converts, who was rather prominent as a reformer, was publicly accused of infidelity by a priest; and on the following Sabbath, one of the vartabeds of the Church denounced him before the people, as a heretic and an infidel, whose case was soon to be tried by a council of ecclesiastics and laymen. The council was afterwards held, and although the accused declared plainly that he had no confidence whatever in the mediation of the saints, and that he received the Gospel as his only and all-sufficient guide;—yet he was fully acquitted.

The most diligent and persevering efforts were made, by certain adherents of the Romish Church, to stir up the Armenians against the missionaries. No direct means had been used by them, to enlighten that portion of the Armenian race, who acknowledge the supremacy of the Pope. They may amount, perhaps, to 15,000 or 20,000, having a Patriarch of their own. In July, 1836, this functionary came out with a public denunciation of all the books circulated by the missionaries, including the New Testament, and he expressly prohibited his people from purchasing or procuring from them copies of an edition of the Armenian Scriptures which had been printed at their own press in Venice.

Indications now began more and more to manifest themselves, that the Word of God was operating like silent leaven, especially in the schools where it was daily read as a text book; and many interesting incidents are mentioned in the journals of the missionaries, to illustrate the influence that was operating upon the minds of the people; which Mr. Goodell characterized as a simple and entire yielding up of the heart and life to the sole direction of God's Word and Spirit."

The gospel had now been proclaimed to multitudes of people by conversation in private circles, both in the Turkish and Armenian languages, and a formal expository service had been held in Turkish, by Mr. Goodell, for some time. The first regular sermon in the Armenian tongue, was preached by Mr. Dwight, on the 9th of September, 1836, to a small select company in his own house. The monthly concert of prayer increased in interest. Female education, which had been almost entirely neglected, was beginning to attract attention. At Constantinople parents were beginning to provide instruction for their daughters, and one of the evangelical brethren had a class of Armenian girls who were learning to read. In Smyrna, a school of 40 Armenian girls was established by the mission, in the summer of 1836, with the express approbation of a number of influential men in the community. Owing to one or two jealous spirits, however, a meeting of the community was soon called, and it was agreed to take the new enterprise into their own hands; and it was cheerfully relinquished to them by the missionaries.

In Brûsa, there were many who professed to be friendly to the missionaries; but in general, the silence and insensibility of death reigned among them. Bishop Matteos showed more openly a hostile disposition. The station at Trebizond was reinforced in August, 1836, by the arrival of the Rev. W. C. Jackson and wife.

The principal bankers in the country, at that time, belonged to the Armenian community. According to the system then prevailing, the Pashas and governors of the empire derived their support, not by a salary from the government, but by taxes, levied by themselves, on the produce of the territory over which they had jurisdiction, and by extortion. Every Pasha had his banker, who furnished him with money on interest, when out of office, or when newly appointed to office, receiving his pay by participating in the spoils filched afterwards from the poor people. This arrangement gave great power to these capitalists; and nearly all the important appointments of the government were in their hands. Within their own community their word was law. Patriarchs, as we have shown, were elected and deposed by them; and through them, bishops and vartabeds received their appointments to dioceses and churches. A few of the richest and most powerful of these men decided nearly every question of any importance pertaining to the civil or ecclesiastical affairs of the Armenian nation. As a class, they were ignorant and bigoted, and, therefore, quite ready to believe any misrepresentations of Protestantism which their own religious guides should give them. In this state of things, any office-bearer in the church, high or low, might be deterred from acting, in his official capacity, according to the policy dictated by his own mind. Some rival in the holy orders, even much lower than himself in rank, might, through his superior influence with one or more of these bankers, procure the removal from office of the obnoxious individual. In the year 1837, it was resolved in the counsels of the Armenian community, that is, by a few bankers, as a first step, to break up the High School. In preparation for this, a large college had been founded some months before, at Scütary; and the public school, superintended by Der Kevork, in the quarter of Hass Keuy, had been committed to the general supervision of one of the great bankers residing there, a truly noble-spirited man, that it might be remodeled according to his own wishes, so as to make it a first-rate school. As learning was now becoming popular, these were necessary steps in order to reconcile the people to the shutting up of the Armenian High School. In January, 1837, the parents of the scholars of the missionary school were summoned before the Vicar, and peremptorily ordered to withdraw their sons from the school. Sorrow was depicted on every face, as the pupils came back to get their books, and say their farewells.

The plan of the opposing party in this case, was, after breaking up the school, to procure from the Turkish government, the banishment of Mr. Sahakyan, its principal, and several others who were considered most influential among the evangelical brethren. Great was their astonishment when they heard that, no sooner was this hated individual released, by their act, from his connection with the mission, than he was engaged by the banker of Hass Keuy, to take the superintendence of the great national school, which had been placed by them in his hands! Every effort was made by the anti-evangelical party to persuade him to change his purpose; but he remained firm, and declared that if they did not allow him to manage the school in his own way, he would leave the Armenian community altogether. They were obliged to yield, and soon a school of 600, instead of 40, as before, was in successful operation, under the superintendence of Mr. Hohannes Sahakyan; having Der Kevork, the pious priest, for one of his principal teachers!

The Hass Keuy school was formally adopted as the school of the nation, and Mr. Sahakyan received a regular appointment from the Armenian Synod as its principal. He had therefore, more liberty of action, and could give religious instruction officially. He devoted an hour a day to this special purpose, in a select class of sixty of the most advanced pupils, besides more general instruction, and the daily good influence exerted by himself and Der Kevork.

There was a liberal course of study adopted, and the school was arranged, throughout, after the model of the mission school. Lectures were given in the natural sciences, the whole of the philosophical apparatus of the mission having been purchased and paid for, by the directors.

This institution became deservedly popular; there was now much more boldness on the part of the enlightened Armenians, in spreading the truth; and the light of truth and piety seemed to be kindled in every part of the city.

Inquiry was extending, also, at the interior stations, and the spirit of opposition was likewise awakened.

In September, 1837, a convention of missionaries was held in Smyrna, the chief object of which was, to ascertain, by prayerful inquiry, the mistakes and deficiencies of the past, both in regard to personal qualifications for the work, and the means and measures adopted for bringing the claims of the gospel in contact with the hearts of the people. Recent afflictive dispensations in the mission had produced a mellowed tone of Christian feeling, which greatly prepared the minds of the brethren for a profitable discussion of these subjects. The Lord was felt to be indeed present, and it is believed that each one returned to the toils of missionary life, with a more prayerful and confiding spirit, and a more fixed purpose of heart, to make the salvation of the soul the immediate and all-absorbing object of labor, and the preaching of "Jesus Christ, and him crucified," the grand means.

Mr. Adger was enabled to commence an expository service in Smyrna, in the Armenian language, at which some five or six were usually present. His translator, Mr. Sarkis, from Constantinople, had increasing intercourse with the people; and Armenian mothers began to be eloquent in their lamentations over the neglected education of their daughters. Up to the first of January, 1838, there were printed, at the Smyrna press, about two and a half million pages in the Armenian language.

A pocket edition of the New Testament, in ancient Armenian, was completed on the last day of the year 1837.

The plague, that scourge of Turkey, was permitted this year to enter the family of Mr. Dwight, and a beloved wife and child became its victims. This afflictive dispensation called forth the tenderest expression of sympathy from the native brethren and other friends of the missionaries; and, in various ways, it was truly a sanctified, though most sorrowful event. This terrible disease, in its annual visitations to the capital, and other parts of the Turkish empire, has proved a far more serious obstacle to missionary labor, than can well be imagined in America. The season of the plague was a season of non-intercourse, to a very great extent. Schools must be closed; public worship suspended; and the giving and receiving of visits, in a great measure interrupted. This has happened, again and again, at all the stations. Sometimes, when the missionaries had made a successful and promising beginning of some new plan of usefulness, this dreadful scourge would come down upon them with all its violence, and suddenly arrest the enterprise, and frustrate all their hopes. And in such a country as Turkey, when a school is closed, or public worship suspended for several months, more ground may be lost than can be gained in a whole year. But for 16 years past, since quarantines have been established, Constantinople has not been visited with the plague, showing that it did not originate there.

As the doctrines of the gospel gained a hold on the hearts of the people, superstitions gave way; and, as error became eradicated from the mind, the external symbols of that error were naturally removed from use and from sight. The progress of correct religious opinion was evinced, especially, by the gradual disappearance of pictures from the Armenian churches. In one instance, near the beginning of the year 1838, the vartabed and leading men in the large village of Orta Keuy, on the Bosphorus, went together to the church, and carefully removed every picture, except the altar pieces, which were so situated that they could not be approached for worship. This is the village in which the missionaries resided, when they first began to get access to the Armenians. The patriarch Stepan remarked to one of the native brethren, that many of the observances in their church were not prescribed by the gospel, and that probably they would not exist ten years longer.

The reformation was daily gaining strength. The converted Armenians were active and prayerful. They delighted in the communion of saints; and they also sought and found frequent opportunities for religious conversation with their fellow-countrymen, who, as yet, had not felt the power of the gospel. Mr. Sahakyan continued his connection with the High School at Hass Keuy, and his opportunities for usefulness were many and great. But, such was the opposition of the leading Armenians to Mr. Sahakyan, that its distinguished patron determined to abandon it altogether; and, before the close of the year 1838, most of the teachers were dismissed, and the school reduced to its former footing. Many of the people were strongly in favor of its continuance, and particularly the leading men of the village where it was located; and they sent a delegation to the patriarch, to implore his aid, to prevent the approaching disaster. All they obtained from him was fair promises, that were never fulfilled.

Mr. Sahakyan, being thrown out of employment, was very gladly taken up by the mission. The necessity had for some time been felt, of having a man to superintend the distribution of books, which were rapidly increasing in number. To this post Mr. Sahakyan was appointed, with the confident expectation that it would prove a station of great usefulness.

The kingdom of Christ now began to make evident inroads on the kingdom of Satan, in the interior of the country. Two Armenian priests, in Nicomedia, who had never seen a missionary, had been converted to the truth. One of them afterwards came to Constantinople, and visited the missionaries. He appeared to be a man of a most devout and humble spirit, who had inward experience of the grace of God. The doctrine of salvation, by grace alone, was quite familiar and very precious to him; and he readily discriminated between a living and a dead faith. In 1832, Mr. Goodell left with an old priest at Nicomedia, as he was passing, a copy of the Armeno-Turkish New Testament, and gave to some Armenian boys several tracts in the same language. One of these tracts—a translation of the Dairyman's Daughter—fell into the hands of another priest, whom Mr. Goodell did not see. The perusal of it was the means of his awakening and conversion; and, through his influence, another priest was brought to the knowledge of the truth, and their united prayers and efforts were now directed to the enlightenment and conversion of their flock. The spirit of inquiry began to spread among the people.

In the spring of 1838, Mr. Dwight visited the place and found 16 men, who appeared to be truly enlightened and converted. He was received by them with the greatest cordiality, and they seemed to hang on his lips like men hungering for the bread of life.

The two priests, Der Vertaness, and Der Harûtn, removed, of their own accord, to Constantinople; and were subsequently placed together as the only priests in a village church on the Bosphorus. Here they could act with a good degree of independence, and many opportunities of doing good were presented. During the summer of 1838, the Patriarch Stepan, being an old acquaintance, spent several weeks with them; and they had free conversations together on religious subjects, the Patriarch generally assenting to their views.

Both at Brûsa and Trebizond every possible obstacle was thrown in the way of the progress of the truth; and yet the Word of God could not be bound. In both places there were increasing friendliness on the part of the people, more extended intercourse, and the special presence of the Holy Spirit. Among those whose minds seemed to be especially opened to religious impressions at Trebizond, were the vartabed himself, or acting bishop, and also a priest of the Church. At Brûsa, the two teachers, Mr. Seropè, and Mr. Hohannes, seemed to be growing in grace and in the knowledge of Christ. An influential and distinguished man became a serious inquirer for the way of salvation, and opposition thus far, was overruled for good. In October, 1838, Mr. Schneider began a regular preaching service at his own house, every Sabbath, in the Turkish language, for the benefit of both Armenians and Greeks. The Rev. E. Riggs joined the station at Smyrna, with his family, on the 2d of November, 1838.

By a series of intrigues, commenced near the beginning of the year 1839, the leading bankers were gradually dispossessed of much of their former power, and three or four men from the artisan classes, stood before the nation as its guides and dictators, and especially as defenders of its ancient faith, and the zealous extirpators of heresy. One of these was the Sultan's chief architect, and another was his second. Another was superintendent of the government powder works. The first two were employed at the time, in erecting the most splendid of all the imperial palaces; and this brought them into closer contact with the Sultan than was enjoyed by any of the bankers; and he was so much delighted with their work, that he seemed ready to grant them any request they might make. The expulsion of Protestantism from the land was an object that lay near their hearts; and they now resolved to make use of the strong arm of the Sultan to effect it. Accusations were presented against the evangelical brethren, and the most false and scandalous representations were made, as to the character and tendencies of Protestantism, calculated not only to prejudice the minds of the Turkish cabinet, but to excite the feelings of the populace. The Sultan was easily persuaded, and the architects and powder-maker were fully authorized to call upon the civil power, to aid them in extirpating this dangerous heresy.

But the Patriarch Stepan, was altogether too mild a man for their purpose; and it was reported and believed that his sympathies were with the evangelical party. They procured from the interior of the country, Hagopos, a man who had once been Vicar of the Patriarchate of Constantinople, and who was notorious for his bigotry and sternness of character, to be associated with Stepan, as assistant Patriarch. He soon had the whole power virtually put into his hands, and Stepan sunk to a mere cypher. On the 19th of February, Mr. Sahakyan was arrested, and thrown into the Patriarch's prison, without even the form of an examination, and without being informed of the charges alleged against him. He was a mild, amiable, inoffensive man; of unblemished character, and against whom, as a subject and a citizen, not the slightest imputation could be brought. And yet, while the same so-called Christian Patriarchate would use all possible means to protect felons of every description, who belonged to the Armenian community, even to the murderer himself, from the regular action of the Turkish law, it could rudely seize an innocent man, and deliver him over to the civil authorities, to be punished for daring to think and act for himself, in matters pertaining only to his own soul and God!

The Armenian Patriarchal power at Constantinople has always been a persecuting power, but more especially within the last one hundred and fifty years, during which, much blood even has been shed by it, in the endeavor to prevent proselytism from that Church to the Church of Rome. In the present instance, therefore, the ecclesiastical authorities of the Church were only acting out the true spirit of the establishment. Mr. Boghos Fizika was also arrested and put into the same prison with Mr. Sahakyan. Four days afterwards, these two individuals were put under charge of a Turkish police officer, who was armed with pistols and sword, and, without the least show of trial or expressed accusation, they were sent into banishment by an imperial firman, to a monastery near Kaisery, (the ancient Cæsarea of Cappadocia,) about 400 miles east of Constantinople. The Patriarch Stepan took leave of them with tears. He did not participate in the act of his compeers, and knew well its deep injustice. The police officer, a Turk, stopped at his mother's house in Scûtary, and sent back word that Mr. Fizika was too feeble to bear the fatigues of the journey; but the most positive orders were returned to carry him to Kaisery, either alive or dead.

At Nicomedia, he was refreshed with an interview with the evangelical brethren; and having recruited his health, he went on his way. But the Turkish officer who conducted him, finding they had friends there, treated Mr. Sahakyan with the greatest cruelty, for the purpose of extorting money, till he was compelled to give an order for $100 to secure relief. On their arrival at Kaisery, the Armenians, on being informed that they had been banished merely because they received the Bible as the only infallible guide, replied that the Patriarch might as well banish them all, for they were all of the same opinion.

The greatest efforts were now made at the capital to frighten the brethren into submission. Very few dared to visit the missionaries, and those only under cover of the darkness. On the 3d of March, a Patriarchal bull was issued by Hagopos, adjunct Patriarch, forbidding the reading of all books printed or circulated by the missionaries; and all who had such books in their possession were required to deliver them, without delay, to their bishop or confessor. The brethren, though appalled by such violent proceedings, still exhibited great constancy; and seemed ready to suffer joyfully the spoiling of their goods, and, if need be, imprisonment, banishment, and the bastinado, for their Master's sake.

On the 14th of March, Der Kevork, the pious priest of Hass Keuy, was arrested and thrown into prison. Eight days after, the Patriarch Stepan was deposed from office, and permitted to retire to his convent at Armash, near Nicomedia; and on the following day, his assistant, Hagopos, was installed in his place. During the same week, the Greek Patriarch issued a bull, excommunicating all who should buy, sell, or read the books of the Lutherans or Calvinists, as the missionaries were called; and an imperial firman was also published, requiring all the patriarchs to look well to their flocks, and guard them against foreign influence and infidelity. It was now quite evident that the Sultan himself was an interested party in these transactions. After lying in prison for more than a month, Der Kevork was banished into the interior; and two vartabeds, who had presided over dioceses as bishops, one more teacher, and several other persons, were sent into exile about the same time. As there was no examination of any case, some who were made the victims of this cruel fanaticism, had never in any way been associated with the evangelical men, but were made to participate in their punishment by a mere mistake.

April 28, the Patriarch issued a new bull, more violent than the former, threatening terrible anathemas, in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, against all who should be found having any intercourse with the missionaries, or reading their books; and also against all who neglected to inform, when made acquainted with offenders. Within two or three days, a rich banker, who had been for years on friendly terms with the missionaries, and who was especially the patron of Mr. Boghos Fizika, was arrested and imprisoned in the hospital, as an insane person: this is a method of persecution not unfrequently resorted to in this country. The banker was released after about a week's confinement, on paying a large sum towards the college at Scutary, to atone for the mischief he had done by his insanity!

The list of suspected persons had now swelled to a very large number; and a strong effort was being made to procure the expulsion of the missionaries themselves from the country. Multitudes of persons of diverse characters, were active, from diverse motives, in keeping up the spirit of fanaticism. The native brethren were at their wits' end, and even the missionaries could not see how God was going to deliver his people. Providence solved the problem, however, with the greatest imaginable ease. The persecuting powers were suddenly thrown into the deepest consternation, by a demand from the Sultan to all the Patriarchs, that each should furnish him with several thousand men, to recruit his broken army, and enable him to prosecute his war with Mohammed Ali of Egypt. Though an unprecedented demand, it must be promptly obeyed. Public attention was now entirely absorbed in this subject, and the doomed Protestants were for the moment forgotten. The army was raised, and marched to the field. It was estimated to consist of 80,000 men; and on the plains of Nezib, near Aleppo, it encountered an Egyptian force of about the same number. The battle was fought on the 24th of June, 1839, and the Turkish troops were utterly defeated, and scattered in all directions. Tidings of this disaster, however, never reached the ears of the Sultan Mahmûd. He died in his own palace, on the Bosphorus, on the first day of July. His son, Abdûl Mejid, was girded with the imperial sword, on the 11th; and a few days after, the news reached the capital that the Capudan Pasha had treacherously surrendered up the whole Turkish fleet to Mohammed Ali. Thus, both the army and navy were gone, and a mere boy of seventeen was upon the throne, in the place of the great Mahmûd; and the entire dissolution of the empire seemed inevitable. Nothing but the intervention of the great powers of Europe prevented this catastrophe.

By this rapid succession of remarkable events, God rebuked the persecutors of his people, and effectually removed from them the power of carrying into effect their unholy designs. Judgment succeeded judgment. A fire broke out in Pera, which consumed between three and four thousand houses, destroying an immense amount of property and several lives. Immediately after, a meeting of the Armenian Synod was called, and, after much violent debating, it was resolved that a part of the exiles should be recalled. Mr. Sahakyan, being considered a "ring-leader," was to be left in perpetual banishment. All the others returned to their homes before winter set in. Some of them were restored to their former stations. The converted brethren, generally, soon took courage. They cautiously resumed their intercourse with the missionaries, and gradually became bolder than ever in their efforts to spread the knowledge of the truth.

In the mean time, at the suggestion of others, Mr. Sahakyan wrote two or three letters, successively, to the Patriarch, petitioning for his own release. They were couched in terms of great a part, but as they contained no confession of error, and no promise of future submission, his request was denied. The bishop of Kaisery also wrote to the Patriarch in his behalf, saying that he had watched Mr. S. very closely, and had "found no fault in him;" but this application also failed. But, through the intervention of an English gentleman, who was one of the physicians of the palace, the Patriarch, by request of the Sultan, after many delays, and sorely against his will, sent an order for the release of Mr. S. on the 10th of February, 1840.

Steps were taken to make this persecution general; and similar measures of oppression and cruelty were resorted to at Brûsa, Trebizond, and other places.

But, while these violent measures imposed an outward check upon the work, it was evident that the truth was spreading; even the measures taken to check the reformation, being in many instances the means of awakening inquiry; and at the very time when the storm was raging at the capital, and at different points on the sea-coast of the empire, the mission was pushing its advanced posts into the very heart of the enemy's country. In April, Mr. Jackson, from Trebizond, visited Erzurûm, almost in the centre of ancient Armenia, in order to make arrangements for commencing operations in that town. While he was there, a letter was publicly read in the church from the Patriarch, warning the people against intercourse with the Americans, and against patronizing their schools and reading their books; and ordering them to seize such books, wherever they could be found, and to commit them to the flames. This did not prevent Mr. Jackson from procuring a dwelling house, which he accomplished through the kind assistance of the British consul, and on the 11th of September, 1839, he removed there with his family. In February of the same year, the station at Constantinople was strengthened by the arrival of the Rev. C. Hamlin and wife, he being designated to open a seminary for Armenian boys.

The first Monday in January, of the year 1840, was observed as a day of special fasting, humiliation and prayer, throughout all the mission stations of the Board in Turkey. The events of the preceding year, and the existing state of things in the country, rendered it a season of deep interest. It became more and more evident that the persecuting power had received a check from which it would not immediately recover. The efforts of the persecutors to destroy the truth had only made it more extensively known; while the injustice, violence and cruelty of the clergy had brought them into contempt.

At the commencement of the year 1840, intercourse was resumed with most of those whom the persecution had temporarily repelled from the missionaries, and there was evidently no diminution of interest in religious inquiry. One striking providence after another occurred, calculated to lead the hearts of the faithful to repose in God, and to be "nothing terrified by their adversaries." In several instances, signal judgments followed the persecutor, so that even the enemies themselves were constrained to acknowledge that God himself was uttering his reproofing voice. The sudden manner in which the late Sultan was cut off, and his forces by land and sea destroyed, at the very time when he was aiding by his authority to vex the church, has already been noticed. The chief instrument in inducing him to use his mighty power for such a purpose, was, by the Sultan's death, deprived of his influence; and shortly after, his wife was removed by death, and he himself brought down to the grave's mouth. Another powerful man, who had actively opposed and persecuted the evangelical brethren, within a short space of time lost two daughters by sudden death; a third daughter became deranged, and also a daughter-in-law; his wife was deformed by sickness, and also made nearly blind, and he himself became a miserable invalid. And soon after the young Sultan came upon the throne, a charter of rights was granted to the people, without their asking for it, providing for some fundamental changes in the internal administration of the government. In the presence of all the foreign ambassadors, the sovereign solemnly pledged himself to guard, as far as in him lay, the liberty, property, and honor of every individual subject, without reference to his religious creed. No one was to be condemned, in any case, without an impartial trial, and no one was to suffer the penalty of death, without the sanction of the Sultan himself. Under this charter changes the most momentous, particularly for the Christian and Jewish population, have already taken place in Turkey; and everything now indicates, that according to the honest intention and policy of the present government, there is ultimately to be a complete carrying out of its provisions, in every part of the empire.

Under the old system, bankers were needed to furnish capital to the pashas, until they should procure their supplies from the oppressed people. An important part of the new system, however, was, that thenceforward the ruling pashas and governors throughout the country, should each receive a fixed salary from the government; and in no case meddle with the collection of taxes. Accordingly, near the beginning of the year 1840, all the bankers of the government received orders to settle up their accounts, as they were to be no longer needed in the capacity in which they had heretofore served the state. This threw many of them into great distress, and some it completely ruined. One was driven, in his desperation, to the crime of suicide. Thus did God put another obstacle out of the way, which hitherto had seriously obstructed the progress of his kingdom.

In the spring of 1840 the Greek Patriarch, who had joined hands with the Armenian Patriarch in persecuting the people of God, was suddenly deposed from office, by order of the Turkish government; and it was not long before the Armenian Patriarch followed him into retirement. He became so odious, on account of his overbearing, violent spirit, as well as his follies, that he was obliged to resign to save himself from being deposed; and Stepan, who had been ejected for his mildness and his forbearance towards Protestants, was reelected to the Patriarchate, first by vote of the principal bankers, and afterwards by acclamation, in an immense popular assembly.

On the 24th of May, 1840, Mr. Sahakyan returned from his banishment, and his presence tended greatly to strengthen the native brethren. He soon commenced a series of active labors for the good of his countrymen. Priest Vertaness also, not being able conscientiously to perform all the duties required of him as priest, quietly and unostentatiously withdrew; and resolved to devote his whole time in laboring for the spread of the truth among his countrymen. He thus abandoned, voluntarily, a situation in which he was honored and supported, for one in which he was exposed to constant suspicion, reproach and persecution, and, at the same time, with very uncertain means of subsistence. Priest Kevork seemed to be "full of faith and of the Holy Ghost," preaching more boldly than before his banishment, that there is but "one name given under heaven among men whereby we must be saved;" and ready to suffer again, if need be, for his beloved Lord and Master. The doctrinal views of the converted Armenians seemed, in general, wonderfully clear; which was the more surprising, considering the immense rubbish of superstition and error that originally encumbered their minds. The standard doctrine of the reformation in Europe—salvation by grace alone, without the deeds of the law, was usually the great central truth, first apprehended by their awakened and inquiring minds, and made the ground of satisfactory repose.

The number of inquirers steadily increased, and indeed nearly all who called upon the missionaries, came for the avowed purpose of religious conversation. The story had been very industriously circulated, especially during the persecution, that the Americans were a nation of infidels, without even the form of religion; and that the missionaries were aiming to convert all the Armenians to infidelity, and only pretended at first to believe the Bible, so as the more easily to draw people into their snares; and in more than one instance, their visitors showed at first no little anxiety to know exactly what was the truth of the matter; and whether we have any churches in America, and whether any number of people ever assemble for worship on the Sabbath!

Before the end of the year 1840, a room in the business quarter of the city, for receiving visitors, and for conference on religious subjects, was procured and kept open on two stated days of each week, and gradually became a place of much resort for religious inquiry.

About the same time, the book depository was removed to the heart of the city; and in the most public manner the products of the press, so lately anathematized by the Patriarch, were daily sold by an agent, who was himself an Armenian. More than three hundred dollars' worth of books, in the different languages, were sold at Constantinople during the year 1840.

A weekly meeting in the Armenian language, commenced by Mr. Dwight in the autumn of 1839, with only three individuals, and that privately, for fear of the persecutors, gradually increased, and before the end of 1840, it was held twice a week, publicly, and more than 25 different individuals had attended.

November 24, 1840, a boarding-school for Armenian boys and young men was opened at Bebek, on the Bosphorus, under the superintendence of Mr. Hamlin, with three pupils, and within about a week, applications had been made for 15 boarding scholars, though their means, at first, would allow them to receive only 12. An effort was soon made to crush the infant seminary, though it proved entirely futile, and was in itself not a little ludicrous. A deputation from the village of Bebek itself, consisting of the Armenian priest, two Greek priests, one of the village rulers, and several of the inhabitants, called upon the Armenian Patriarch, and expressed to him their deep regret that such a dangerous man as Mr. Hamlin should be allowed to reside in their quarter. They accused him of eating meat, eggs, butter, milk, &c., both in Lent and also on Wednesdays and Fridays, the days of their weekly fast! He also taught his scholars that it is no more wicked to eat butter than oil; or meat than bread; or eggs than olives! Another grievous offence was, that neither Mr. H. nor his scholars made the sign of the cross; nor worshiped the Virgin Mary, or the saints! Of course, they said, he must be a confirmed infidel, and he can teach nothing better in his school than the works of Voltaire! The Patriarch was too well informed, and too well disposed, to be moved by such an application; and the petitioners had leave to withdraw.

During the month of June, 1840, Mr. Hamlin and Mr. Dwight visited Nicomedia. The brethren there were sorely threatened, during the reign of violence at the capital, but no serious persecution was actually attempted. They had had little spiritual aid or comfort from abroad. They had been thrown upon their Bibles for religious teaching, and upon the Holy Spirit for their expounder of religious truth, and upon God as their only protector; and they had grown rapidly in knowledge and grace. The missionaries sat with them, on the Sabbath, conversing of the things of God, for ten hours, and so intense was their interest that they would have sat for ten hours more.

While they were there, a stranger from a neighboring town, a merchant, being in Nicomedia on business, had the curiosity to call upon them. He said that the report of them had reached his place through the Patriarch's letter of warning, and that he, in common with many of his brethren, was very anxious to know what this new way was. They explained to him their views, and gave him a copy of the New Testament in the modern Armenian, and also several tracts, and he took his leave, expressing his high gratification with the interview. In this way was the knowledge of the gospel first carried to Adabazar, the residence of this individual. It is situated about 27 miles directly east of Nicomedia.

The reaction after the persecution, was not confined to the capital. In Brûsa and Trebizond the demand for books increased, and there were some who gave evidence of being truly converted; and even at the new station at Erzurûm there were signs of promise.

The Rev. H. J. Van Lennep was connected with the Smyrna station during April, 1840. The labors of the missionaries here were chiefly through the press, and during the year 1840 more than six millions of pages were printed in the Armenian and Armeno-Turkish languages alone. The most important work in the latter was the Pentateuch, translated under Mr. Goodell's supervision. Its publication was hailed with joy by multitudes. The Armenians of Smyrna also established a press, and published a newspaper.

The year 1841 opened with many indications that a thorough reformation was going forward in the Armenian community. A very marked difference was observed in the general style of preaching in the Armenian churches at the capital. There was a growing desire to study the scriptures, and a disposition to compare every doctrine and practice with the written word; and this could not, with safety, be disregarded. It was not an uncommon thing to hear of sermons on repentance, on the Sabbath, on the Judgment day, &c., altogether based upon the Bible; and, in some instances, the preachers borrowed largely from the publications of the missionaries for their materials; and they had repeated applications to furnish matter directly for sermons, for one of the most respectable vartabeds in Constantinople. Another of the vartabeds went so far even as to combat the prevailing error of substituting Mary and the saints as mediators for Christ, declaring that the name of Christ is the only one given under heaven, among men, whereby we can be saved.

As the reformation advanced, instances of pungent conviction of sin, and a strong and deep apprehension of spiritual things became more common than had before been noticed. Some persons of infamous character became the subjects of an entire change, so that many of those who were without, were constrained to speak of the change as most wonderful. The converted brethren also, with scarcely an exception, appeared to be growing in grace, and in the knowledge of Jesus Christ, and in an active zeal for the salvation of others.

Priest Vertaness was full of activity and hope. Almost every day he brought word of some new and interesting case of inquiry in some part of the city. His whole time was occupied in going from house to house. In the spring of 1841, a report came to Constantinople that a number of Armenians in Nicomedia were about going over to the Jesuits; and the Patriarch commissioned this same priest Vertaness to go there with all speed, and endeavor to bring them back to their mother church. Thus fortified by a commission from the highest power, he had perfectly free access to every family in the Armenian community in that town. He was quite successful in the object of his mission, and while he heartily and faithfully obeyed the Patriarch, and endeavored to persuade men not to suffer themselves to fall into the clutches of Rome, he also labored still more zealously to bring them to a sense of their sins against God, and to a hearty reception of Christ alone, as the Saviour of their souls. His visit was a great comfort to the brethren in Nicomedia, as well as an advantage to the cause at large.

In Adabazar regular meetings for prayer and reading the Scriptures, were held every Sabbath, and from 25 to 50 were usually present. One of the priests seemed to have become obedient to the faith. A handbill tract, containing simply the ten commandments, in the modern tongue, without note or comment, was the means of opening many eyes to see the folly and sin of picture worship. One year previously there could not probably have been found a single soul, among the 4,000 Armenian inhabitants of Adabazar, who was not groping in the deepest spiritual darkness. Now two scores or more were convinced of the errors of their Church, and ready to take the Bible as their only religious guide, and several appeared to be truly converted men, and were willing even to lay down their lives for Christ. All this took place before any missionary had visited them. In the autumn of 1841, Mr. Schneider, in compliance with their oft-repeated invitations for a missionary to visit them, went to Adabazar, and returned from the visit with the most cheering impressions, that what had been done was truly the work of God's Spirit. A spirit of inquiry was found to be extending itself through many of the neighboring villages.

In Constantinople a most singular state of things existed. The Patriarch was personally well-disposed towards the evangelical party, but still, by no means a decided friend, and easily influenced by the bankers. His Vicar, or rather colleague, for such he became, though by no means bigoted, probably not much of a believer in anything, was time-serving and somewhat cunning. A strong portion of the tradesmen were in favor of a change of Patriarch, and as a most ready means of accomplishing their object, they spread the story everywhere, that Stepan, the occupant of the see, was a Protestant, and was playing into the hands of the missionaries. As an evidence of this, they pointed triumphantly to the Seminary at Bebek, consisting altogether of Armenian boys, and yet their parents were not ordered to keep them at home. It was necessary for the poor Patriarch to do something. The Vicar summoned before him a priest and two laymen, who had children there, and privately told them to remove their boys; but charged them not to speak about it in public. The priest obeyed, but after a few days, brought his boy back. The Vicar again ordered him to remove his child. He again obeyed, but soon returned him as before. This was repeated four or five times. At length the school was voluntarily suspended for a few weeks; and then went on more prosperously than ever.

A fierce quarrel soon broke out between the bankers and the tradesmen, in reference chiefly to the alleged mismanagement of the pecuniary affairs of their college at Scütary, which kept the whole community in a state of intense excitement and agitation for many months; and, in the mean time, the missionaries and the native brethren were left to prosecute their labors unmolested. The real cause of this rupture is to be traced to the domineering spirit of some of the bankers, to whose irresponsible rule, the increasing intelligence of the tradesmen was teaching them no longer quietly to submit. The latter succeeded in procuring the appointment, by the people, of a committee of counsellors, consisting of 24 persons, to whom every question of importance, pertaining to the business matters of the Armenian community, was to be referred. After a brief interval of repose, a list of charges, which had been made out by the united efforts of some of the bankers, and some of the clergy, was presented by the Patriarch to the Porte, against these 24 men; one of which was, that they had formed the plan of placing themselves and the people under the protection of Russia, and thus bidding defiance to the Turks! The whole 24 were immediately thrown into prison. As soon as the people heard of it, they rushed to the Sublime Porte, to the number of from

4 to 6,000, and called upon the Grand Vizir either to release their representatives, or imprison them all. This officer replied that their own bankers and Patriarch were their accusers. The people exclaimed, "We do not acknowledge the authority of our bankers or clergy; we are subjects of the Sultan." It soon became evident that the true policy of the government was to yield, and the prisoners were accordingly released. The people then demanded the immediate removal of the Patriarch. Upon this the bishops and vartabeds were all summoned to the Porte, and the tradesmen were called upon to select from among them the one they would prefer as Patriarch. The reply was, "We will have none of these men; they are all alike bad men; men who live by extorting money from the poor people. We want none of them. We will take time to consider the matter." The assembly was then dismissed, and the clergy went away in disgrace. As they passed through the crowd, remarks like the following were heard from the lips of the people: "There go our oppressors!" "Whoever goes with them goes to destruction!" "Let no man step his foot again in the Armenian Church, on the peril of his salvation, so long as these men are there!" "Behold the deceivers and robbers of the people!" For some days afterwards, the wickedness of the clergy was a subject of universal remark. Many said, "We thought that Stepan, our present Patriarch, was one of the best of them; and we called him a dove, but he has proved to be a raven. He has betrayed his people into the hands of the Mohammedans! If he is the best, what must the others be?"

This struggle continued for several months, each party alternately triumphing, and succumbing, until at last a peremptory order was issued by the Sultan, that the belligerents should forthwith make peace, and that a certain number of men should be regularly chosen, to be associated with the Patriarch in administering the affairs of the community. Subsequently it was arranged that two committees should be appointed, one for ecclesiastical, and the other for secular matters, and the Patriarch be the chairman of each; and this order of things still prevails.

The Patriarch, Stepan, was soon removed from office, and as the people and bankers could not agree upon any of the prominent candidates, they selected an obscure old bishop, by the name of Asdûadzadûr, who had always been an eccentric character, and was now in his dotage. This also was so overruled as to work mightily for the spread of the truth in the land. Such was the peculiar oddity and capriciousness of this man, that nobody wished to go to the Patriarchate for any purpose, except through dire necessity. Everybody seemed to feel that the less they had to do with their Patriarch the better. And when any thing was said about the need of adopting rigorous measures to check the spread of Protestantism, the reply usually was, "What does that concern us? Let every man do as he likes."

The Vicar of the new Patriarch was one of those exiled for Protestantism, in the year 1839. He was formerly acting bishop at Trebizond, and there became pretty thoroughly enlightened as to the errors of his Church. His exaltation to the office of Patriarch's Vicar, was as unexpected to him as it was to the missionaries and to the evangelical brethren generally; and that also was of God. Only a short time previous he had applied to the mission for employment in the book-making department.

The brethren were still exempt from persecution, though they did not rest from prayer and labor. They walked "in the fear of the Lord and in the comfort of the Holy Ghost," and "were multiplied." It was a period of quiet and steady increase to the church. There was among the native brethren, a very delightful increase of spirituality of mind, and an extraordinary spirit of prayer. They often assembled in small circles to ask for God's blessing on the means of grace; and often, after sermon on the Sabbath, would several of them remain, in order to have a season of social prayer. If they found any individual in the congregation giving indications of special seriousness, they did not fail to stop, and converse and pray with him.

The year 1842 was distinguished for the special presence of the Holy Spirit. The whole city of Constantinople was filled with rumors of "the new doctrines," and they formed the topics of discussion in almost all assemblies of Armenians. The minds of some were wonderfully wrought upon. The thoughtless and gay became sober and prayerful; the worldly became spiritually minded; the proud became meek and lowly; opposers and persecutors were disarmed, and a few were transformed into decided friends and helpers. Priests and vartabeds, and even monks, were obedient to the faith; of which the missionaries give in detail some most interesting instances.

The zeal of the Armenian Christian brethren, in endeavoring to enlighten and reclaim their own countrymen, whether far or near, was one of their most striking characteristics. In the summer of 1842, several of them met in a retired spot among the hills that surround the capital, and after uniting in prayer for the guidance and blessing of the Holy Spirit, they resolved to send forth one of their number, at their own expense, on a missionary tour among the Armenians in the interior of Asia Minor. The individual selected for this service was priest Vertaness, who readily accepted the call, and soon proceeded on his way. It was a tour attended with many good results.

Nor did they forget the claims of other races around them, who were living in ignorance of the Gospel. With the Jews especially, they had almost daily conversation in reference to the one only Saviour, Jesus Christ; and this was the more remarkable, since there could scarcely be found among the other classes of people in Turkey, any other feeling than that of contempt for the outcast children of Abraham.

There was also a very marked increase of interest and religious inquiry among females. Hitherto the important element of female influence had been in a great measure wanting in the reformation. The cause of this was two-fold; first, the extreme ignorance and consequent bigotry of the female portion of the population, there never having been the least provision for their education; and, secondly, the difficulty of access to them, and of their availing themselves, even when disposed, of the privileges of the gospel, owing to the peculiar customs of society in the East respecting the seclusion of women. The priests, from their official character as confessors, have free access to the females of the community. The pious priests were not backward in availing themselves of this privilege, and chiefly through their instrumentality, in the years 1842 and 1843, several of the Armenian females became deeply interested in religious concerns, and some few gave evidence of being truly converted. From that time they began to form a part of the regular visitors, and some few became regular attendants at the preaching service in the Seminary. About the same time Mr. Dwight opened a week-day preaching service in Armenia, exclusively for females.

The distribution of the publications of the press became an important branch of labor, and quite sufficient to occupy the best part of one man's time. Mr. Homes was designated to this particular work, and he soon found that in connection with his other labors, he was fully and most usefully employed. There was a constantly increasing demand for books, so that by the spring of 1843, it was impossible to procure a supply from the press and bindery in Smyrna, with the limited funds they had, to meet seasonably all the orders that came in. Eight or ten booksellers at the capital were kept constantly supplied, and the products of the press were also sent to almost every part of the interior, even into Russia, Georgia, and Persia. An Armenian archbishop near Odessa, on receiving some of these, expressed the greatest joy; and remarked that they ought to be grateful towards those who were engaged in preparing such excellent books for their countrymen. More than 40,000 volumes and tracts were issued from the Smyrna depot to the different stations, during the year 1842. The translation of the whole Old Testament into the Armeno-Turkish language, to which Mr. Goodell had devoted his undivided attention and strength for many years, was happily completed on the 6th of November, 1841, and was published at Smyrna, in the spring of 1842; and before the end of the following winter, the revision of the New Testament in the same language was also finished by Mr. Goodell, and the translation published. And by its side may be placed an edition of the New Testament in the modern Armenian, published about the same time in Smyrna, as revised by Mr. Adger. The expense of the latter work was defrayed by the British and Foreign Bible Society, while that of the former came from the American Bible Society.

One of the most striking traits of the reformed Armenians is, their reverence and love of the Word of God. Some have been known to sit up all night to read and study the Bible, when it was first furnished to them in an intelligible language; and the prevailing desire of all seemed to be, to understand what God teaches through his Word, and to conform their belief and practice wholly to his teachings. A distinguished Armenian having published a book against Protestantism, under the direction and at the expense of the Jesuits, the Vicar of the Patriarch condemned the procedure, admitted that there were errors in their church, and said that this book would call forth a reply from the missionaries, which would expose these errors to the people.

The seminary still survived all the shocks it received from the jealousy and hatred of its enemies. For several months the most vigorous efforts were made by bankers, priests, vartabeds, and bishops, especially those who were endeavoring to uphold the Scütary College, to crush this institution; when lo! the Scütary College was closed in spite of all their efforts, and the mission Seminary still lived and flourished!

The Rev. G. W. Wood, who arrived at Constantinople with his wife, in the summer of 1842, was associated with Mr. Hamlin in the instruction of the seminary, the number of scholars being 25, all of whom boarded in the establishment. Besides the incalculably important bearing of such an institution on the cause of evangelical religion in Turkey, it proved itself to be highly useful also as an object of attraction to visitors, drawing them within the sound of the gospel, and those, too, often of a class that could not be induced to go for instruction to the private house of a missionary.

Two of those who were numbered with the converted brethren, in the autumn of 1842, became disaffected, and left, the occasion being a paragraph or two in the Missionary Herald, respecting the probability and desirableness, in certain circumstances, of a separation of the evangelical brethren from the Armenian Church. Mr. Southgate, (afterwards bishop) of the American Protestant Episcopal Church, first directed their attention to the article, and translated the paragraphs alluded to for them, neither of them being acquainted with the English language.

The work progressed also at the interior stations. But success, as usual, awakened opposition; and an enlightened priest, at Erzurum, who had begun to preach the truth to his people, was suspended from office, and bastinadoed by the bishop with his own hands. The sufferer, after counting 25 blows, swooned away, and in this condition was bound with a chain, and thrown into prison, where he remained till the next morning. After being released, he told the bishop, in the presence of witnesses, that he should continue to read and teach the gospel. This same bishop was once a serious inquirer, and even suffered persecution for Protestantism. He was one of the exiles in 1839; but, since his restoration to power, he has been a bitter and violent persecutor.

The Providence of God wonderfully favored the brethren in Adabazar. In the spring of 1842, the vartabed gave them formal permission to meet every Sabbath day in a private house, for prayer and reading the Scriptures; and there were usually from 25 to 50 present. Enemies they still had, however, who were always watchful for opportunities of thwarting and distressing them. A visit from the bishop of the diocese,—the ex-patriarch Stepan,—in the spring of 1843, seemed to offer such an opportunity. It was represented to him that a new sect had sprung up among them, which had embraced very strange and heretical notions, and was spreading its poison in all directions. He took down the names of the leading men of this so-called sect, whom he afterwards summoned before him, and asked them to give an account of themselves. They replied that they had not separated themselves from the Armenian Church, but that they received the Scriptures as the only rule of faith and practice; that they tried to keep holy the Sabbath day; that they endeavored to refrain from lying, swearing, and blasphemy, and in all things to follow strictly the rules of Christ. The bishop, after questioning them still further, for his own satisfaction, decided that there was no fault in them at all in this matter, and, expressing the wish that all the Armenians would do the same, dismissed them.

At Nicomedia, the work received a new impulse in 1842, when the attendance on a weekly prayer-meeting was suddenly increased from six or eight to 40 or 50. Many minds were in an inquiring state. Opposition was made, but the bishop gave a decision similar to that he had given at Adabazar, and publicly charged his people to abstain from meddling with these men. The awakening influences of the Holy Spirit were also felt in Smyrna to some extent, as in almost every part of the Armenian field.

In 1843, a young Armenian, who had, in an unguarded moment, embraced Mohammedanism, and afterwards returned to his former profession, was publicly beheaded in the streets of Constantinople, in opposition to the remonstrances of Sir Stratford Canning, the British minister; in consequence of which, that gentleman, in behalf of his government, and backed by the French, Prussian, and Russian ambassadors, demanded from the Sultan a written pledge that no person who had embraced the Mohammedan religion, and afterwards returned to Christianity, should, on that account, be put to death. The Turks yielded, through necessity, after holding out for several weeks, and the pledge required was given, signed by the Sultan himself, the conceded interpretation of which is, that henceforth, NO PERSON SHOULD BE PERSECUTED FOR HIS RELIGIOUS OPINIONS IN TURKEY. So plainly was the finger of God manifest in this whole transaction, that His Excellency, Sir Stratford Canning, afterwards distinctly acknowledged that God alone had done it, and added, that to him it seemed little less than a miracle. No reference was made, in these proceedings, to the persecuted people of God in Turkey; yet, in this indirect way, the foundation was laid for their full enjoyment of religious liberty.

During the winter of 1843-4, the stations in Turkey were favored with a visit from the Rev. Rufus Anderson, D.D., Secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, and the Rev. Joel Hawes, D.D., a corporate member of the Board. An opportunity was thus afforded for full consultations on various subjects, having a practical bearing on the missionary work, the results of which clearly attested the expediency of the measure. An important change followed in reference to one department of labor. The mission to the Greeks in Turkey was abandoned. Mr. Riggs, of Smyrna, and Mr. Ladd, of Brusa, hitherto laboring exclusively in this department, now gave themselves up to the work among the Armenians. Mr. Benjamin, of Athens, joined the station at Trebizond, with a view to the same field. Mr. Calhoun removed from Smyrna to Syria, and Mr. Temple, much to the regret of all who knew him, returned to America, as, at the age of fifty-four, it would not have been wise for him to attempt the acquisition of a new and difficult language.

From 1843 to 1846, there was no long period of exemption from persecution, though, throughout the whole field, the spirit of inquiry and discussion wonderfully spread, and believers were multiplied. On the whole, there was a very decided increase in the size of the congregations on the Sabbath, though, both at Trebizond and Erzurum, it became necessary, during a portion of the time, to suspend public worship, on account of the hostility of the hierarchy. There was, indeed, such a hungering for the Word, as has probably been rarely witnessed in this world. Family worship—consisting of reading the Scriptures and prayer in the vulgar tongue, was established in many households; and often did the request come from females, living in different quarters of the city, that meetings might be opened in their neighborhood expressly for the women.

To meet the wants of the times, and in obedience to what seemed plainly to be a providential intimation, a female seminary was opened at Pera in the autumn of 1845. It was kept in the house of Mr. Goodell, in whose family the pupils boarded, and Miss Lovell, who had arrived from America for the purpose the preceding spring, took charge of the educational department. The school opened with eight scholars, which were as many as could then be sustained by the funds, though many parents were sadly disappointed when they were told no more could be received.

In the autumn of 1844, the Patriarch Asdûadzadûr, resigned his office, and Matteos, formerly bishop of Brusa, but then of Smyrna, was appointed in his place. The former, before his resignation, became more and more openly intolerant towards Protestantism. By his orders, priest Vertaness was again subjected to persecution, being divested of his office, cast into prison, and afterwards rudely banished. The new Patriarch was a vacillating man; well convinced of the errors of his Church, and sometimes appearing to favor reform, but extremely afraid of offending the party that was strongest for the time being. Peshtimaljian represented him as a man of enlightened views, but without principle, and always governed by what he considered the prevailing opinions and wishes of those whom he desired to please. "In short," said the teacher, "he is just like an empty cistern. If you put your head to its mouth and say boo, the cistern says boo; if you say bah, the cistern answers bah." Matteos is a man of more than common ability and shrewdness, and withal exceedingly plausible in his manner, and deep in his schemes.

Soon after he came into power, many of the evangelical brethren called upon him; some in obedience to custom, and others by special invitation. To all he manifested a friendly spirit; and professed to be in favor of education and even of reform, and opposed to persecution. He was, however, exceedingly anxious that both the missionaries, and the "Bible-men" in the Armenian community should "keep still," and avoid all "agitation."

The position of the Patriarch was a most difficult one. The enemies of the truth were clamorous for some decisive measures which should effectually check the alarming tendency to Protestantism. They would neither allow their Patriarch to let the matter rest, nor to make any compromise. Already had the report gone abroad that Matteos himself was a Protestant. And in sober truth he knew and doubtless acknowledged to his own soul, that the Protestants were right and his own Church wrong. But he knew well, that the great mass of wealth and influence in the Armenian community was on the other side. He was ambitious; and now that he had attained to the highest post in his nation, he was resolved to keep it. He found the evangelical brethren much less disposed to yield in matters of faith and conscience, than his own indifferentism had led him to expect. As the only means of saving himself, he firmly resolved to sacrifice the Protestants. From that moment, all his powers, personal and official, were employed in the effort to eradicate Protestantism from the land. And, in the persecution that followed, Rev. Mr. Dwight (Christianity revived in the East, pp. 211, 213,) states that the Rt. Rev. Horatio Southgate, missionary Bishop of the American Episcopal Church to the Ottoman Empire, appeared before the public as a sympathiser and counsellor with the Patriarch; which Mr. D. substantiates by extracts from published documents, bearing the bishop's signature. It is but just, however, to state that the church to which Bishop S. belonged, has since utterly repudiated his favorite policy, in the conduct of Eastern missions. (See Oriental Christians.)

Almost every shopkeeper and artisan in Turkey depends for the chief profits of his business, upon the patronage of some wealthy and influential individuals; and young men especially, have very little prospect of advancing in the world, without the assistance of some such friend. The Patriarch, by a skillful manoeuvre, threw a large number of the adherents to the gospel, into the greatest distress. He secretly directed all the faithful among his own flock, who stood in the relation of patrons, or regular customers to any of the evangelical brethren, silently to withdraw their patronage. The consequence was, that many who supposed they were in a fair way of obtaining a competent support, found themselves suddenly without any business. Some of these had friends depending on them for daily food; when all at once, it appeared that they had not the ability to provide for their own wants. And they soon found, also, that all appeals and remonstrances were useless, unless accompanied by a pledge to withdraw from the preaching of the missionaries and cease to open their mouths in favor of evangelical views. Another, and still more threatening measure of opposition was, that all the priests were ordered to hand over to the Patriarch the names of those who did not come to confession and receive absolution, and partake of the communion in their respective churches. Those whose consciences were fully enlightened (and they were specially aimed at in the measure,) were not able to conform to these rites, because of the superstition and idolatry involved. Now, excommunication was threatened to disobedience, the consequences of which, in a temporal point of view, must necessarily, in a community organized as this was, be very serious. There was a delay, however, in following up this part of the plan, perhaps in order to see what would be the result of the other. The experiment was to be made throughout the country, as well as in the metropolis, and orders similar to the above were sent to the bishops in the interior, wherever Protestants were found.

In the mean time, some few of the ecclesiastics themselves were showing strong inclinations towards the evangelical side of the question. Two or three vartabeds, as well as some of the priests, had gone so far as to persevere, from Sabbath to Sabbath, in attending the public preaching of the missionaries. Others were known to be friendly. Something must be done at once to check this tendency to Protestantism among the spiritual guides of the people. Bedros, vartabed, was the first selected to be made an example of. It was known through the whole city that he had embraced evangelical views, and the Patriarch, as a test of his opinions, had already ordered him to perform mass on a certain occasion, which Bedros had declined on conscientious grounds. The Patriarch now instructed him to proceed forthwith to a town on the Russian frontier, ostensibly to take charge of a diocese. The real object, however, was, plainly to get him into a position, from whence he might easily be conveyed as a prisoner to the monastery of Echmiadzin. The vartabed very politely declined the honor of this appointment, and the Patriarch was not then prepared to resort to force. After some little delay, it was arranged that Bedros should proceed to the monastery at Jerusalem. The Patriarch drew up a paper for him to sign, in which he was required to promise that he would perform all the rites of the Church, and, in all respects, be obedient to his superiors. This he resolutely persisted in refusing, on the ground that there were many things in the ceremonies of his Church, which he could not conscientiously perform. He never got nearer Jerusalem than Beirût; from whence he proceeded to Aleppo and Aintab. For several years he labored in these towns and their vicinity, with great zeal and fidelity for the spiritual good of his countrymen, though in the midst of many persecutions, trials and dangers. He distributed large numbers of evangelical books, and preached the gospel successfully to many people. He was suddenly cut off by the cholera in the autumn of 1849; but his end was peace.

But Priest Vertaness was fairly in the Patriarch's hands, being already a prisoner at the monastery of Armash, whither he had been sent by the preceding Patriarch. And this priest had been adding sin to sin, by preaching to the monks, most zealously and faithfully, salvation through the blood of Christ alone, without the deeds of the law. Several of them were awakened and convinced, and some, it was hoped, really believed; and word was brought to Constantinople that if the Protestant priest was not removed, all the inmates of the monastery would soon become corrupted. An imperial firman was forthwith procured (February, 1845,) by Matteos Patriarch, for the further banishment of priest Vertaness to Kaisery (Cæsarea,) where Mr. Sahakyan had been confined six years before, for a like offence. While on his way to that place, in charge of a Turkish officer, he everywhere preached the Gospel, for which he was "in bonds;" nor could he, in the place of his second banishment, cease to make known "Christ and him crucified," to all unto whom he had access. In July of the same year, the Sultan, on the occasion of a great feast, gave orders to have all the exiles in the country set at liberty; and Vertaness returned to Constantinople on the 4th of August. Letters afterwards came to the Patriarch from Kaisery, saying that Vertaness had seduced many, and that if he had remained there much longer, all would have gone after him.

Before this, a highly respectable inhabitant of Trebizond, Tateos by name, who had been a member of the Armenian municipal council, became much interested in the study of the Bible. Being a man of some property, he went on a tour to Constantinople, Smyrna, Brûsa, Nicomedia, and Adabazar, solely for the purpose of becoming acquainted with the missionaries and native brethren in those places, and learning more of the work of God's Spirit, as well as of the truths of his Word. He returned to Trebizond, very much strengthened in his faith, and quickened in his zeal for the truth. Just before his arrival, the most stringent measures had been adopted to compel the evangelical brethren to submit to the Church, in obedience to a very urgent denunciatory letter from the Patriarch Matteos. Nearly one-half of the reputed Protestants had been induced to recant, and the persecuting party, fearing, with good reason, that the influence of such a man might turn the scale, resolved to put him out of the way, with all possible despatch. Accordingly, just as the steamer was leaving for Constantinople, he was decoyed on board by stratagem, and immediately thrust down into the hold, and there confined, by order of the Turkish pasha, who acted at the instigation of the Armenian vartabed. Arrived at Constantinople, he was conducted first to the Patriarchate, and from thence to the Armenian hospital, to be confined in the mad-house, in a sitting posture, and fastened with two chains, one from his neck to the wall, and the other from his feet to the floor. On the Sabbath, the eighth day of his imprisonment, while the Armenian congregation were engaged in singing in the chapel in Pera, he entered the room—a free man! Much supplication had been made for him, and his sudden appearance among them, without their knowing how he had been liberated, strongly remindened them of the case of Peter. They united in special thanksgiving to God for his deliverance, and took courage. His case had been made known to Sir Stratford Canning, and there is no reason to doubt that his remonstrances caused the Patriarch to loosen his grasp upon this innocent victim of his oppression.

The Patriarch labored with the most unwearied diligence to overthrow the Seminary at Bebek; but his opposition only increased its prosperity.

Another method adopted by the Patriarch and his party, was to engage the Protestants in public discussions; but in this, also, they were signally defeated, the Protestants manifestly having the best of the argument, till as a last resort, they were treated with brow-beating and abuse.

About this time, a censorship of the press was established, which threatened to be a serious obstacle in the way of the distribution of evangelical books; but the object of the law being to shut out inflammatory political works, the character of the missionaries with the Turkish officers afforded a sufficient protection to the books circulated by them.

Among the evangelical brethren, a temperance society was formed, which was the first one of the kind that ever existed in Turkey. This movement was rendered the more interesting from its being entirely self-prompted. It has been since carried out to the extent that the principle of total abstinence is of almost universal adoption by the Protestants, wherever found.

The missionary circle was invaded by the hand of death. Mrs. Van Lennep died, Sept. 27, 1844, less than a year from the time of her embarkation from America. Mr. and Mrs. Van Lennep had been removed from Smyrna to Constantinople during the preceding spring, for the express purpose of taking charge of the female seminary then in prospect, and her early removal was on this account an uncommonly grievous affliction to the mission.

The persecution which had broken out anew at Constantinople, extended its fury to other parts of the empire, and was prosecuted with the same bitter spirit. Instances of cruelty and suffering, shocking to humanity, occurred, the details of which we are obliged to omit. It raged with the greatest violence and fury at Trebizond, where the evangelical party were harassed, turned out of their houses, imprisoned and banished, or "compelled to blaspheme," till scarcely one of them was left, and even the house of the missionary, Mr. Bliss, was attacked and pelted with stones till all the windows were broken in.

But in most cases, these violent measures only tended to confirm the individuals in their new views, as they more clearly developed the true spirit of the ruling authorities in the Church; and, in some instances, the persecutors themselves were convinced and converted.

A young man of superior mind and attainments, belonging to the Papal Armenian denomination, who had, for some time, given the most satisfactory evidence of piety, was called to his rest in the spring of 1844. He had been greatly troubled by his priest, who made every effort to reclaim him, even to the very last moment of his life. Mugurdich, for that was his name, was very decided, and a few days before his death he made a formal renunciation of his Church, in writing; and peacefully committed his all to Christ. His body was not permitted burial in the graveyard, or with the usual religious ceremonies, but at a late hour of a very dark and stormy night, it was carried out by common street porters, under the direction of a Turkish police officer, and placed under the ground, in the midst of a waste place about a mile from the city. They had previously attempted to frighten him back to his Church by threatening to bury him like a dog, and faithfully did they execute the threat; though, as he told them at the time, they could do him no real harm, for they could not reach his soul.

An attempt was made to reclaim a husband and sons, by refusing Christian burial to the wife and mother, although she had remained faithful to the Church to the very last. They would not yield, however, and after the greatest trouble, and being obliged to keep the body an unwonted time, they were at length compelled to carry it out, amid the jeers and spittings of the crowd, and bury it at a distance from the city, in the corner of a Mussulman's farm.

Hitherto, the Evangelical Armenians had remained members of the ecclesiastico-civil community in which they were born. They lived in different degrees of conformity with the requisitions of the Church, according to the amount of light they had, and their readiness to endure reproach and suffering for Christ's sake. Some absented themselves entirely from the public services in their churches, feeling that to be present where there was so much of superstition and idolatry, was virtually to sanction what their consciences condemned. Others were occasionally present to hear a sermon, though they made it a point to retire from the other parts of the service. Others still, chiefly those who were only intellectually convinced of the truth, were as regular in the external observance of the forms of the Armenian religion as custom required; and, it should be mentioned, that previous to the Protestant movement, a great diversity had existed in this respect, in the practice of different individuals, and there had never been in the Armenian Church any of that rigor in enforcing ecclesiastical rules and observances, which so characterises the Church of Rome.

According to the fundamental laws of the Turkish empire, every individual of its Christian subjects must be enrolled in some one of the existing communities, having a Patriarch at his head. To secede from one body, in order to join another, had repeatedly been forbidden by the Sultan, and was always attended with danger; although Papal diplomacy and Papal gold had often atoned for the offence, where the secession was to the Papal faith. To detach oneself from one community without coming into connection with another, was equivalent to a renunciation of every civil right and privilege, and necessarily exposed the individual to all the evil consequences of complete outlawry. To make this fully understood, it will be necessary to enter somewhat into detail.

In the city of Constantinople, as well as in other large towns in Turkey, each trade is incorporated, and its affairs are regulated by a committee, consisting of a small number of the most wealthy and powerful individuals in the business; and no person is permitted to open a shop, without a license from this committee. Frequently, a single individual, who may be called the presiding officer, has, in practice, if not in form, the whole matter of granting and withholding licenses, in his own hands. A Turkish officer presides over all the trades, whose official sanction is necessary to give force and effect to the doings of the trade committees. Every journeyman, and apprentice even, must be furnished with a permit, to show to the Turkish police officers, whenever he is challenged in the streets, and if he fails to produce one, he is liable to be thrown into prison, as a disorderly man and a vagrant. On taking out these licenses, each individual is required to give two or more sureties for good conduct, and the Patriarch is held as general surety for the whole community. If the evangelical Armenians had declared that they no longer acknowledged the authority of the Patriarch, it would have been tantamount to civil rebellion, and they would have been dealt with as outlaws. In spiritual matters, those who were decided among them, carefully abstained—as they were taught by the missionaries, and had learned from the Word of God to do—from all participation in superstition and idolatry. They attended regularly upon the ministry of the missionaries, and sat down at the table of the Lord with them, as guests; because they could neither profitably nor conscientiously unite in this service at the Armenian Church. They retained connection, however, with their own people, and generally cherished the hope, amounting in some cases to a strong expectation that, by degrees, the great body of the Armenians would come over to the evangelical faith, and thus a serious rupture be avoided. The Patriarch Matteos effectually cut off this hope.

In the beginning of the year 1846, he resolved to enter upon more coercive measures. The first subject selected for the new experiment, was Priest Vertaness, whose zealous and persevering labors for the spread of pure Christianity, were doubly odious on account of his being a member of the priesthood, and who had already been twice banished for his religion. One of the Patriarch's beadles was sent to his lodgings, together with the chief municipal officer of the Armenians in that quarter, in order to arrest him. The owner of the house, who was friendly to his lodger, though not himself a Protestant, did not scruple to tell a falsehood, declaring that Vertaness was absent, and thus sent the officers away. The priest made his escape the same night to another part of the city, where he remained for several weeks, concealed in the house of a friend.

On Sunday, Jan. 25, after the usual morning services in the patriarchal church were finished, the house was darkened by extinguishing the candles, and the great veil was drawn in front of the main altar, and a bull of excision and anathema was solemnly read against Priest Vertaness, including all the followers of the "modern sectaries." He was styled by the Patriarch "a contemptible wretch," who, "following his carnal lusts," had forsaken the Church and was going about as a "vagabond," "babbling out errors," and being an "occasion of stumbling to many." He was said to be "a traitor, and murderer of Christ, a child of the devil, and an offspring of Antichrist, worse than an infidel or a heathen," for teaching "the impieties and seductions of modern sectaries, (Protestants)." "Wherefore," says the Patriarch, "we expel him and forbid him as a devil, and a child of the devil, to enter into the company of believers. We cut him off from the priesthood, as an amputated member of the spiritual body of Christ, and as a branch cut off from the vine, which is good for nothing but to be cast into the fire. By this admonitory bull, I therefore command and warn my beloved in every city, far and near, not to look upon his face—regarding it as the face of Belial; not to receive him into your holy dwellings; for he is a house-destroying and ravening wolf; not to receive his salutation, but as a soul-destroying and deadly poison; and to beware, with all your households, of the seducing and impious followers of the false doctrine of the modern sectaries (Protestants); and to pray for them to the God who remembereth not iniquity, if perchance they may repent and turn from their wicked paths, and secure the salvation of their souls, through the grace of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, who is blessed for ever. Amen."

This bull of excision and anathema was followed by a violent denunciatory discourse from the Patriarch, against all the Protestants in general, and the priest in particular, which called forth many loud "amens" from the inflamed people.

On the following day the greatest activity prevailed among the priests, in every part of the city and suburbs. All moved like the different parts of a machine, as if by one impulse, and it was not difficult to trace the direction from which that impulse had come. The resolute Patriarch was determined not to trust merely to the impression made upon the people by the anathema, and his accompanying denunciations on the preceding day. He, therefore, issued orders to his clergy to see that the temporal penalties threatened in that instrument were immediately inflicted to the very letter. The priests went forth simultaneously to their work,—most of them apparently with good-will, but some reluctantly, their sympathies being with the innocent victims of oppression, rather than with the oppressor. The Armenian heads of all the trade corporations in the city were commanded to withdraw their countenance from all Protestants who would not recant. The keepers of khans and the owners of houses were ordered to eject all lodgers and tenants who would not comply with this condition. Families were also visited by the priests, wherever any one lived who was suspected of heresy, and it was enjoined upon them to expel the offending member, or separate from it, even though it were a son or daughter, brother or sister, husband or wife. The Protestant brethren were summoned to repair immediately to the Patriarchate in order publicly to recant and become reconciled to the Church. To give force to the whole, the threat was issued that all who refused to aid in carrying out these measures against the "new sectaries," should themselves be anathematized.

A wild spirit of fanaticism now reigned. Before it, all sense of right, all regard to truth and justice, all "bowels of mercies" vanished away. Even the strong and tender affection subsisting between husbands and wives, brothers and sisters, parents and children, was, in some instances, exchanged for the cruel and relentless hate of the persecutor. The very constancy of the people of God provoked still more the wrath of their enemies. Their readiness to suffer joyfully the spoiling of their goods was considered as a proof that large temporal rewards had been offered them by the missionaries; and their unwavering fidelity to Christ was interpreted into obstinacy. Some on the side of the Church, who at first were signally wanting in zeal, in furthering the Patriarch's violent measures, were stimulated into active persecutors, by what appeared to them, in their religious indifferentism, as mere stubbornness on the part of the Protestants.

The leading men in the different trade corporations, showed more resoluteness than any other class, in attempting to force the evangelical brethren to a compliance with the Patriarch's demands; and they could urge motives more potent than almost any other of a worldly nature. Whatever method of coercion was resorted to, whether by priests or people, it was everywhere publicly declared to be by the express command of the Patriarch Matteos.

During the week after the first anathema was read, although many were forcibly driven from their houses and shops, and prevented from doing business to support themselves and families, and some were expelled from the paternal roof, and otherwise afflicted, yet not one was induced to recant. On the following Sabbath, the passions of an ignorant and superstitious people were still more inflamed by a second anathema, which, like the first, was read in all the churches, and accompanied by the most violent denunciations from the Patriarch, the bishops, and the vartabeds. In this bull it was declared that not only the "cursed nonentity, Vertaness," "falsely called priest," was anathematized by the "holy Church," but likewise "all that were of his sentiments." They were together pronounced to be "accursed, and excommunicated, and anathematized, by God, and by all his saints, and by us," that is, Matteos Patriarch. "Wherefore," he says, "whoever has a son that is such an one, or a brother, or a partner, (in business) and gives him bread, or assists him in making money, or has intercourse with him as a friend, or does business with him, let such persons know that they are nourishing a venomous serpent in their houses, which will one day injure them with its deadly poison, and they will lose their souls. Such persons give bread to Judas. Such persons are enemies of the Holy faith of Christianity, and destroyers of the holy orthodox Church of the Armenians, and a disgrace to the whole nation. Wherefore, their houses and shops also are accursed; and whoever goes to visit them, we shall learn, and publish them to the Holy Church, by terrible anathemas."

The spirit of exasperation knew no bounds. One after another, the brethren were summoned before the Patriarch, or the local ecclesiastical authorities of their particular quarter of the city, and required to sign a paper of recantation, on penalty of being "terribly anathematized," which involved their being deprived of all business and treated as outlaws. The first paper presented for their signature was, in substance, a confession that under "the wicked enticements of Satan" they had "separated from the spotless bosom of the Holy Church," and joined the "impious sect" of the Protestants; which now they saw to be "nothing else but an invention of arrogance, a snare of Satan, a sect of confusion, a broad road which leadeth to destruction." Wherefore repenting of their "impious deeds," they fled for pardon "to the bosom of the holy and immaculate Armenian Church," and confessed that "her faith is spotless, her sacraments divine, her rites of apostolic origin, her ritual pious;" and promised to receive "whatever this same holy Church receiveth, whether it be a matter of faith or ceremony," and "to reject with anathemas," "whatever doctrines she rejects."

This first paper not being sufficiently explicit to suit some of the persecuting party, another was drawn up in the form of a creed, to which all were required to subscribe, as the only condition of being restored to the favor of the Patriarch, that is to their civil privileges. This creed contained substantially all the errors of Popery. It acknowledged that good works justify a man as well as faith; that the Church is infallible; that there are seven sacraments; that baptism by water, and private confession to a priest are essential to salvation; that the soul of one dying without full penance for his sins, is after death, purified by the prayers of the church, by the bloodless sacrifice of the mass, and by the alms-giving of his friends; that the bread and wine of communion are the true body and blood of Christ; that Mary is the mother of God; that "the holy anointed" material crosses are worthy of adoration, as also relics and pictures; that the intercession of the saints is acceptable to God; and that the Patriarchs rule the Church as Christ's vicegerents. It also required those who subscribed it to join in anathematizing all who call the worship of the holy cross, and of relics and pictures, idolatry, and who reject the ceremonies of the church as superstitious.

These two papers, the first having been commonly called, The Paper of Recantation, and the second, The Patriarch Matteos's New Creed, were issued under the high authority of the Patriarch himself, and sent by him throughout the country for the signature of the Protestants. In Smyrna, in Nicomedia, in Adabazar, in Trebizond, and in Erzurum, the evangelical brethren were summoned before their respective ecclesiastical rulers, and presented with identically the same creed, which, they were told, had been received from the Patriarch, and which they were required, by his command, to sign.

One individual, a very respectable merchant who was in partnership with his father-in-law, was driven from his shop, and separated also from his wife and children, and defrauded of his property for refusing to yield to these requisitions of the Patriarch. Another, who was in the silk business, was summoned before the Patriarch, who, when he found no signs of repentance, so far forgot himself, as to address this brother with rude and angry profaneness; and, declaring that he and all like minded with him are accursed, he drove him away. The individual returned to his shop, but was soon followed by a beadle from the Patriarch, who summoned his partner before this dignity. The partner was required forthwith to dissolve all connection with the heretic, which fear led him to do without delay. Since the shop and most of the capital belonged to the partner, the brother was at once reduced to circumstances of the deepest distress. As a still further act of coercion, the Patriarch sent for his father, and enjoined it upon him to drive his own son from home, and deprive him of his inheritance. This command, in substance, was afterwards committed to writing, and addressed to a priest, under the Patriarch's own seal, two other sons being now included in it. The following is a literal translation of the original, which the writer of this article has seen, with the Patriarch's own signature and seal attached :

"MY BELOVED PRIEST.—This Khachadûr, a penitent, has said 'I have sinned,' and promised to confess to you, and to commune in the bosom of our church. But his three sons, (one of whom was the silk merchant) are impenitent and hardened in iniquity. If they come to the house of their father, he is not to receive them, and he is not to retain them as his heirs; but let them be stripped of their inheritance, if they do not turn from their wickedness. Farewell."

January 18, (O. S.) 1846, At the Patriarchate of the Armenians, Constantinople.

(Sealed)

Matteos Patriarch.

Many other cases of like cruelty and oppression are related by the missionaries as specimens of the cruelties practiced upon the people of God, by their enraged persecutors.

Nearly forty individuals in Constantinople had their shops closed and their licenses to trade taken away, and were thereby prevented from laboring for an honest livelihood. Nearly seventy were obliged to leave father, mother, brother, sister, husband, wife, or child, for Christ's sake; and were forced by the Patriarch's orders from their own hired houses, and sometimes even from houses owned by themselves. In order to increase their distress, bakers were repeatedly and stringently ordered not to furnish them with bread, and water-carriers to cut off their supply of water. As multitudes of families in the metropolis depend entirely upon the latter for all the water they use, and the greater part of the water-carriers are bigoted Armenians, this measure operated with great severity. Many, who were thrown out of business, were compelled to dissolve partnerships, and to bring their accounts to a forced settlement, which involved their entire ruin. And the greatest activity prevailed among the Patriarch's agents, to ascertain where debts were due from any of the anathematized to a faithful son of the Church; and the latter, however reluctant he might be personally to distress his friend, was compelled to urge an immediate settlement. In short, there was displayed the greatest ingenuity in inventing various refined methods of afflicting the people of God, so as if possible to "compel them to blaspheme." Large numbers of suspected Protestants were carried before the Patriarch, and urged to submit to the Church and sign the creed; but only four or five of those who were previously known to the missionaries as decidedly evangelical in sentiment, were led to give in their adhesion to the Patriarch; and they almost immediately renounced the forced confession they had made, and, returning to the Protestants, were anathematized with the rest. Attempts were also made, but without success, to persuade them by milder means, and even by offers of pecuniary advantage, to return to their mother church.

Nothing could be more evident than that the suffering brethren had special grace given them from above, to enable them to bear as they did these severe trials. Driven from their houses and shops, their families and friends, and having no certain dwelling-place; and many of them reduced to penury; subject to constant insult in the streets, and sometimes to personal injury; and having every reason to apprehend persecution in still more violent forms, they yet exhibited a calm and quiet spirit of endurance, a readiness to suffer the loss of all for Christ, and a peace and joy in the midst of their sufferings, which could be accounted for only on the supposition, that God was with them in very deed. One, who in fact spoke the feelings of many, said one day to a missionary, "My daily prayer to God is, that even if there should not be left a single person except myself to witness for the truth, He would still give me faith to stand firm for the doctrine of salvation by grace in Christ alone. I know that all the resistance we now make to error, we are making for coming generations. We may never reap the fruits ourselves, but our exercise of firmness and faith now, will enable thousands, and perhaps millions, in after days to enjoy the rights of conscience in pure and holy worship."

Another brother, to whom an offer of upwards of 20,000 piastres (about $1,000) was made by a rich friend, on condition that he would conform to the Church, replied: "If you knew anything of the value of the Gospel, or the preciousness of faith in Christ, you would not have thought to influence me either by a thousand, or a hundred thousand dollars."

Many of whom the missionaries had known but little, were led by these violent measures to take a decided stand for the truth; and in the midst of the most violent ragings of the enemy, the missionaries' houses and the room in the Khan, in the heart of the city, kept for the reception of visitors, were more than ever thronged. The persecuted brethren wrote letters to the Patriarch and to the primates of the Armenian community, setting forth their doctrinal views, declaring their attachment to their nation, and expressing their desire to be further enlightened, yet declaring that they could do nothing against their consciences. But they found no relief; and at length, they presented a petition to Reshid Pasha, Turkish Minister of Foreign Affairs, containing a plain, dignified statement of their grievances.

This petition was treated with respect; but, owing to the influence of some of the Armenian primates, it procured no relief. Subsequently, a letter was addressed by the persecuted brethren to the English, Prussian, and American Ministers, asking for the influence of these high public functionaries to procure their release from present suffering, and the guarantee of their civil rights. The kindest interest was taken in their case by the liberal-minded and humane gentlemen who occupied these posts, and repeated efforts were made to procure for them exemption from suffering; but the persecution still went on. There was evidently a connivance of some of the Turkish authorities in this thing, and the Patriarch was so much encouraged by his success, thus far, that he sent to the Porte the names of thirteen leading men among the Protestants, requesting their banishment. The reply of the Porte was fatal to his plans. The substance of it was, that having adopted the principle of freedom of conscience, they could not banish men for imputed religious errors. The English Ambassador, Sir Stratford Canning, had already been urging upon the attention of the Turkish ministry, the pledge given three years before by the Sultán, and, in accordance with the true spirit of this pledge, it was now decided that the persecution of the evangelical Armenians could not be allowed. The humane endeavors of the American chargé, Mr. Brown, and subsequently of the American minister, Mr. Carr, and also of the Prussian minister, Mr. Le Coq, contributed essentially to bring about this happy issue. A petition from the suffering brethren, directly to the Sultán himself, no doubt, had its share of influence. By the agency of Sir Stratford, Reshid Pasha summoned before him the Patriarch, and charged him to desist from his persecuting course.

The persecution began the last week in January, and it was now past the middle of March, and during the whole of this interval, the Protestants had struggled in vain, until this moment, to procure their civil and social rights. As regularly as the Sabbath came round, the Armenian churches, in and around the capital, rung with anathemas against all the followers of the "new sect." None were more violent in their public addresses than the Patriarch himself, who seemed determined that the excited passions of an uninformed and bigoted populace against the so called "infidels" and "atheists," should not subside, so long as he could find fuel to feed the flame. The most foolish calumnies in regard to the religious views and practices of the Protestants, were uttered from all the pulpits, and even published in books under the Patriarchal sanction. In one of the latter, having the imprimatur of the Patriarch upon the title page, it was coolly asserted of the whole Protestant Church, that it formally approves of polygamy, adultery, and theft, and sanctions rebellion against the civil powers! With such examples, and such untiring effort on the part of their spiritual leaders, in the use of means like these, to stimulate the fanatical feelings of the people, it was not strange that the brethren could not pass through the streets without being abused by the most filthy language, and even spit upon and stoned. Great care was taken, particularly after it was known that the foreign ambassadors were keeping an eye on all these proceedings, not to exceed, if possible, the bounds of the law; so that when even as many as threescore and ten men, women, and children, who had refused to bow the knee in idolatry, had been sent to wander houseless in the streets, it was still declared that there was no persecution!

To the missionaries, however, it was known that, for the faith of Christ, they were driven out, and for the love of Christ they could not refuse to take them in. Very providentially, the Rev. Mr. Allan, missionary to the Jews, from the Free Church of Scotland, had, a short time previously, secured a large house, with reference to a preaching place, as well as a dwelling for his family; and, with true Christian sympathy and generosity, he opened his doors for the oppressed. Twenty individuals of the persecuted, found a comfortable lodging-place there. For the rest, the missionaries hired such tenements as could be found, at the same time providing the starving with bread, while they were cut off from all means of procuring their own subsistence. A statement was drawn up of the grievous things that had befallen the brethren in Turkey, accompanied by an appeal to evangelical Christians throughout the world for sympathy and aid; and the generous contributions that flowed in from all quarters of the globe, wherever the story had gone, and pious hearts were found, showed how strong a bond of union is the love of Christ. Letters of the tenderest Christian sympathy were received, accompanied, by donations for the sufferers, from every Protestant country in Europe, from England, Malta, and India, as well as from the United States; and in this spontaneous movement in behalf of the persecuted people of God, denominational distinctions were forgotten. Nearly or quite five hundred dollars were contributed by foreign Protestant residents upon the ground, who naturally felt the more deeply, because they were personal spectators of the sufferings they were called upon to relieve.

By these means the brethren who were scattered over an area of 8 or 10 miles were brought together, and had opportunity to meet for prayer, to become acquainted and sympathise with each other; thus forming a bond of union, which remains to this day.

The Patriarch had now received such lessons from high quarters, as greatly to modify his expectations of putting down Protestantism by force; and he was even compelled, reluctantly, to issue public orders to his clergy, in certain cases, against persecution; though it is known that secret instructions were, at the same time, given of a contrary nature.

Printed copies of the Patriarch's two anathemas were sent to every part of Turkey, to be read in all the churches; and similar scenes followed in Nicomedia, Adabazar, Trebizond, Erzurum, Brusa, Smyrna, and other places; and in some of them, scenes of a still more revolting character were enacted.

Sir Stratford Canning, whose noble efforts for religious liberty in Turkey are worthy of all praise, did not cease to urge upon the Turkish government the necessity of securing to its Protestant subjects the right of pursuing their lawful callings without molestation. Between thirty and forty in Constantinople alone, were still excluded from their shops and their business, on the plea that they were without sureties. The Ambassador represented that the demands of the law might be met, by their becoming sureties for one another. This important concession was at length made by the government, and Reshid Pasha, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, or Grand Vizer, as he soon after became, gave orders that the Protestants be permitted to resume their business on this condition. This decision, which, with a limited application, had already released four imprisoned watchmakers, being now made general, virtually settled the question of religious liberty for the Protestants in Turkey. The immediate relief afforded was important, though far from being entire. The brethren were still tried in various ways. Many, from the very circumstances of the case, could not hope to regain the situations from which they had been thrust. Others were still subject to secret persecution, which was the harder to bear, because it could not easily be traced to its proper source, and brought in a tangible form under the cognizance of the civil courts. The Patriarch, seeing which way the current was turning, very adroitly attempted to set himself forth before the world as a friend of religious liberty, and a sympathizer with the suffering; although, at the same time, he was repeating his anathemas in his own church every Sabbath-day, and exciting the people, by his appeals to their fanaticism, as before. This kept alive the spirit of persecution, and various arts were practiced, often successfully, to prevent the brethren who had opened their shops, from doing any business. Numberless vexations were practiced from time to time, and there was often a great want of promptness in the Turkish courts in relieving the innocent sufferers of their oppressions, even when they had tangible ground of complaint. These irregularities, however, were to be expected in such a country, and under such circumstances. There was still satisfactory proof that the Turkish government was disposed to be sincere and consistent in its declarations in favor of religious liberty. A vizirial letter, dated early in June, 1846, commanding the Pasha of Erzurum to see that the civil rights of the Protestants were not infringed, so long as they were faithful subjects of the Sultan, is worthy of mention, as the first imperial document ever issued by the Turkish government, for the protection of its Protestant subjects.

In the course of the persecutions that have now been described the Patriarch was incessant in his efforts to break up the Mission Seminary at Bebek. He succeeded at different times, in getting away seventeen, in all, out of twenty-seven students; but five of these soon returned, and ten others joined the institution, several of whom were pious and promising young men, who having been driven by persecution from their business, were led to consecrate themselves to the service of God in the ministry, and to seek from the Mission Seminary the intellectual and moral discipline they needed for this work. Mr. and Mrs. Everett, who had been connected with the Smyrna station since April, 1845, removed to Constantinople in the summer of 1846, and Mrs. Everett was associated with Miss Lovell in the instruction of the Female Seminary.

For nearly six months continuously, the anathema had been publicly repeated every Sabbath in the Patriarchal Church, as well as in other churches, until many of the people began to grow weary of the sound; and the changes were so frequently rung on the various forms of denunciation, which had been contrived to give force to the bull, that their efficiency seemed rapidly wasting away. And yet, up to the middle of the year 1846, through the influence of the Church authorities, bread and water were still withheld from many Protestant families, by the regular dealers in those articles, and everything was done, that could with safety be attempted, to vex those who remained steadfast in the truth. The sufferers had again and again petitioned to their Patriarch, and to the primates for relief, but they were uniformly repulsed with the declaration that there was no hope of any melioration of their condition, except by unconditional submission to the Church. Hitherto, no one had voluntarily separated himself from the Armenian community. Those who were called schismatics, had become such by the excising act of the Patriarch himself, who was the sole author of the schism, and who seemed to try every method in his power to render the separation perpetual.

On the 21st of June, 1846, he gave the finishing blow to this work, by a public official act, which resulted, through necessity, in the organization of the Evangelical Protestant Churches in Turkey. On that day, it being the day of a solemn festival for the Church, he issued a new bull of excommunication and anathema against all who remained firm to their evangelical principles, decreeing that it should be publicly read at each annual return of this festival, in all the Armenian Churches throughout the Ottoman Empire. Thus were the Protestants cut off and cast out forever. And although they had no power to organize themselves into a civil community, yet nothing could be plainer than their duty, immediately to secure to themselves and their children, as far as they were able, the full possession of all the spiritual privileges of the Gospel.

They made a written request to the missionaries, for aid in a matter in which they themselves had had no experience. Accordingly, a meeting was held in Constantinople, of delegates from the different stations of the mission to Turkey. The Rev. Messrs. Allan and Koenig, missionaries of the Free Church of Scotland to the Jews of Constantinople, and the Rev. Dr. Pomroy, then pastor of a Congregational Church in Bangor, Maine, and now one of the Secretaries of the Board, who was providentially on a visit to the Levant at that time, were also present by invitation, and took part in the deliberations. All felt that God was there; and the overwhelming importance of the business on which they were convened, and their sense of their own ignorance and impotence, seemed to compel them to throw themselves directly upon him. Much prayer was offered, both by the members of the convention and the native brethren, and to this it must be ascribed that although there were representatives of four different denominations of Christians among them, yet the most entire harmony of feeling pervaded their deliberations, and the result was attained by a unanimous vote.

On the 1st day of July, 1846, the Evangelical Armenians in Constantinople, to the number of forty, three of whom were females, came together for the purpose of organizing themselves into a Church. The plan of organization, as drawn up at the above mentioned meeting, was read and explained, article by article, and those present gave their solemn assent to the whole, and with perfect unanimity, adopted it as theirs, and were thus constituted into THE FIRST EVANGELICAL ARMENIAN CHURCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE. After the names of the church members had been recorded, a pastor was chosen by ballot, and without previous consultation, the choice fell unanimously on Mr. Apisoghom Khachaduryan. The other church officers were then elected, and the meeting was adjourned. Although the whole had occupied from four to five hours, the deepest interest was maintained throughout; much tenderness of feeling was manifested, and many eyes were suffused with tears.

The articles of church organization here adopted, provide for the trial of offenders by a standing committee, or church session, chosen for a limited time, and consisting of deacons and "helpers," who, after conducting a case to its close, report their proceedings with the evidence, to the male members of the Church, and a vote is taken of assent or dissent. In the event of dissent, the case goes up to the pastors and delegates of the associated churches, whose decision in all cases, is final. Provision is made for appeal to this body, before which the trial of ministers accused of offences is to be had. The Confession of Faith is similar to those of the orthodox Calvinistic churches in this country. (For these documents in full, see "Christianity Revived in the East," Appendix F.)

In one week from the organization of the church, the person chosen was publicly ordained to the work of the Gospel ministry, as pastor of the newly formed Church. Under the circumstances it was necessary to perform the ordination by an ecclesiastical council invited by the Church, and which consisted of the missionaries of the board resident at Constantinople, and the Rev. Mr. Allan of the mission of the Free Church of Scotland to the Jews of the capital.

A scene so new as a Protestant ordination in the capital of the Turkish Empire drew forth a crowd to the chapel, several of whom were of the Patriarch's party. The strictest silence, however, prevailed, and the most fixed and solemn attention was given to every part of the service.

As an act of justice to themselves, the members of this new church lost no time in setting forth before the world the declaration of their faith, and their reasons for the step they had taken. This document will be found in the appendix of "Christianity Revived in the East."

In the course of the same summer, churches were formed on the same basis, in Nicomedia, Adabazar, and Trebizond; with the most evident good results, although the original number of members was, in each case, small. It is not known that the least objection was ever made to these organizations, by the Turkish government, or any of its officers. Indeed, the sympathies of the Mohammedans were with the persecuted, rather than with their enemies. The use of pictures in worship; the invocation of saints; and the doctrine of transubstantiation and priestly absolution, are as abhorrent to the Koran as they are to the Bible. The government of the Sultan had ordered that the Protestants be no longer molested in their civil rights, on account of their religious sentiments. Their shops were reopened, but it was comparatively easy for their busy enemies to prevent traffic with them, without openly infringing the law, and this was repeatedly done. They could not be imprisoned or banished merely for their religious sentiments;

but false claims of debt could and did imprison them; and false charges of vicious conduct, established by perjury, could and did secure their banishment. In Constantinople considerable sums of money were paid by different individuals to avoid imprisonment for pretended debts; and more than a score of Protestants, at different times, were shut up with felons for alleged crimes which false witnesses had proved against them, and which they, from the very organization of the Turkish courts, could not disprove. As an example of the length to which the Patriarch could even now go in his persecuting measures, the following story is related: A place of Protestant worship was opened in the city proper, for the accommodation of many families who, on account of the distance, could not often be present at the chapel in Pera. The house hired for this purpose was built by a former Patriarch, though now owned by his brother, who was a worthy member of the Protestant community and Church. It was situated near the Patriarchate, which no-doubt was an additional cause of vexation to this dignitary. At that time no other house could be obtained in all Constantinople, for such a purpose. By a cunning device, the Patriarch procured the imprisonment of Stepan, the owner of the house, by the Turkish police, on charge of flogging one of his priests! The priest had been sent by his superior to Stepan's house, in his absence, to endeavor to persuade his wife to separate from him; and the injured husband merely called at the priest's door, and warned him not to enter his house again, on pain of civil prosecution. This was a sufficient ground for a pretext, the futility of which was transparent on the trial, the whole object and aim of the charges being to prevent the holding of Protestant worship in the house in question. The Patriarch first claimed the house as the property of the Church, having been built by a Patriarch. And when this was decided against him, he begged that Stepan might be removed from the house, since all his neighbors were complaining against him as a disturber of the peace. This also was set aside. After several other vain shifts on the part of the Patriarch to accomplish his object, the Judge at length took up the same side, and said to Stepan, "The government gives you no permission to hold meetings in that house." "Sir," said Stepan, with solemn earnestness, "I beg that you will not fatigue yourselves with efforts to prevent us from meeting; for I declare that not only I, but all the Protestant Armenians also, are ready to shed our blood for this thing. Consult together, if you please, as to the best method of getting rid of us, whether by exiling, drowning, or by cutting off our heads; but it is useless to try to prevent us from meeting. The Holy Gospel commands us to meet; it is a matter of conscience and duty with us; and we can never cease to meet for the worship of God." The Judge had no reply to make to this noble answer, but merely directed his clerk to record that "the Protestants say it is a matter of faith and conscience with them to hold meetings." Stepan was soon liberated.

In interior places, where the new order of things was not so well understood, and where the local governors were more completely the creatures and the tools of rich and influential Armenians, it was still more easy to afflict the Protestants with impunity. In Nicomedia, after religious liberty had been proclaimed to the Protestants, the brethren were often abused in the streets, and their houses stoned. In Adabazar, a Protestant teacher was put in chains and sent to prison, on the general charge of disturbing the peace, though no one in the town was really more peaceable than he. At Trebizond, a mob of women attacked with heavy stones, two females who were returning from the preaching of the missionaries, and because their husbands endeavored to shield them from harm, these husbands were thrown into prison, and there stretched out, with their faces downwards, upon the cold, damp ground, and their feet confined in the stocks! In this painful position they were left for a whole day, without food, so that one became insensible, and was more dead than alive when he was removed. The other was carried to Constantinople, and there kept in close confinement for several months, his persecutors, who were influential, insisting upon it that he was a disturber of the peace and a dangerous man. In the same place, on the occasion of the death of a Protestant brother, the house where the body lay was assailed by stones from a furious mob, and every effort was made to prevent the burial. This necessary duty could only be performed, at last, under shelter of the night, and by paying twenty-one dollars for permission to dig a grave in the public highway! At Erzurum an infuriated mob forced its way into the house of Dr. Smith, and bore away a priest of the church, who had escaped thither to avoid persecution, he being a Protestant in sentiment. They afterwards returned with renewed fury, broke into the house a second time, felled to the ground a native assistant and also a patient of the doctor, and destroyed seven or eight hundred dollars' worth of books and furniture.

Even in the capital itself, at the burial of the first Protestant adult after the separation, the procession, in returning from the grave, was followed by a mob of Armenians, who first began to shout in a highly insulting and disgraceful manner, using the most filthy language; and afterwards to hurl stones, some of which were of an enormous size. The mob thus followed the procession for a quarter of a mile or more, when they amounted to at least a thousand persons. Several of the Armenian brethren, and one at least of the missionaries, were struck with the stones, though providentially no one was seriously injured. In all these cases, and numberless others of a similar kind, the Turkish tribunals were immediately appealed to for redress; and this was, sooner or later, almost sure to be obtained, though not always to the full extent that was due. At Nicomedia the governor ordered the civil and ecclesiastical leaders of the Armenian community to desist from their oppressions, saying, "The Protestants no longer belong to you, and you have no right to interfere with their religion." A file of soldiers, even, was sent on one occasion to disperse the mob. At Trebizond, police officers were regularly stationed at the entrance of the Protestant place of worship, as long as such a step was considered necessary. By the prompt and decisive intervention of the United States Minister at the Porte, the damages sustained at Erzurum by Dr. Smith were repaid, and four of the leaders in the mob were imprisoned. And in Constantinople, the police took effectual measures to prevent the recurrence of such disgraceful scenes as those described in connection with the first funeral.

The position of the Protestants was still an anomalous one in Turkey. They were separated from the Armenian community, but not united with any other. The Turkish government was determined they should not be molested by the Patriarch or his ministers, but exactly what to do with them was not so easily decided. According to the municipal regulations of Constantinople, neither marriage, baptism, nor burial can be performed without the cognizance of the civil power. A certificate from the Patriarch must be presented to the head of the police, to procure a permit for marriage. The name of every child baptized must be communicated by the Patriarch to the same officer, for enrolment; and previous permission must be obtained, through the Patriarch, from the Board of Health, for every burial. Besides this, no person can travel in the country without a passport, and no passport can be obtained without the Patriarch's voucher for the honesty of the man. At first it seemed to be the plan of the government, that while the Protestants should be entirely separated from the Patriarch, so far as religious matters were concerned, he might still be left to act for them as their civil representative at the Porte. This was soon found to be utterly impracticable. There seemed to be two principal objections to organizing them regularly into a separate civil community; namely, the fewness of their numbers, and the strong objections of certain parties having great influence with the government. They were consequently left for more than a year and a half with their rights acknowledged, and yet without any regular provision for securing those rights from invasion; and subject, in the interval, to frequent grievances and even oppressions, such as have been described. And it is always to be understood, that Protestants in the interior were exposed to greater trials of this sort in proportion to the remoteness of their situation from the capital.

But though the patience of the evangelical Armenians was long tried in various ways, through their imperfect acknowledgment by the government, still there was a gradual melioration of their condition evidently going on, which, to such as were watching with reasonable expectations, the signs of the times, was highly encouraging. It is impossible for those who have never been in like circumstances, to conceive of the degree of satisfaction and encouragement felt by the Protestants when they were for the first time permitted to bury their dead in peace, under the protection of the civil power, and to procure a permit for marriage, and a passport for traveling, without the mediation of the Patriarch. The second adult funeral among them was in striking contrast with the first. It occurred on the Sabbath, and in the procession were from 100 to 150 native Protestants, with their pastor at their head, carrying a copy of the Scriptures in his hand. All marched silently and solemnly, at mid-day, through the most public street of Pera, to the Protestant burying-ground, under the protection of a body of the police. It was a new and wonderful spectacle for Turkey; and shop-keepers and artisans along the way turned aside from business for the moment, and inquired, What new thing is this? Hitherto the funeral processions of native Christians had been accompanied with gilded crosses elevated in the air, and candles, and priestly robes, and chantings. It was whispered from mouth to mouth, "These are the Protestants. See how the government protects them!" Some of the Mussulmans said, "Look! There are no crosses! no singing! This is as it should be."

Several hundreds of people of different classes gathered around the grave, where a hymn was sung, and a short but earnest and appropriate address was delivered by the pastor. Many went home from that burial with new and more correct impressions of what Protestantism really is. The moral influence of the whole spectacle was highly salutary, and it was felt by all that an important point had been gained to the Protestant cause. The internal growth of the community was ever in advance of the external. No week passed without furnishing evidence of the special presence of God's Spirit.

But in eight short months a heavy affliction befell the church in the capital in the death of its beloved and useful pastor. His labors, and cares, and anxieties had been abundant, and he was the object of many a shaft from the enemy. He was sometimes thrown into very exciting scenes, in the midst of mobs, raised in the streets to vex the Protestants. Only a short time previous to his death, he visited Nicomedia; and while there, was called to attend the funeral of a Protestant brother. As the procession passed along the street, thousands of hostile Armenians were assembled, to meet it with insults and abuse. Arrived at the place of burial, this rabble gathered around the grave, and Mr. Khachadūryan took the opportunity of preaching to them the Gospel of Christ. They listened in perfect silence, and then went quietly to their homes. The pastor returned to Constantinople, overcome by exertion and excitement. Within a week, he was exposed to the worrying influence of a similar outrage, at the funeral of a Protestant child, in the capital. His last disease immediately developed itself, which was pronounced by a judicious physician to be a disease of the brain, induced by excessive mental effort and excitement, a disease in this form, scarcely known in the country. During most of his illness he was delirious, but his ruling passion was constantly showing itself. Scarcely anything else was heard to proceed from his lips but the name of the beloved Saviour, or what pertained to his kingdom and glory. The report went abroad among his superstitious enemies that God had smitten him with raving madness and despair, in consequence of the anathemas of the Church, which rested upon him; and great would have been their glorying, had his sun thus set under a cloud. But the earnest supplications of his Church were heard; the cloud was lifted up; the laboring mind was unshackled; and the departing saint was permitted to magnify the grace of Christ, by declaring how abundantly he was sustained in that solemn hour. A short time before he died, in answer to inquiries, he said, that his heart was "full of sin, but Jesus Christ was his righteousness, his sanctification, and his redemption;" and that his hope was "not at all in his own merits; but only in the free and infinite grace of God."

A brother of the deceased, Mr. Simon Khachadūryan, was shortly after elected, and ordained pastor in his place. He had been educated at the Bebek Seminary, and possessed rare qualities for the office to which he was called, and which he still continues to adorn.

Two other pupils of the same seminary, Mr. Avedis, and Mr. Mugurdich, were licensed to preach the Gospel. The latter was subsequently ordained as pastor of the Evangelical Church in Trebizond, and the former as co-pastor in Constantinople. Another pastor was ordained in Nicomedia in the latter part of November, 1847. This was Mr. Harātun Minasian. His ordination was attended by circumstances of peculiar interest. His little flock had been for many years exposed to almost constant persecution. Oftentimes they were driven from the abodes of men, and compelled to hold their worship in the distant fields; and even there, they were never sure of being left unmolested. Now they had a place for public worship in the very heart of the city; and there, at mid-day, on the Sabbath, the ordination services were performed—no one daring to "molest them or make them afraid."

Missionary tours performed through various parts in the interior of the country, brought to light many encouraging facts in regard to the extent of the work of reform. In no place was there a more remarkable movement than at Aintab, a town situated about three days' ride north-east from Aleppo. Some copies of the Scriptures, and other books from the mission press, had found their way to this town, chiefly through the agency of Bedros vartabed, who labored as a colporteur in those parts; and a few individuals, by the blessing of God on the simple reading of the word, had their eyes opened to see the errors of their Church. Soon after, the Patriarchal bull against priest Vertaness and the other evangelical brethren, was received from Constantinople, and publicly read in the Church. Those who had been convinced of the truth now learned, for the first time, that there existed in the Armenian community a body of men who take the Bible as their only guide. This greatly encouraged and strengthened them. Soon after, a vartabed came to Aintab, and began to preach the evangelical doctrines in the Armenian Church, in the most bold and zealous manner. He was interesting in his appearance, and eloquent in his speech; and with great fearlessness did he expose the errors of his Church, and with great power set forth the peculiar doctrines of the Gospel. Very many were convinced by him of the truth, and were led to renounce their previous errors, and openly avow themselves as Protestants. It seemed as though the whole fabric of superstition in Aintab must speedily fall. It was soon discovered that this new and zealous preacher of the evangelical doctrines, was himself evangelical only in name. His moral character proved to be infamous, and he was sent away in disgrace. The fruits of his preaching, however, remained, although he proved so unworthy an instrument. The evangelical brethren immediately prepared a letter, signed by eighty-two heads of families, requesting that a missionary might forthwith be sent to them. Mr. Van Lennep, of Constantinople, went in obedience to the call, though not to remain permanently, as they had hoped. His visit was timely and useful. The place was afterwards visited by Mr. Johnston, by Dr. Smith, and by Mr. Schneider; and a flourishing church was gathered, and one of the largest congregations of Protestants in the Turkish empire! The condition of the Armenians in all that section of the country was highly encouraging.

In the latter part of the summer of 1847, Rev. Isaac G. Bliss and wife arrived in the country from America, and proceeded to join Mr. Peabody in his labor in Erzurum. An evangelical Armenian Church had been organized there in April, and another was formed in Brûsa in July, making seven in all.

In the year 1847 Sir Stratford Canning returned for a season to his native land, and Lord Cowley was appointed to occupy, temporarily, his place. He proved himself to be as warm and firm a friend of religious freedom as his predecessor. He exerted himself with the most unremitting zeal to secure to the Protestant Armenians a distinct recognition on the part of the Porte, and a formal organization, which should place them on the same footing with all other Christian communities in the empire; and his noble efforts were crowned with complete success. On the 15th of November, 1847, he procured from the Turkish Government an imperial decree, recognizing native Protestants as constituting a separate and independent community in Turkey. In this high official paper it was declared that "no interference whatever should be permitted in their temporal or spiritual concerns, on the part of the patriarchs, monks, or priests of other sects." This decree was immediately sent to all the Pashas in the interior, under whose jurisdiction Protestants were known to exist. An individual elected by the new community was formally recognized by the government as the agent and representative of the Protestants at the Porte.

The evangelical brethren in Constantinople immediately appointed a day for special thanksgiving and prayer. Great was the joy of the Protestants in every part of the land, though still it was, in many cases, rejoicing with trembling. At the different missionary stations greater boldness in attending the preaching of the Gospel was noticed, and a new impulse seemed to be given to the spirit of inquiry. The special influences of the Spirit were extensively enjoyed, though in no case, except at the Female Seminary in Constantinople, was the movement general enough to be designated as a revival of religion. In the district of Geghi, south-west of Erzurûm, containing from twelve to fifteen thousand souls, Mr. Peabody found very promising indications of an extensive religious awakening. The vartabed himself was the most decided evangelical man in the community. For personal security, he was obliged to flee to Erzurûm, where, after a sufficient trial, he was received into the Evangelical Church. At Aintab, the development was more rapid, perhaps, than anywhere else. Mr. Schneider, of the Brûsa station, spent the summer of 1848 in labors there, during which time the congregation steadily increased, and many were affected to tears, under the preaching of the Word. A very intelligent priest became obedient to the faith, and his sincerity was called, more than once, to the severe test of persecution. At a communion season in October, 1848, seventeen persons were added to the Church, five of whom were females. During the same month, Dr. Smith returned to Aintab, where he took up his residence as a missionary of the Board, together with his wife. The importance of the station was such, that it was determined that Mr. and Mrs. Schneider, of Brûsa, should become permanently connected with it; the same steamer which brought away Mr. Schneider from Ghemlik, the port of Brûsa, carried back thither to occupy his place, the Rev. Oliver Crane and wife, who had just arrived from America.

Among the evangelical Christians at Aintab a most commendable zeal had shown itself for the spread of the gospel in the towns and villages around. Several attempts had been made by individuals to labor as colporteurs, but they were never suffered to remain long in a place. The Armenian primates easily succeeded in persuading the Turkish authorities to order them away as vagabonds. A novel experiment was made, early in the year 1849, to accomplish the object in view without subjecting themselves to the charge of being mere idlers, and "busybodies in other men's matters." Five individuals who had trades, went forth to different towns, with their tools in one hand, and the sword of the Spirit in the other. Wherever they went they worked at their trades, while, at the same time, they labored for the spiritual good of the people. The experiment succeeded to admiration. The spirit of religious inquiry was spreading from Aintab in almost all directions. The congregation in the town itself had become so large, that two places were opened for worship at the same time. And from various towns and villages throughout the country, the most urgent appeals came from souls hungering for the bread of life.

In November, 1848, Mr. Hohannes Sahakyan, having spent several years in study in America, was licensed at Constantinople to preach the gospel; and in the following spring, he was ordained as pastor of the evangelical Armenian Church in Adabazar, where he has been since laboring with great diligence and success. Mr. Khachadûr, a pupil of the Bebek Seminary, was licensed as a preacher in February, 1849.

In Trebizond, formal permission was given by the governor to the Protestants, to use as a burying-ground a piece of land purchased for this purpose three years previously. As long ago as January, 1848, a vizirial letter had been procured, through the generous efforts of Mr. Carr, the United States Minister at the Porte, ordering the authorities in Trebizond to see that the Protestants be permitted to have a cemetery of their own, but various difficulties had prevented an earlier accomplishment of the design.

The year 1848 was remarkable for the number and extent of its conflagrations in the city of Constantinople; and among the providential interpositions in behalf of the Protestant cause, must be mentioned the fact, that in five or six different instances the devouring element approached so near to the chapel and Female Seminary in Pcra, as to leave but a faint hope that they could escape; and once even they actually began to burn, but the flames were speedily extinguished. Again and again was it shouted in the camp of the enemy, "The Protestant Chapel is consumed;" but in each case, an unseen hand was stretched out to arrest the destroyer, and save the Protestant cause from so great a disaster.

The Patriarch Matteos' plans for the overthrow of Protestantism in the country, had met with a most signal failure. His own removal from office wound up the scene. He was found guilty of various frauds upon the public treasury, and according to the official announcement of the case in the French journal of Constantinople, "of acts of injustice inconsistent with patriarchal dignity." He was accordingly degraded, and sentenced to banishment. A friendly banker, however, became surety for him, and procured his release from this part of the punishment. He has since been living in retirement on the shores of the Bosphorus.

Our limits will not permit us even in the brief manner in which that of the previous years has been given, to continue the sketch of this interesting portion of missionary history. We can only add a few words. In 1850 the position of the Armenian Protestants was improved and its permanency secured by a firman of the Sultan, obtained through the interposition of Sir Stratford Canning, now Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, as the completion of his noble efforts in behalf of the rights of conscience in Turkey, which gives to the Protestants all the privileges granted to the other Christian communities. What had before been done was liable to be reversed by a change of administration, or of the policy of the government. This is beyond recall; and the firman given in 1853, in answer to the demands of Russia for another object, to the Protestants as to the other rayah (non-mussulman) communities, carries forward the cause of religious liberty another step by declaring these communities on an equality before the law with the Mohammedan population. What is to be the issue of the fearful conflict, which while we write, Turkey is waging for national existence, is unknown to us; but the analogy of the past, and the continued progress of the work of enlightenment and spiritual regeneration within her borders, encourage the hope that it will be auspicious to the interests of the Saviour's kingdom. A mighty social, moral, and religious revolution is in progress; and this political changes may favor, but cannot defeat. We may confidently expect that the religious freedom granted to others will soon be secured equally to the Mohammedans, so as to allow the profession of Christianity by them; and when that shall come, the work accomplished among the Armenians will be a noble preparation for another and still more glorious, one among those heretofore excluded from the direct efforts of the Church for their salvation.

The progress for the last six years of the mission under review can easily be learned from the reports and other publications of the Board. The cost at which Protestantism is still professed, keeps the increase of the Protestant civil community, as yet, healthfully low; while evidence of the spread of evangelical sentiments and the leavening influence of the Gospel is multiplying on every hand. In some places the outward development is more rapid than in others. The greatest is in Cilicia and on the borders of Mesopotamia. During the year embraced in the report for 1853, five new churches were organized; one in Rodosto, on the European shore of the Marmora; one in Smyrna; one in Marsovan; one in Killis; and one in Kessab. Ten others previously existed: viz., three in Constantinople, and one each in Nicomedia, Adabazar, Brûsa, Trebizond, Erzurûm, Sivas, and Aintab. The increase of members in their communion during the year was 90; making the total to be 351; which at the end of 1853 was increased to 395. The number in the Protestant civil community was about 2,000; of whom about 160 were in Kessab, a village of the Aintab district, in which two years before not an avowed Protestant was to be found. Brûsa has ceased to be a station of the mission; the missionaries having been transferred to other places, and this left to the care, under the oversight of the Constantinople station, of the native pastor, Mr. Stepan Khachadûryan, brother to the two brothers who succeeded one the other in the pastorate at the capital. The press, formerly at Smyrna, has been removed to the capital. The Female Boarding School, now having 25 pupils, has become established in the suburb of Hasskeuy. The seminary at Bebek has enlarged its numbers to 50, and is yearly sending forth educated young men to preach the Gospel, and occupy other posts of importance in connection with the work of the mission. On both these schools the Holy Spirit has descended and wrought a work of conversion and sanctification in the hearts of their pupils. The churches maintain discipline with great strictness, and exhibit a gratifying spectacle of Christian consistency and activity. The converted Armenians are indeed a zealous and effective body of evangelists, whose labors are not confined to any one class or place. In all the divisions of society the influence of the Gospel is becoming more extended and powerful. A most encouraging feature of the re-gether presenting a very imposing appearance. On these occasions, the market place, which is about a mile in circumference, is generally crowded. When Mr. Freeman was received, he estimated the number present at 40,000, half of whom were soldiers. The Ashantee monarchy is hereditary; but instead of descending from father to son, it passes from brother to brother. A female cannot ascend the throne; but if, when the last of the line of brothers dies, his sister has a son, the crown descends to him.

Domestic slavery exists in Ashantee, and the lives and services of the slaves are at the disposal of their masters. Yet the treatment of the slaves is not uniformly harsh and severe; and sometimes a slave becomes heir to his master; and in many instances, they rise to power and office. The foreign slave-trade, says Beecham, is valued by the native princes, not only for its profit, but as an outlet for a redundant slave population, which often becomes so great by reason of captives taken in war, as to be feared.

Polygamy prevails in Ashantee to a frightful extent. It is said that the law allows the king to have 3333 wives; about half a dozen of whom are kept at the palace at a time, and the rest live on his plantation, or at the capital, where two streets are devoted to their use, into which no one is permitted to enter; and when they go abroad, no one is allowed to look upon them. The chief men of the nation have as many wives as they are able to procure. Marriages are contracted without consulting the woman, and often in infancy and childhood. In Ashantee and the neighboring countries, where polygamy prevails, the husband lives separate from his wives, who dwell in houses or sheds, contiguous to each other, in the form of a square. In some cases, they remain with their mothers after marriage. They cook and carry food to their husband, but are not allowed to eat with him. Sometimes his children eat with him, but more frequently, he eats alone. The children are left chiefly to the care of their mothers, and grow up without correction, till, when the perverseness of the boy can be no longer endured, the father punishes him by cutting off an ear. Unfaithfulness on the part of a wife, is punished with severity; both parties being sometimes punished with death, but more frequently with a fine from her parents and her paramour, in default of which, her husband cuts off her nose. If she is found listening to his private conversation, she loses an ear. In Ashantee one of the king's sisters is made governor of all the women in the kingdom. The women of Ashantee, as in most heathen lands, are made the drudges of the men, the heaviest work being put upon them.

Roads have been made from Kumasi, or Coomassie, the capital of Ashantee, to the most distant parts of the empire, and these are intersected by numerous cross-roads. The population of the capital has been estimated at 100,000, and of the whole kingdom, at 4,000,000.

Houses.—The Ashantees, and other natives contiguous to the coast, build their houses of mud and sticks, with a verandah in front, from which the door opens into an open court, around which are built huts or sheds, for the different members of the household. All the houses in the capital of Ashantee are of this sort, except the castle of the king, which is of stone.

Arts.—The Ashantees are ingenious artists in the precious metals which their country produces. Iron is manufactured to a considerable extent. They carve and work in wood with no little skill. The art of tanning leather is understood. They have made considerable progress in weaving, and have done something at pottery.

Trade.—The spirit of trade does not prevail as much with the Ashantees as with some of the adjoining countries, and the trade is mostly confined to the king and his chiefs, who carry on a considerable traffic with the interior.

Religion.—The notion of a Supreme Being lies at the foundation of their religious system. He is called Yankumpon, from yanku, friend, and pon, great. Another name used by the Pantees, Yehmi, from yeh, to make, and emi, me, recognizes him as the Creator. The Ashantees also give him a title which signifies eternal existence. They have a curious tradition of the creation, which represents God as having created three white men and three black, with as many women of each color, and allowing them to fix their destiny, by the choice of good and evil. A box or calabash, and a sealed paper were placed on the ground. The black men, who had the first choice, took the box, in which they found only a piece of gold, some iron, and other metals, which they did not know how to use. The white men opened the paper, and it taught them every thing. The blacks were left in Africa, under the care of inferior deities, while the whites were conducted to the water-side, where God communicated with them every day, and taught them to build a vessel, which carried them to another country, &c. To this tradition, it is supposed their polytheism may be traced; which is very similar to that of the Yorubas. (See Yoruba.) To the innumerable objects of worship in nature is added images of the same. But they do not profess to worship the objects themselves but the spirits, which make their abode in them. To these they make offerings, having such crude notions of spiritual beings as to suppose that they require food.

The notion of a future state universally prevails. It is believed that, at death, the soul passes into another world, where it exists in a state of consciousness and activity. They believe that the spirits of their departed relatives exercise a guardian care over them, and hence prayers are offered to them. They have, however, no correct ideas of the immateriality of separate spirits; nor do they appear to have any just idea of the immortality of the soul.

They believe in the existence of the devil, an evil being supposed to be ever at hand for purposes of mischief; but he does not appear to be an object of worship with the Ashantees.

Traces of the Sabbath are found in this part of Africa, the year being divided into moons, and the moons into weeks, the seventh day of which is regarded as sacred. Along the coast, the sacred day is Tuesday; on which the people rest from labor, dress in white, and mark themselves with white clay. They have also their "lucky" and "unlucky days."

The priests or "fetish-men," are a numerous order, and employ a variety of stratagems and impostures to keep up their influence. The word "fetish," seems to be employed as a general term for things sacred; thus, the deities themselves are called fetishes, as well as the religious rites, and the offerings presented. These acts of worship are daily performed by the people, and they consult their deities by various superstitious practices, answering to the lot, to ascertain what course of conduct to pursue; a practice which necessarily leads to the subjection of judgment and reason to blind superstition. It would be tedious to describe all the ceremonies by which this worship is carried on. It is by consulting the deities by means of oracles, that the priests hold their sway over the minds of the people; and on great occasions, when the questions to be determined are of public importance, human sacrifices are offered, sometimes to the number of many hundreds. This consulting of the fetish is also connected with witchcraft. Oaths are administered by it; and accused persons are tried by what is called the "oath-draught," which is the drinking of a poisonous draught as a test of guilt or innocence, in which it is supposed that the spirit or fetish goes down with it, and searches the heart of the accused, and if it finds him innocent, returns with it, as he vomits it up; but if guilty the fetish remains to destroy him. It will readily be perceived that such a system, in the hands of wily priests and powerful chiefs, is capable of being made an engine of immense oppression and cruelty. To obtain a supply of victims for their altars, is the principal end for which the national deities are supposed to promote war; and the sacrifice of their prisoners becomes a religious obligation. Hence, dreadful are the scenes of barbarity exhibited after a victorious campaign.—Beecham's Ashantee and the Gold Coast. The English Wesleyans have a mission to Ashantee and the Gold Coast, for which see Western Africa.

ASIA: An immense continent, presenting every possible variety of climate, from the dreary confines of the polar world, to the heart of the tropical regions. Every thing in Asia is on a vast scale: its mountains, its table-lands, its deserts. The grandest feature, and one which makes a complete section of the continent, is a chain of mountains, which, at various heights, and under various names, but with very little, if any, interruption, crosses Asia from the Mediterranean sea to the Eastern ocean. Taurus, Caucasus, and the Himalaya, are the best known portions of this chain. On the one side it has Southern Asia, the finest and most extensive plain in the world, covered with the richest tropical products, and watered by magnificent rivers proceeding from this great store-house, and filled with populous nations and great empires. On the other side, this chain serves as a bulwark to the wide table-land of Thibet, which, though under the latitude of the south of Europe, has many of the characteristics of a northern region. To the north, the recent observations of Humboldt exhibit three parallel chains, the Rientim or Moor Tagh, the Thiunchan or Celestial Mountains, and the Altaian, which also support table-lands. But these do not exceed 4,000 to 5,000 feet, according to Humboldt, and in many places enjoy a mild and temperate climate, yielding not only grain, but wine and silk. Elsewhere, they are covered with rich pastures, and tenanted with numerous wandering races, at once pastoral and warlike, whose victorious bands have overrun and subjugated the empires of the South. The Altaian chain separates Middle Asia from Siberia: a long range of the bleakest land on the face of the earth. Some of the southern districts have been found, by the Russians, capable of supporting numerous herds of cattle; but the rest is abandoned to wild animals, not generally of a ferocious character, but covered with rich and precious furs, which afford a grand object for hunting and trade. Asia has been the scene of the most remarkable events in the history of the human race. In Asia, man was created, and fell. In Asia, his redemption was accomplished by the incarnation, sufferings, and death of the Son of God: and from thence proceeded the messengers of the Saviour, the heralds of His gospel, who published those tidings of Divine mercy, which are now proclaimed on every continent, and on many of the remotest islands of the sea. Asia was the nursery of learning, and of the arts, in their earliest infancy. It has been the school, and also the victim of the successive forms of false philosophy, and of idol worship. In Asia have existed some of the greatest empires, through which have originated the most extraordinary revolutions in the affairs of the world. This immense continent, moreover, teems with nations, and contains, on the most moderate estimate, 500,000,000 of mankind.—Hoole's Year Book of Missions.

Races of People.—Not only the majority of the human race, in number, but also the greatest variety of the species, is found within the limits of Asia. The first family, the Caucasian, comprises all the original inhabitants of the mountainous region lying between the Black Sea and the Caspian, from about the 38th to the 42d degree of N. latitude. It includes the mountaineers of the valleys of the Caucasus, such as the Abasians, Ossetes, Lashghians, and Kisti; and in the more level country, the Georgians, Mingrelians, and Armenians. In personal form, this family may be described as European, but in mind, Asiatic. The face is of an oval form; the forehead high and expanded; the nose elevated, with a slight convexity; the lips moderate in size, and the chin full and round. The complexion is fair, but without the clearness of the European. The eyes are generally dark, and the hair black. The stature is nearly equal to the European, and the form symmetrical and handsome.

2. The second is the Arabian, called Semitic, on the hypothesis that they are descended from Shem. It embraces all the aboriginal inhabitants of Palestine, Asia Minor, Syria, and Arabia, from the east coast of the Mediterranean and Red Sea, up to the west coast of the Persian Gulf. A brunette complexion; black or dark brown eyes; long, lank, black hair; large bushy heads; an oval face, in bold, distinct relief, with a nose always elevated, and not unfrequently aquiline; high forehead—are among the most prominent characteristics of the family. From the condition of the country they inhabit, they have naturally become divided into two opposite and hostile classes, the roving and predatory, and the settled and industrious.

3. Between the Caspian Sea and the Persian Gulf, to the west, the ocean to the south, India to the east, and an indefinite line to the north, there are several races which have much resemblance, but which differ enough in person, mind, and language, to be classed as separate families. The first of these, beginning at the west, is the Persian: complexion fair, without transparency; hair long, straight, and almost jet black; beard abundant and bushy; features regular and handsome; stature little short of the European standard, but less robust. The present inhabitants of Persia, however, are much mixed with the blood of Arabian and Turkish settlers.

The next of these families is the Turkish or Scythian. The parent country of this family lies between the 35th and 60th degrees of latitude, from the Hindoo coast to the Belar Tagh, and from the Caspian Sea to the western boundary of the desert of Cobi, where they are mixed with the Mongols. The complexion of this family is a light brunette; hair generally black, strong and long; eye, light brown, somewhat contracted; skull remarkably globular; proportions of the face symmetrical; body stout, but shorter than the European. They have made little progress in civilization.

In the south-east angle of what is commonly considered Persia, are three races of men, the Beloches, Brahoos and Dehwars. The first of these have dark brown complexion, black hair, long visage, elevated features, with tall, active, but not robust persons. The Brahoos, have thick, short bones, and are a squal instead of a tall people. The Dehwars have blunt features, high cheek-bones, bluff cheeks, short persons, and are an ill-favored race.

To the north of these is the Afghan race, marked by a brown complexion, black hair, sometimes brown, a profusion of beard, high noses, high cheek-bones, long faces, a robust person, and a stature short of the European.

Among the high mountains and narrow elevated valleys, east of the Afghans, exists a people called Kaffres or infidels, by their Mohammedan neighbors. They are described as remarkable for fairness, possessing occasionally light hair, blue eyes, and great personal beauty. They speak many languages unknown to Europeans.

4. Proceeding eastward, we come to the great and numerous Hindoo family, spread from the 7th to the 35th degree of N. latitude, and from the 68th to the 95th of E. longitude. Correctly speaking, this is, perhaps, not one family, but an aggregate of races, bearing such a general resemblance to each other as the European varieties do among themselves. The color is commonly black, or at least a deep brown; and hence the name of Hindoo, applied to them by their Tartar and Persian invaders; for that word, in Persian, is equivalent to negro in ours. The hair is long, coarse and black; beard of the same color; the eye black or deep brown; the face oval, and the features handsome; except some defect in the lower limbs, the person is well formed. The stature is short of the European, and the body spare and deficient in strength. Clearness and subtlety, rather than depth and vigor, characterize their intellectual capacities. But this race is subdivided into several others, having distinct peculiarities, as the Cashmerians, the Bengallees, the Oriyas, the Telingas, the Mahrattas, and the Hindoo-Chinese, inhabiting a country from the 7th to the 36th degrees of N. latitude, from the eastern limits of the Hindoo country, to the western limits of China, and consisting of several different varieties, viz., the semi-barbarous people of Cassay, Cachar and Assam, and to the south and east of these, the Arracanese, Burmese, Peguans, Laos or Shans, Siamese and Cambojans; and east of them, the Anam race, comprising the Cochin-Chinese and Tonquinese.

5. The Chinese. (See China.)

6. Near the Chinese is another great family, bearing it some resemblance, and yet a distinct class, the Japanese. They occupy a country of great extent and fine temperature, extending from 30° to 45° N. Their color is tawny, stature short but robust, nose flat-tish, eyelids thick and puffed, eyes dark, lower limbs large and thick.

North-east of China are the Coreans, occupying a peninsula equal in extent with Great Britain. They are superior in strength to the Chinese and Japanese, but inferior in mental capacity.

7. The inhabitants of two-thirds of the superficies of Asia, from the seats of the families already specified, to the frozen ocean, remain to be described. These have a common resemblance, in some important features; but it is only such a resemblance as exists in all the families already mentioned, from the eastern shore of the Atlantic to the eastern confines of Hindoostan. The first of these races comprises the inhabitants of Bootan, a stout, active race, their stature rising occasionally to six feet. They are a long settled agricultural race, having a peculiar language of their own. West of these is the Yorkha family, a short, robust people, of an olive complexion. North of these, on the terrace of the Himalaya, at an elevation of 12,000 to 13,000 feet above the sea, are the Tibetan family, having a Tartar countenance, angular face, broad across the cheek-bones, small black eyes, and very little head. They are short, squat, broad-shouldered, and sluggish both in mind and body.

We come now to the Mongolian family, inhabiting the vast plateau and extensive ascents between the Himalaya and Altai ranges, as far as the 140th degree of longitude, and then between the former and the right bank of the Amur. Their general features are, forehead low and slanting; head square, broad cheek-bones, chin prominent; body short, broad, square, and robust. Hair black, long, and lank, beard scant. There are two great divisions of this family, the Eastern and Western Tartars, the former being the present lords of China.

The true Mongols extend westward from 116° longitude to the sea of Aral, a sweep of at least 3,000 miles, and embrace the communities known as Mongols, Kalkas, Fluths, Ogurs, Kokonors, Kami, and Kalumes. These were the instruments of the conquests of Jenghis Khan and his sons. They have firm and robust bodies, lean and pallid countenances, high and broad shoulders, short and distorted noses, pointed and prominent chins, a low and deep upper jaw, long teeth, distant from each other, eyelids stretched out from the temple to the nose, eyes black and unsteady, an expression oblique and stern, extremities bony and nervous, large and muscular thighs, short legs, and stature equal to the European. The country of the Mongols is cold, elevated and dry, few parts of it being fit for culture, and a great portion of it consisting of deserts or seas of sand. It abounds, however, in game and wild animals. With the exception of a very small number, they live exclusively on animal food; and their clothing and dwellings are for the most part made of animal tegument or fibre. Their employment consists in tending cattle, the chase, and war. The native capacity of this family is sufficiently attested by the production of such men as Attila, Jenghis, Timur, Rabe, and Kublay Khan; as well as in the conquest, retention, and government of China for 200 years.

Between the Altai range and river Amur, tribes exist almost as numerous as in any equal extent of the American continent, and far more distinct in physical form. And near to, and on the banks of the Amur are four nations, called Soloni, Kertching, Daguri, and Natkis, all of which have languages wholly different from their immediate neighbors, the Manchooks; rude, dull, without the knowledge of letters, living on fish.

Sherbani, the grandson of Jenghis Khan, led a colony of Mongols into Siberia, amounting to 15,000 families, and his descendants reigned there for 300 years, till conquered by the Russians; so that the Mongols, though originally foreigners, now form a considerable part of the population of Siberia. Besides these, there are a number of families, distinct from each other, inhabiting these regions. Among all the native races to the north of the Altai mountains, letters are wholly unknown, agriculture is scarcely practiced, and to obtain food and clothing nearly the whole time of the people is consumed in fishing and the chase.—Abridged from McCulloch.

Religion.—Maltebrun gives the following mournful, but just picture of the moral and religious condition of the immense population of this vast continent: "The mental torpor subsisting in combination with some virtuous, mild, and hospitable feelings, keeps alive the empire of religious superstition, under the yoke of which we find all the eastern and central parts of Asia languishing; while the Christianity of the Greek Church slowly penetrates by the north, and Mohammedanism still flourishes in the western regions. Polygamy, supported by the same spirit throughout Asia, with the single exception of Japan, debases family connections, and deprives life of its endearments, by taking from the female all consideration and influence; at the same time, being averse to the laws of nature, it diminishes the population, and deteriorates the human race."

Population.—We have no means of ascertaining with any degree of certainty the extent and population of this vast continent. The following estimate, which we find in Harper's new Universal Gazetteer, is probably somewhat above the mark:

Owing to the imperfect reports of the missions, it is impossible to make such a table as this complete; and it is possible that some slight errors may be discovered in the statistics; but it is an approximation sufficiently near to give a fair view of the present state of the missionary work on the continent of Asia, as compared with its vast population. Deducting the 50,000,000 nominal Christians from the estimate of the population, we have left about 700,000,000 of Mohammedans, Jews, and heathens in Asia, which would give more than 1,000,000 to each missionary. But then it is to be considered that the modern missionary enterprise commenced but a little more than fifty years ago; and besides these missionaries, there are now probably not less than 2,000 native assistants laboring for the evangelization of their countrymen on the same field. More than 1600 have been reported; some of the societies make no reports of native assistants; and most of the reports are very deficient on this head. And then, a vast amount of preparatory work has been done in the way of education and the printing and circulation of books. The 20,000 converts from heathenism, and the 80,000 pupils in the mission schools, and the millions of pages of Bible truth in circulation, must be now exerting a powerful influence in sapping the foundations of heathenism.

ASSAM: The country known as Assam, lies on the north-western frontier of Burmah, and from that frontier stretches across the plains of the Brahmaputra, from 70 to 100 miles in breadth towards the Himalaya mountains. On the north-east it reaches to the borders of China. Its inhabitants are of many different races, though they are known by the common name of Shyans or Shans, a term which has given rise to the English name Assam. It was formerly an independent state, but in 1822 it was incorporated with the Empire of Burmah and in 1826 it was ceded to the English. The tribes that inhabit the country are numerous, and differ widely from each other, the most important being the Assamese, the Khamtis, the Singphos and the Nagas.

MISSION—AMERICAN BAPTIST UNION.—The attention of the Board was first directed to the inhabitants of this country by Captain Francis Jenkins, Commissioner of the Governor-General of India for Assam. This gentleman feeling a lively interest in the singular people whom he had been appointed to govern, in 1834 addressed a letter to some of his friends in Calcutta, requesting them to invite some of the missionaries of the American Baptists to come and settle in the country. Captain Jenkins also promised to contribute 1000 rupees for the establishment of a mission on the arrival of the first missionary, and 1000 more on the arrival of a printing-press. This proposal was communicated to the Board of managers and was favorably received by them, being recommended by several special considerations. The language of the people was similar to the Burman, and the characters used in printing were essentially the same. The proposed mission also appeared to open a nearer access to China, which was at that time barred to all missionary effort by the exclusive policy pursued by its government. It was imagined that while the Imperial officers were carefully excluding foreigners from the ports, the missionaries from Assam might join the caravans that traded to the interior of China, and thus bear the Gospel to the very centre of the empire.

With views like these, the Board determined to comply with the request of Captain Jenkins, and immediately referred the matter to the missionaries at Maulmain to carry their plan into execution. It was at the time when Rev. Mr. Brown and Mr. Cutter, a printer, had just been obliged to leave Rangoon, and they were immediately selected to commence the proposed mission at Sadiya—the place deemed most eligible for the purpose. These gentlemen with their families reached Calcutta in September, 1835, where they provided themselves with a printing-press, a standing-press, and a suitable supply of paper and other materials for their work; securing at the same time from the Board the assurance of an additional press and a complete apparatus for printing to be sent from this country. Thus provided, they embarked at Calcutta, in boats, on the Brahmaputra, and after a passage of four months they reached Sadiya on the 23d of March, 1836. They were kindly received by Captain Jenkins, who immediately fulfilled his promise to the mission, and continued for many years its liberal benefactor and constant friend.

Sadiya is the principal town of a district, bearing the same name. It is beautifully situated in the north-eastern portion of Assam, about 400 miles north of Ava, and half that distance from the Chinese frontier. It contains a large population, composed of the several races that occupy the country. Among these people the missionaries immediately prepared to commence their labors. So soon as a suitable building could be erected, the ladies of the mission established schools, Mrs. Brown for boys and Mrs. Cutter for girls, both of which were well attended. Meanwhile Mr. Brown and Mr. Cutter employed themselves in learning the condition of the people, in perfecting their acquaintance with the language, in the printing of which they decided to adopt the Roman instead of the Burman or other oriental alphabet.* Mr. Cutter soon printed

* The idea of using the Roman alphabet in the printing of books in the languages of India, was first commended to the missionaries in 1834, by Mr. E. T. Trevelyan, a gentleman connected with the government in Bengal, a distinguished oriental scholar and an intelligent and devoted friend of missions. The method was for a time adopted by the missionaries of several denominations in India, but has been wholly abandoned. It is often referred to in the missionary correspondence of the time as Trevelyanism.

a spelling-book for the schools, and Mr. Brown began to prepare works for the press, both in the Assamese and Shyan languages.

In April, 1837, Rev. Miles Bronson, and Rev. Jacob Thomas, with their wives, arrived at Calcutta as missionaries to Assam. They had sailed from Boston in the preceding October, having with them an additional printing press, and a full supply of all the materials for printing. They soon again embarked at Calcutta on the Brahmaputra, for the distant place of their destination. They had been several weeks on their passage against the rapid current of the river, and had nearly reached Sadiya, when Mr. Bronson having become dangerously ill of the jungle fever, Mr. Thomas was hastening forward in a small boat to procure medical assistance for his associate. He had already come within sight of the town of Sadiya, and even of the mission premises, when two trees, whose roots were united, suddenly fell from the loosened bank of the river, directly upon the boat in which he was seated, crushing the boat and causing Mr. Thomas to drown. A calamity so unexpected could not but darken the prospects of the mission. A few days afterwards, Mrs. Thomas and her associates reached Sadiya, where they were welcomed by the mission families.

So soon as the newly-arrived missionaries were prepared to enter upon their appropriate labors, it was found expedient to distribute their labors among the several races of the province. Mr. Brown gave his attention principally to the Assamese and the Khamtis; Mr. Bronson to the Singphos; while Mr. Cutter was constantly occupied at the two presses and in the supervision of the schools of the mission. It should also be remarked that a leading object had in view by the Board in establishing the mission in Assam was, if possible, to penetrate the northern parts of Burmah and Siam, and also the upper provinces of China. In accordance with this general design, Mr. Kincaid, of the Burman mission, attempted a journey from Ava to Sadiya, in 1837. He was able only to reach Mo-gaung, whence he returned to Ava, through the many perils of a general insurrection of the provinces of the north. For the same purpose, also, the missionaries at Sadiya made several excursions eastward, and proceeded almost to the confines of China. These excursions led to no other result than to make them acquainted with new multitudes of heathen, who were already accessible to the preaching of the gospel. The entrance to Burmah proper and to China, however, continued to be controlling objects of inquiry and aspiration both to the missionaries and the Board, till the barriers that so long shut them out of these countries were finally broken down.

In May, 1838, Mr. Bronson and his family removed to Jaipur, an important post of the East India Company, on the river Dihing, three or four days' journey south-east from Sadiya. It was in this region that the Singphos, the people to whom he was particularly sent, were the most numerous. It was also in the immediate vicinity of the Nagas, a people living among the hills, who had been visited by the missionaries, and had awakened the interest of the English residents. Mr. Bronson was warmly welcomed to Jaipur by Mr. Bruce, a friend of the mission, who was then residing there as the Company's agent for promoting the culture of the tea-plant. Other British officers and residents then at Jaipur contributed liberally towards the establishment of the new station, and the personal comfort of the missionary and his family; and several of the ladies of the post joined with Mrs. Bronson in opening schools and teaching the heathen children who attended them. At about the same period, Captain Jenkins, in addition to his previous benefactions, also contributed 500 rupees for replenishing the fonts of type, and offered 500 more towards the support of a superintendent of the schools, in case one was appointed by the Board. The interest which this gentleman manifested in the plans and operations of the mission is a high testimonial to the beneficent results which it was producing among the people over whom he ruled. Not only was he the constant adviser of the missionaries in all their enterprises, but he often addressed communications directly to the Board, suggesting such measures as he deemed important to its growth and prosperity, and coupling with his suggestions the most liberal offers of aid in carrying them into execution.

In 1839, the labors of the mission at both its stations were for a time interrupted by an insurrection among the Khamtis, who had united portions of other tribes in a league against the power of the English. They began with an attack upon Sadiya, and a large number of the English soldiers and residents were slain in the fury of the onset. The missionaries at this station fled to the cantonments of the troops, where they remained in safety till the insurrection was quelled, when they removed to Jaipur. At the time of the insurrection, Mr. Bronson was absent on a tour among the Nagas, among whom he was preparing to establish a station. He immediately hastened back to Jaipur, where he found the schools broken up, and the whole population distracted with alarms. The whole body of the missionaries being now at Jaipur, it was deemed best to remove thither also the entire property of the mission, and abandon altogether the station at Sadiya. The expenses of the removal were generously defrayed by Mr. Bruce; but in consequence of the agitation and alarm produced among the people by the insurrection, it was several months before the mission fully recovered from the shock it had sustained. Sadiya was soon afterwards abandone by the government officers and English residents, most of whom also removed to Jaipur. Meanwhile the missionaries, in the suspension of their external labors, devoted themselves with the more assiduity to the study of the language, the preparation of tracts and books, and the translation of the Scriptures. In the spring of 1839, the Gospel of Matthew, translated by Mr. Brown, was printed at the mission press.

In January, 1840, Mr. Bronson made a second visit to the Nagas among the hills around Jaipur. Finding them now in a quiet condition, and apparently eager for instruction, he determined immediately to settle among them, and establish a branch of the mission. He was greatly encouraged in this undertaking by several English officers and residents, of whom Mr. Bruce contributed 500 rupees and Capt. Hannay 250 for the establishment of schools. In the following March Mr. Bronson, having made the necessary preparations, removed his family to the country of the Nagas, and commenced his labors among the people.

In May, Rev. Cyrus Barker and his wife, and Miss Rhoda Bronson, sister of Rev. Mr. Bronson, were added to the mission. They had sailed from the United States with an appointment specially to the Nagas; but finding that Mr. Bronson had already begun the station among the hills, Mr. Barker decided to devote himself to the Assamese, while Miss Bronson soon went to join her brother at his new residence. But the several departments of the mission were scarcely organized when changes and afflictions began to fall upon them. Mr. and Mrs. Brown were obliged temporarily to leave the mission to recruit their health. Mr. Bronson soon found the climate of the hills exceedingly unhealthy; and on account of the severe illness of members of his family, he was soon obliged to return to Jaipur, where Miss Bronson died of fever in December, 1840, before she had scarcely begun her work as a missionary. Mr. Barker, after acquiring the language at Jaipur, selected as the place of his residence Sibsagor, a flourishing post of the East India Company on the Brahmaputra, about three days' journey below Jaipur. He settled here with his family in May, 1841, and in the following July was followed by Mr. and Mrs. Brown. This place proved to be particularly favorable to the culture of the tea-plant, and soon withdrew most of the English residents from Jaipur,—from which, without entirely abandoning it as a station, the missionaries at length also removed to Sibsagor. Mr. Bronson, however, went to Nowgong, a flourishing town in Central Assam, to which he was specially invited by Captain G. T. Gordon, an English officer who had long been a friend and benefactor of the mission. The missionaries, too, at all the stations, finding the other races comparatively inaccessible to the gospel, determined to restrict their labors to the Assamese population. At Nowgong, Mrs. Bronson, with the aid of Captain Gordon, soon opened a large mission school, in which she employed as assistants two native converts from Calcutta. This school still continued to flourish, and has been productive of much religious benefit to its members.

Meanwhile Mr. Cutter still continued at Jaipur, conducting the presses belonging to the mission. The Gospels of Matthew and John, and also the Acts of the Apostles, had been translated by Mr. Brown, and, together with school books prepared in various languages, were now printed for the use of the numerous schools. In the winter of 1842-3, the insurrectionary spirit began again to show itself among the people, and Jaipur was for several weeks exposed to attacks from parties of insurgents. During this time Mr. Cutter was obliged to take down the presses, and conceal them with the other property belonging to the mission. On the restoration of tranquillity they were again set up and put in operation; but the events which had occurred, and the exposed condition of the mission property decided the missionaries on the total abandonment of Jaipur, and the removal of the station to Sibsagor. This was accomplished with the approbation of the Board in November, 1843. At about the same time, in order to prevent a concentration of the mission at too few points, Mr. Barker removed into Central Assam, first to Tezpur, and then to Gowahatti, the residence of Major Jenkins—for this was now his military rank,—and the most important town in the province. Here a station was begun, and Jaipur was wholly abandoned.

The three stations of Sibsagor, Nowgong, and Gowahatti, into which the mission was now divided, still continue to be the centres of its operation, which have been for some time past entirely restricted to the Assamese population, instead of embracing the Khamtis, the Singphos, and the Nagas, as was originally designed. A church was constituted at each of the stations soon after its establishment, and these churches have gone gradually forward in winning converts to the gospel from the heathen population of the country. At each of these stations, also, the work of preaching, translating, and teaching has been constantly prosecuted by the missionaries, with only such hindrances as usually attend the dissemination of the gospel among men. In addition to the strictly religious schools which are directly supported by the mission, there are also others which are sustained in a great degree by English residents; and though taught generally by native assistants, either belonging to the country or brought from Calcutta, are yet under the general care of the mission, and are to be numbered among its fruits. These schools have become very numerous, and are widely scattered among the villages of the country. But the school to which the missionaries attach the most importance, and which has been productive of the best results, is the Orphan Institution at Nowgong. It aims to collect from all parts of the province destitute orphan children, and train them to useful occupations and to a knowledge of the gospel. It went into operation in 1844, and for several years past it has numbered from fifty to seventy members. Its expenses for several years were wholly defrayed, and are still very much lightened, by the generous contributions of the philanthropic English residents in Assam. Many of its pupils have become Christians, and several have been employed as assistants in the mission. Prior to 1846, only here and there a native convert had been baptized, but in the course of that year seven of the elder pupils of the Nowgong institution, and several other persons at the same station, were admitted to the church. At the close of the year 1847, the church at Gowahatti numbered twenty-seven members, and those of the three stations contained together upwards of sixty native disciples.

In 1846, Mrs. Brown visited the United States, and awakened an increased interest in behalf of the mission among the churches and the members of the Board, and early in the following year, two missionaries, Rev. A. H. Danforth, and Rev. Ira J. Stoddard, offered their services to the managers, and were appointed to Assam—the former to join the station at Gowahatti; the latter to relieve Mr. Bronson in the charge of the orphan institution at Nowgong. They arrived at the places of their destination early in the spring of 1848. In the following year, Mr. and Mrs. Brown, and Mrs. Cutter, were obliged, by ill health, to come for a season to the United States. They remained here until the summer of 1850, when they returned to their stations, accompanied by Rev. Messrs. Whiting and Ward, and their wives, and Miss Shaw, a teacher, all of whom were appointed to the mission. They reached Assam in the following June. Mr. G. Dauble, a gentleman who had been employed as a teacher at Dacca, in Bengal, by the Basle Missionary Society, came to Assam in 1850, and having become a Baptist, was temporarily connected with the Nowgong institution. He was afterwards ordained as a missionary, and in 1851, married to Miss Shaw. He died at Nowgong in March, 1853. Rev. Cyrus Barker, also, after a long period of declining health, embarked for the United States, and died at sea, in January, 1850. His family now live in this country. Mr. Cutter, the printer, was also dismissed from the mission in the autumn of 1852.

The translation of the New Testament in Assamese, was completed by Mr. Brown, and printed at Sibsagar in 1849. Since then it has passed through other editions; and several books of the Old Testament have also been printed, together with a long list of books to be used in the schools. The English officers and residents in the province, still continue to evince their wonted interest in the prosperity of the mission, and in the results which it aims to accomplish for the people. The religion of the Brahmins has, for some time, been losing its hold on the popular mind, and the impression is widely prevailing, not only in Assam, but in other parts of India, that it must give place to the religion which is taught by the English. This however is only a negative and comparatively unimportant result. The missionaries have still before them their great work of persuading the people to embrace the gospel—a work for which, thus far, a preparation only has been made, but which has of itself scarcely begun to be accomplished.—See Professor Gammell's History of Am. Baptist Missions, and recent Reports of Managers of Missionary Union.—PROF. W. GAMMELL.

ATHENS: See Greece.

AUCKLAND: Capital of New Zealand, in lat. 36° 51' S. long. 174° 45' E. A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society commenced in 1823. Population 1800, has now 4 missionaries, 5 chapels, 26 local preachers, 53 teachers, 291 members, 492 scholars, and 810 attendants on public worship. Auckland contains besides a college and seminary for the education of the sons of the Wesleyan Missionaries in Australia and Polynesia, having now 70 students; and there is also a native institution, giving the benefit of an education in the English and Maori languages to native young men, to fit them for future usefulness. Also, a station of the Church Missionary Society.

AUSTRAL ISLANDS: A group of five islands in the Southern Pacific, between 22° 27' and 27° 36' S. lat., and 144° 11' and 150° 47' W. long. The names of the islands are, Raivavai, Tubuai, Rurutu, Rimatara, and Rapa.

AUSTRALASIA: The Encyclopedia

Britannica gives the following as the boundaries of Australasia: "Take the equator as the northern line, from 132° to 175° E. long.; continue a line on the meridian to the 55th parallel, (bending a little to take in New Zealand,) for the eastern; a line on the same parallel to 65° E. long. for the southern; and a slanting point on the equator, so as to include Kerguelands Land, and pass on the eastern side of Timorlant, Ceram, Mysol, and Salwalty, for the western boundary; those lines will embrace the whole of the Australasian Islands, viz., Australia or New Holland, Van Dieman's land or Tasmania, New Guinea, and the Louiscade Archipelago, New Britain, New Ireland and neighboring islands, Solomon's Islands, New Hebrides, New Caledonia, New Zealand and isles to the southward, Kergueland Islands, St. Paul and Amsterdam, and numerous coral reefs and islets.

AUSTRALIA, or NEW HOLLAND lies between 10° 30' and 39° S. lat. and between 112° 20' and 153° 40' E. long. Its extreme length is about 2603 miles, and its average width 1200, making about 2,690,810 square miles; the continent of Europe embracing 3,684,841, which will give the reader a comparative idea of the size of this new continent. The prevailing features of the country are barren and wooded plains, traversed by long ridges of precipitous, but not very lofty mountains, and rivers which often spread into marshes, and do not continue their course to any great distance in proportion to the extent of the country. There are few deep bays; nor does the sea, so far as yet discovered, receive any river, whose magnitude corresponds to that of the land. Great portions of that part which has been explored are unfit for cultivation, or even for traveling. There are, however, fine meadow tracts, on a grand scale, where the richest herbage grows spontaneously, and where industry may raise the most plentiful crops. In its geographical features and in some of its productions, Australia differs widely from all other portions of the known world. The discovery of gold has recently attracted considerable attention, and drawn great numbers of emigrants from Great Britain to that far off land.

Inhabitants.—We have no definite and reliable information as to the number of the aboriginal population; but it is supposed to be about 15,000. Major T. S. Mitchell, however, who has made three tours into the interior, thinks there are less than 6,000. This gentleman expresses a high opinion of their character. He says that, in manners and general intelligence, they appear superior to any class of white rustics he had seen. The tribes of the northern Coast of Australia possess a peculiar interest, on account of their proximity to the Indian Archipelago. Here, within a circle of 500 miles, may be found a large number of distinct tribes, varying in color from the black of the negro to the freckled-yellow of the Polynesian mountaineer, and differing in social condition as much as in person.

The British colony of New South Wales was originally a penal settlement, to which criminals were transported from Great Britain. After this, it was opened to independent and bounty emigrants. And, within a few years past, the discovery of gold has caused a great rush of emigration. In 1810, the population was but 8,923. In 1851, it was 264,000.

MISSIONS.

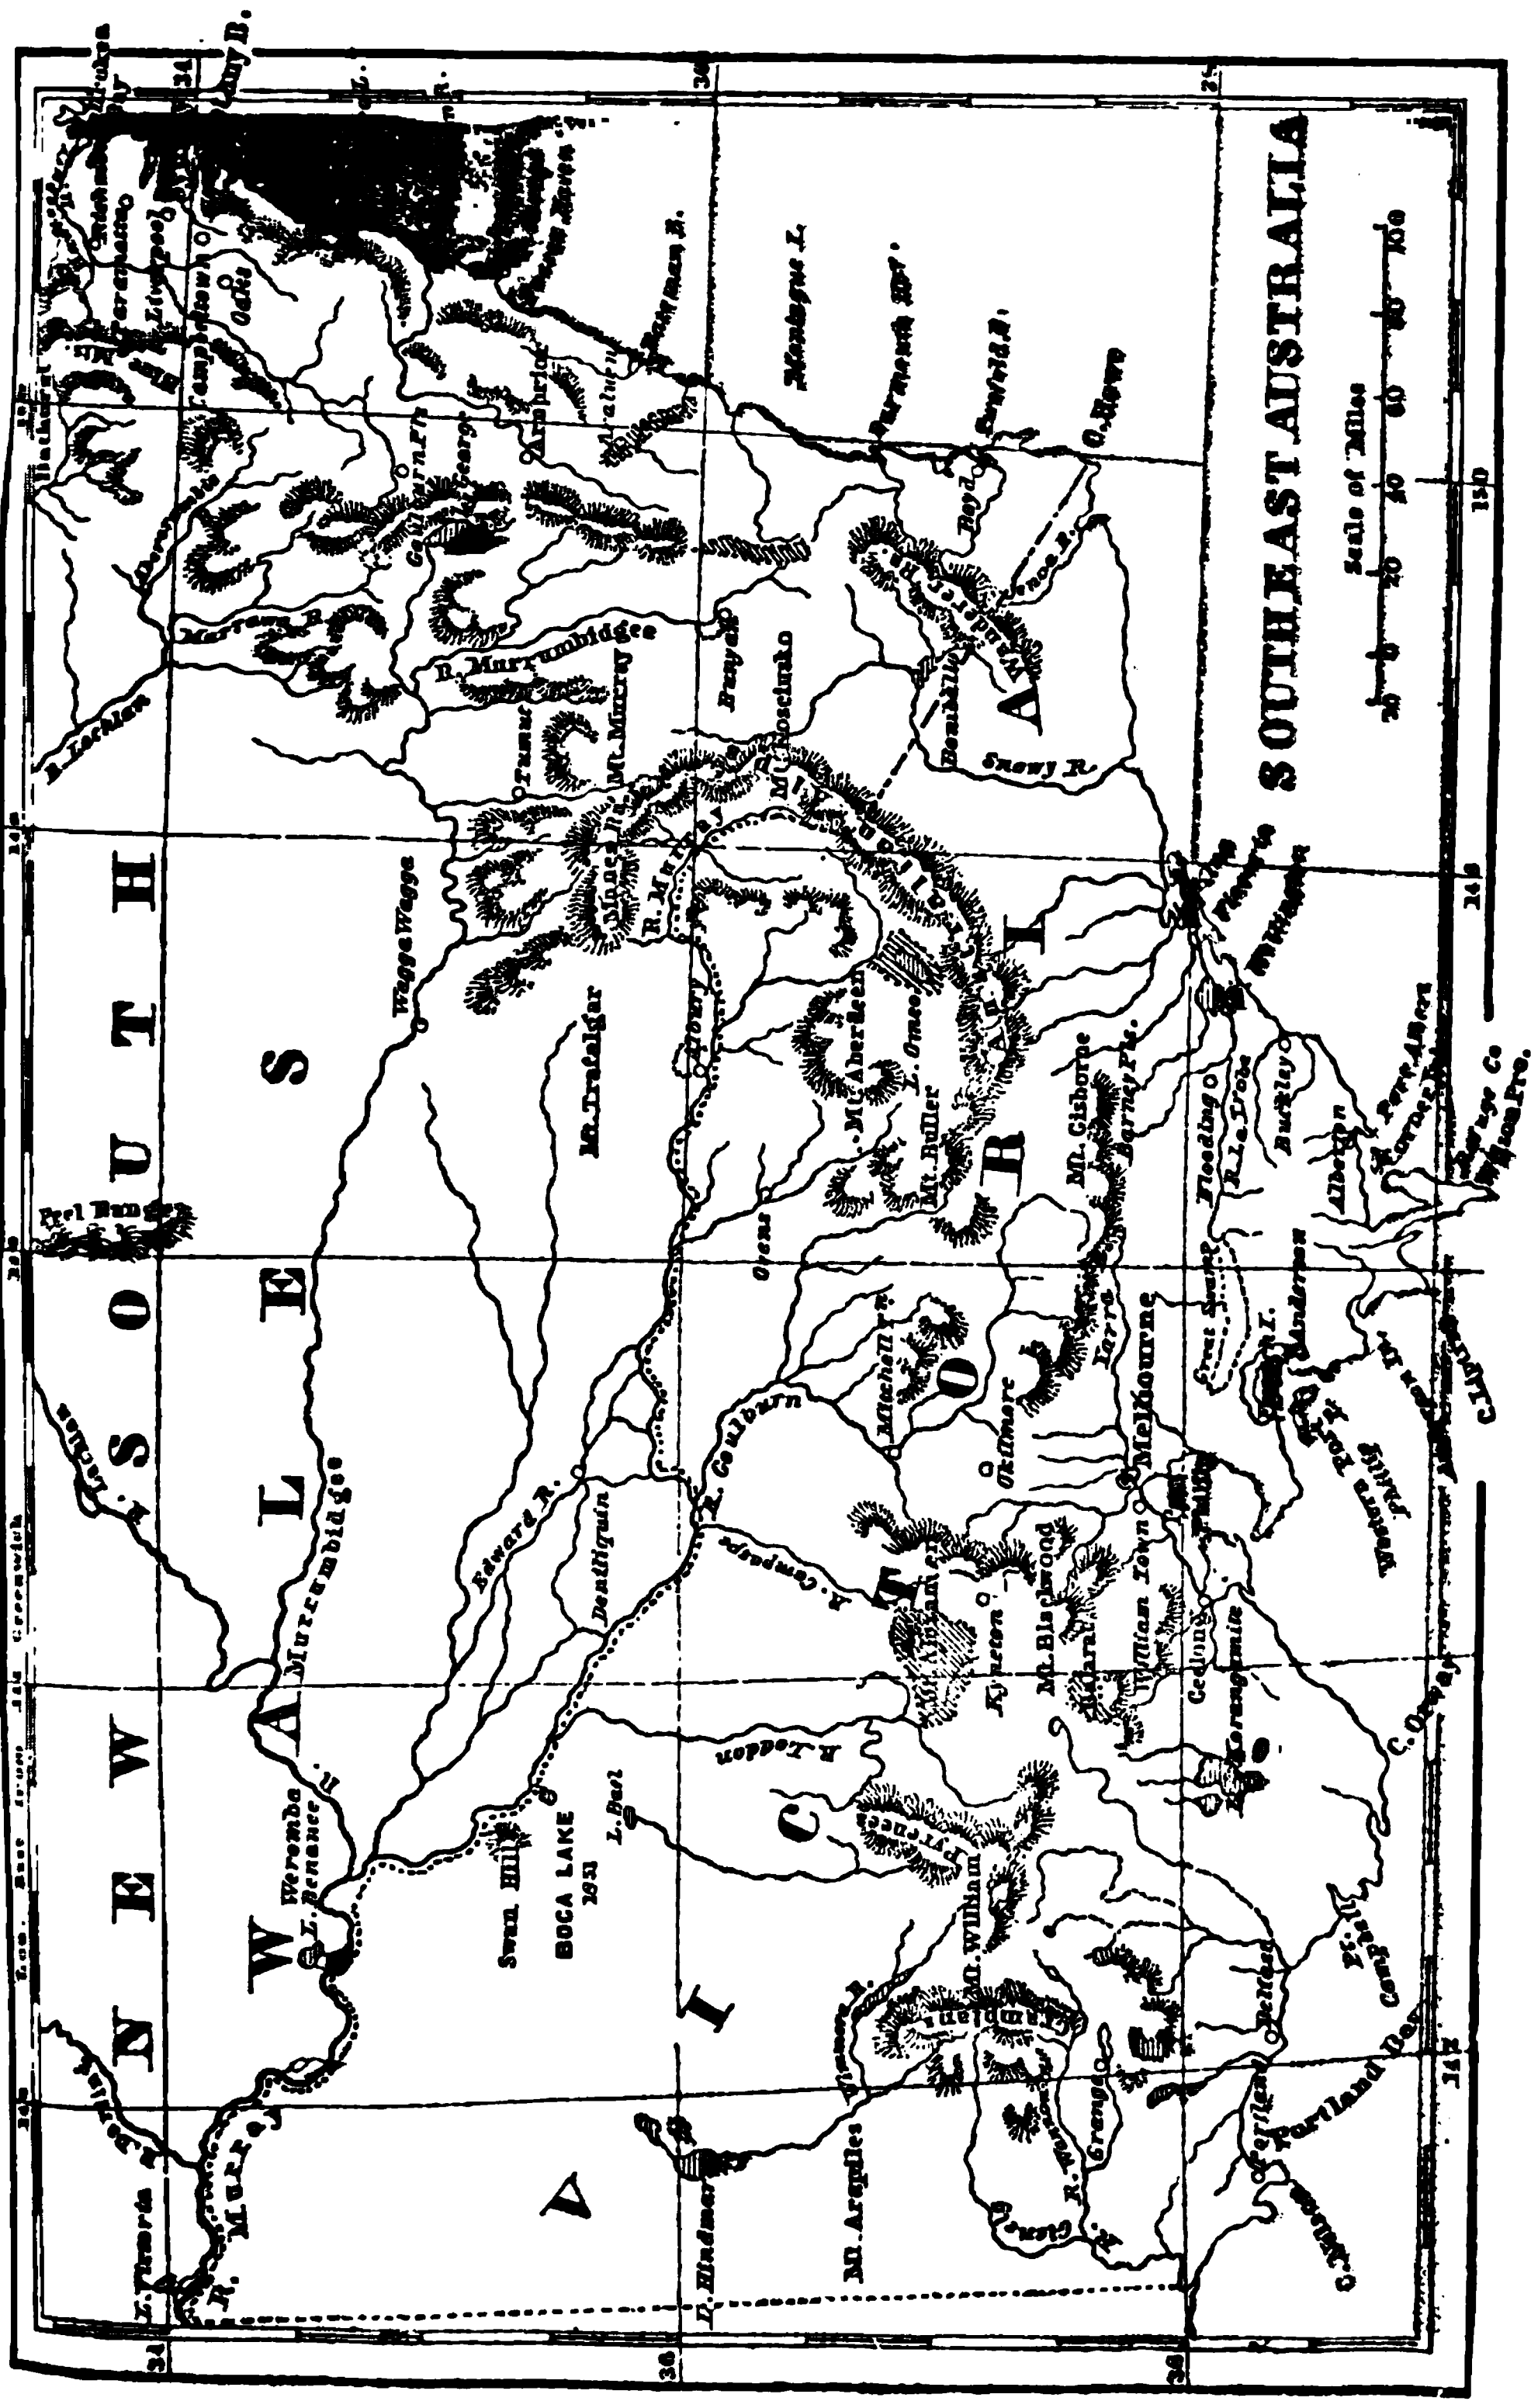

UNITED BRETHREN.—The Moravians established a mission to the aborigines of Australia in 1849, and have one missionary laboring at Lake Boga; but no specific results are yet reported.

SOCIETY FOR PROPAGATING THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS.—New South Wales having been occupied by the British Government as a penal settlement, chaplains were appointed as their services were required. In 1795 the Society began, on the recommendation of the local chaplain, to pay two schoolmasters in the settlement. In 1798, Rev. C. Haddock became the Society's first missionary in Norfolk Island. In 1825, when the population of Australia was 31,133, there were only 10 chaplains maintained by the Government, and but 14 in 1837, when the population had more than doubled. In 1836, Rev. William G. Boughton was consecrated bishop, and £2,000 were granted by the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, and £1,000 by the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts, to aid the work; and soon after 10 missionaries were sent out by the latter Society. Year after year, more clergymen were sent out, and considerable grants of money were placed by the Society at the Bishop's disposal. In 1843 the Society was assisting to maintain 40 clergymen in Australia, and 10 in Van Dieman's Land; and in 1851, the number aided was about 50. In 1847, the Diocese was divided, and three new sees, Newcastle, Adelaide, and Melbourne were constituted. The increase of clergy since that time will be seen by the following table:

Newcastle	17	27
Adelaide	11	22
		1851
Melbourne	3	20

A meeting has been held, attended by the four bishops of Australia, and the bishops of New Zealand and Van Dieman's Land, and a Board of Missions constituted, for the propagation of the Gospel among the aboriginal inhabitants of the Australian continent and the islands of the Western Pacific.

WESLEYAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—The Wesleyan Society opened a mission in New South Wales, in 1815; in South Australia in 1838; and the following year they began their operations in Western Australia, at a place called Perth. Fifty years ago, New South Wales was a penal settlement. There were a few thousand settlers, also, scattered over the country, engaged chiefly in rearing sheep and in agricultural pursuits. The rest of the population were aborigines. A few of the settlers who had been Methodists in England, and had gone to Australia either as farmers or as school teachers, finding themselves without religious services, and being surrounded by criminals on the one hand, and by heathens on the other, dreaded the consequences to themselves and their children; and in the year 1812 one of these settlers addressed a letter to the Missionary Committee imploring help. The state of society was frightful in the extreme. The most debasing crimes were openly perpetrated; and when any one remonstrated, the reply was, "It is the custom of the country!" The writer of the letter alluded to, pleads most earnestly, for himself, and in behalf of the little company associated with him, and also for the aborigines; and intimates that light might yet break forth from that place to the thousands of isles by which Australia is surrounded. Such was the foundation of the Wesleyan Missions to Australia. What finite mind can grasp the results of those labors which were then so earnestly invited! A day is coming when the great Southern Commonwealth, built up by Gold, and Commerce, and Agriculture, and Manufactures, may stand almost peerless among the nations of the earth, reposing upon freedom and evangelical faith, and looking back with meek adoration upon the humility of her origin!

The first class meeting ever held in Australia was on the evening of March 6, 1812; and by July, a division of that little band had formed three such small companies, united to pray and exhort one another to "work out their own salvation," two at Sydney, and one at Windsor. "We have here," says the writer of the letter, "in society, the following persons: in Sydney, Mr. John H., who leads a class in his own house, consisting of Mrs. H., Mrs. B., and Mrs. T., and three of the senior girls in the school. Mr. B. has also a class in his house, on a Friday evening, consisting of Mr. H., J. F., T. J., and a soldier or two of the 75th Regiment. Our meetings are generally very comfortable and profitable. At Windsor we have a class under the care of Mr. E., consisting of six. Mr. E. is a pious, sensible young man, sent here from Ireland, where he was converted while under sentence of death for forgery. He was bred to the bar. Being of an humble, affectionate disposition, and zealous in the cause of God, I doubt not, (especially could his reproach be wiped away,) he would make a useful man among us. He has been employed for some months past in teaching school, and he goes some miles into the country on the Sunday, where he reads the Church Liturgy, and expounds, or preaches, to the settlers, several of whom are thankful for his labors." Such was the first class, and such was the first preacher of Methodism in Australia! This little band of 20 Christians assembled at Windsor, on the 3rd of April, to hold their first Love Feast. They enjoyed a season of great blessing, and at the close of the service, they resolved themselves into a Committee of Consultation, to see what could be done to obtain the ordinances of the Gospel for themselves, and the blessings of an itinerant ministry for Australia. They appointed one of their number to address the Missionary Committee in London, on their behalf, and to plead for the sake of the perishing thousands of settlers, convicts, and savages around them, to send them a missionary; at the same time engaging to meet his support. The communication bears date July 20, 1812.

And thus originated that action, which, under the blessing of God, has resulted, (1st) In the establishment of one of the largest of the British Colonial Churches, having had an independent Conference, and nearly 100,000 persons under its pastoral care; which (2d) has also rescued from sin and a sinner's doom, hundreds of those whose crimes had driven them from their native land; for the Missionaries have sought out the unhappy, branded exiles; and in many a delightful instance have those "banished ones," in "the land of their captivity," repented beneath the influence of Christian admonition, and found mercy at the hand of God; and the morning of eternity alone will tell how many of those children of crime and punishment shall be welcomed in Heaven, by the parents and friends, who in shame and despair had seldom dared to mention their names on earth; and, (3) such was the agency from which originated the Australian and Polynesian Wesleyan Missions, to the aborigines of the southern hemisphere, and which this day yields (including members, scholars, and regular hearers,) a result of more than 25,000 christianized heathens, to the pastoral care of the Wesleyan Missionary Society. "What hath God wrought!" To Him alone be all the glory!

In answer to their request, the Missionary Committee sought out a suitable man, in the person of Mr. Leigh, who arrived at Australia in August, 1815. He was joyfully received, and was favored with great and increasing prosperity. Soon three chapels were erected, at Sydney, Windsor 35 miles, and Castlereagh, 50 miles from Sydney, and four Sunday-schools were commenced, a circuit was formed, embracing 15 preaching stations, extending over 150 miles of the colony. Mr. Lawry was sent to help Mr. Leigh, in the following year. The Committee say in the report, "As many of the aboriginal natives of the country are occasionally met with by Mr. Leigh on his excursions, it is hoped that, on the arrival of Mr. Lawry, not only will the calls of the settlers for religious help be met, but something effectual be done by the brethren for the civilization and Christian instruction of the natives themselves. Mr. Lawry was encouraged by the Committee to make the attempt, and to consider this one of the objects of his mission." In 1817, the missionaries had the pleasure of entertaining eight missionary brethren, (among whom was that devoted man who twenty-two years afterwards became "The Martyr of Erromanga,") sent out by the London Missionary Society, to what was then called, Otaheite. During their visit to the Wesleyan mission stations in Australia, they zealously engaged in preaching the Gospel, and conducted themselves toward the Missionaries, and the work in which they were employed, in such a manner as to leave behind them "a sweet savor of Christ."

The Rev. Walter Lawry arrived in Sydney, May 1, 1818, and was joyfully met by Mr. Leigh. The population of the colony was then about 20,000, of whom not one in five had any opportunity of attending public worship; and in some districts the runaway convicts, who prowled around the homes of the settlers, made it dangerous to leave their residences to go any distance to the house of God, even had there been places of worship provided. The itinerancy, therefore, was the only mode of searching out these destitute people. There were at this time only four chaplains in all the colony; and it is due to truth and charity to state that these clerical gentlemen welcomed the Methodist itinerants to their adopted country with hearty good will, and showed themselves ready on all occasions to assist them. The missionaries had great trials to pass through. The roads were few, the rides long, and the lodgings often very indifferent. Frequently had they to lie on boards or on the ground, with their saddle-bags for a pillow, their only covering being their top-coat. But the cause of God was triumphing, and this reconciled them to every privation. In such circumstances and with such encouragement,

"Labor was rest, and pain was sweet."

The cause of God gained strength. Chapels were erected, churches and congregations gathered, and missionaries multiplied to meet the growing necessities of this great work. But here we must leave the delightful record of prosperity, as the great object of this publication is to trace the rise and progress of the Christian religion among the heathen.

The providence of God overruled the missions in Australia so as to accomplish this great end; for while the Gospel was gaining its triumphs among the Anglo-Saxon settlers and the convicts, and thus turning a colony which was once literally "a den of thieves," into a peaceful Christian community, the attention of these renewed and enlightened people was turned in pity toward the degraded aborigines around them, as well as to those heathen in the isles of the South Seas, with which they now began to have commercial relations. Accordingly in 1820, a fourth missionary was appointed for New South Wales, whose labors were to be devoted exclusively to the aboriginal population, and whose civilization and moral improvement were then considered by many to be utterly hopeless. An institution for the children of the aboriginal natives had been established at Paramatta, under the Governor's auspices; allotments of ground for cultivation were made; and an annual general friendly meeting was established by proclamation. This meeting was well attended by most of the tribes in the colony. They were kindly treated, and good impressions were made upon their minds; but it was found that unless Christian missionaries were obtained, to reside among them, who "would have compassion on the ignorant, and on them that are out of the way," and teach them "the path of life," little good could otherwise be accomplished. The Governor nobly offered to bear the expense for two years out of his private purse, and the Wesleyan Missionary Society supplied the man.

Mr. Walker commenced with a tribe who understood English, and through whom he endeavored to acquire the native language. The commencement of the mission was very encouraging. The fact of a missionary being appointed expressly for their benefit and instruction, impressed them with surprise and conciliated their regard. The only object of worship to which Mr. Walker found them disposed to pay any adoration was the waxing moon. They were also much influenced by fear of the evil spirit, and had a terror of darkness. But the missionary had hard work to make any impression whatever upon them. Nevertheless, though they had sunk so low, they so much the more needed the application of that only power which could awaken the torpor of their minds, and conquer their savage habits. As a sample of some of the difficulties which our missionary had to encounter with his flock of wild Papoos, take the following: Mr. Walker says, "They are very idle and vagrant; and the colonists often encourage their vices. For instance, if they cut wood, or do any other trifling work for them, they are rewarded by the colonists with what they call bull; sometimes this is composed of a mixture of spirituous liquors, and at others it is the washing of liquor puncheons. When they are permitted, they take a bucket of boiling water, put it into the puncheon, when they agitate it until it has drawn out the strength of the liquor. They then surround the puncheon and drink till they are intoxicated. Quarreling of course ensues. I was lately returning from Paramatta to Sydney, having visited the Native Institution, when I fell in with a tribe of these revelers. Some were not at all intoxicated, others were fearfully so;

out both the drunken and the sober knew me. I asked them to go into the woods, knowing if the convicts met them they would be excited to fight, and probably to murder one another; all followed me. But such a noise I never heard before; and so much wanton barbarity I never witnessed. The men would take their waddies, which are made of hard wood, about three feet long, and four or five inches in circumference at the end, and strike the heads of their women with such violence that I expected nothing less than the death of some of them, as the husbands stood up to defend their wives. When one man lifted up his waddy to strike another, I stepped in between them. I then turned round and found another bleeding most profusely. Before I had wiped away the blood from the head of one, another would be in danger. At last I declared I would not live with so quarrelsome a people. This produced a clamor which made the woods ring, and all vociferated, "Parson, do stay," a hundred times repeated. This threat of leaving them, acted like oil on the angry waters. It ended the row; and all proceeded peaceably to their homes. Though degraded to such an extent, yet they were not willing to lose their best earthly friend. They had become conscious of his value. Mr. Walker employed all his strength in visiting them at their temporary settlements, gaining their confidence, and giving them elements of instruction. He established preaching, and class and prayer meetings among them. He also kept a school, where he taught the children. Some fruit of his labor was given him. One youth in particular, of the name of Thomas, became truly converted to God, and soon learned to read the Bible, and began to be useful in holding meetings. But he sickened and died, as did also another equally pious, though not so efficient as Thomas. Both of these youths died well—"the first-fruits" of the Australian aborigines to Christ. But here a new difficulty arose. They are so superstitious that they believe the place where one has died to be equally fatal to themselves. They therefore fled from the mission house, lest they also should die. This dispersion, and the ill-health of the missionary, together with the unsettled habits of this tribe, and the vices they had acquired by their intercourse with the lower classes of the colonists, all proved unfriendly to this enterprise, and the committee resolved to try what could be done among those tribes which were located in the interior and more distant parts of the country, and which, by their position, were more out of the reach of many of those counteracting causes to which allusion has been made. They therefore opened a mission at Wellington Bay, where there were six tribes, the Bathurst, the Murrilong, the Nairy, the Bendjanz, the Mudjee, and the Mrawl.

Among these tribes the agents of the Society labored for a time, but with small success, owing chiefly to their migratory habits, joined to their want of appreciation of those means which were adopted for their benefit. Had the committee been able to have incurred the expense of adopting some vigorous and extensive plan of localizing the tribes, and thus bringing them under constant and regular instruction, success, on a large scale, might have been realized. But they were unable to do this, and the mission to these people was therefore suspended in 1828. But the committee, finding themselves in a better position in 1836, again renewed their efforts among the Australian aborigines, and three missionaries were sent out. They located themselves, two at Port Philip, in South Australia, and the other at Perth, on Swan River, in Western Australia. These missions have been blest with considerable success, and have been strengthened from time to time by an increase of agents.

In 1838 a mission among the aborigines was commenced at a place called Buntingdale, (now called Geelong) in Australia Felix, and two missionaries were placed there. The government kindly donated a tract of land for the use of the natives brought under Christian instruction. From that time, to the present, considerable prosperity, mingled with many trials, has attended their labors. The missionaries have mastered the languages of the natives; schools have been opened at each station; the printing-press has also been brought into requisition; and school-books, with Catechisms and the Holy Scriptures, printed for their benefit. An institution for training native young men for usefulness among their own tribes, is in operation at Perth, in Western Australia. It has now been open for about eight years, and has from twenty to thirty students.

Farms have been attached to each of these three missions, and also sheep-raising, by which, not only is a large part of the expense of the missions provided for, but the tribes which have, in each case, settled on the mission reserve, are thereby trained to remain in a settled home, where they are stimulated to industry, and enjoy those comforts of life, which, in their heathen state, they never knew. At each station, delightful instances of the saving power of the Gospel are constantly witnessed among these once degraded people, who, 30 years ago, were regarded as almost, if not altogether, beyond the reach of civilization or renewal. They are now beginning to repay the labor and sufferings endured on their behalf, and have been thus brought into connection with that Christianity which stands as the only barrier between them and utter destruction.

The statistics of the mission to the aborigines are not separated, in the following table, from those which have reference to the English population.

It is to be lamented that the rapid influx of the Anglo-Saxon race, during the past five or six years, has made serious encroachment upon their little settlements, and upon the means adopted for their welfare; and which has also left the aboriginal missions unaugmented, in the anxiety of the committee to provide ministers and Christian institutions for the gold seekers and others, who have of late flocked by thousands to Australia. But it is to be hoped that when "the gold fever" is over, and society settles down into calmness, and begins its efforts to improve the country of their adoption, the Anglo-Saxon Christians of Australia, which are now being counted by tens of thousands, will remember in mercy those aborigines in whose country they have found a home of comfort and of wealth. It was worthy the wisdom of Him "who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will," to convert "the hid treasures" of Australia into a lure by which should be drawn to that far-off land, a Protestant population, whose evangelical zeal, at some future day, will convert the millions in the Isles of Malaysia and Polynesia, to the faith of Christ. Already are the Wesleyans of Australia moving in this great enterprise. They have guaranteed soon to sustain all their ministers, now nearly sixty in number; they have also received from the parent body a separate and independent ecclesiastical organization; and they have adopted the missions to the Papoos, and those in Polynesia, as their own special responsibility, to God and to his Church. And in future years it will be gratefully remembered, that the same year which witnessed their organization as an independent church, also witnessed the establishment of their Missionary Society for the heathen of Australasia.—Wesleyan Missionary Notices and Annual Reports, and The Arminian Magazine.—REV. W. BUTLER.

AVA: The capital of Burmah, situated on the Irrawaddy, three hundred and fifty miles from its mouth. It has been at different periods a station of the American Baptist mission in Burmah.

AVARUA: A station of the London Missionary Society on the island of Rarotonga, one of the Hervey Islands.

AWAYE: A station of the Southern Baptist Convention, in Yoruba, West Africa, 60 miles north of Abbeokuta.

BADAGRY: A town and port in West Africa on the Gold Coast, in the Bight of Benin, 50 miles N. N. E. of Whydah, at first the coast station of the mission of the Church Missionary Society to the Yorubas. But in consequence of the wars of the native tribes, the town was subsequently reduced in importance and in the number of its inhabitants, and the station was transferred to Lagos. The Wesleyans also have a station there.

BAD RIVER: A station of the American Board among the Ojibwa Indians, near Lake Superior.

BAGDAD: A large city on the Tigris, the metropolis of an extensive pashalic which bears its name. The Jewish population is 6,000, and the whole trade of the town is in their hands. It is a station of the London Jews' Society, whose missionaries have been visited by crowds of Jews, eager for instruction.

BAHAMAS: See West Indies.

BAHARUTSE: Station of the London Missionary Society in South Africa, about 25 miles from Toun; inhabited by a numerous tribe of the Baharutse, who were, some time ago, driven from their own country, which was a considerable distance to the north.

BAPTIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY, (ENGLISH): The origin of this Society is traced to the workings of the mind of Rev. William Carey, which had been intensely directed to the conversion of the heathen for nine or ten years previous. He was at this time pastor of a small Baptist church at Moulton. He was born in obscurity, in the county of Northampton, Aug. 17, 1761, made a public profession of religion in 1783; and was ordained, 1787. Under the pressure of poverty, first as a journeyman shoemaker, and afterwards as a village schoolmaster, he had acquired several languages. With the earliest dawn of missionary purpose in his mind, was associated the study of geography and history. He addicted himself to the construction of maps of the world; in doing which, he reflected much on its spiritual destitution. In 1784, at a meeting of the association to which he belonged, at Nottingham, it was resolved to set apart an hour on the first Monday evening of every month, "for extraordinary prayer for the revival of religion, and for the extending of Christ's kingdom in the world." This was done at the suggestion of the venerable Mr. Sutcliff. This concert of prayer has since become almost universal in the churches. At these meetings, Mr. Carey was incessantly introducing and descanting upon the importance and practicability of a mission to the heathen, and of his own willingness to engage in it. But he met with little sympathy. Some regarded him as infatuated, and denounced his project as wild and hopeless; and others hesitated, amid doubts and fears. On one occasion, a request being made for a topic for discussion, at a meeting of ministers, Mr. Carey proposed "The duty of Christians to attempt the spread of the Gospel among heathen nations;" when Mr. Ryland, father of Dr. Ryland, expressed great surprise, and called him an enthusiast for entertaining such a notion.

While laboring as a schoolmaster and preaching at Moulton, he wrote an essay, which was afterwards published under the title of "An Inquiry into the obligation of Christians to use means for the conversion of the heathen." This appeal produced a strong impression. In 1788, Mr. Carey became pastor of a church in Leicester. While there, his anxiety for the spread of the Gospel abroad increased, till it became an habitual and irrepressible passion of his soul. In 1791, at a ministers' meeting, he urged forward the discussion, "whether it were not practicable, and our bounden duty, to attempt somewhat towards spreading the Gospel in the heathen world." About this time, two sermons were preached on the subject by Mr. Sutcliff and Mr. Fuller which deepened the impression. At the anniversary of the association at Nottingham, in May, 1792, Mr. Carey preached a sermon from Isa. 54 : 2, 3, arranged under two divisions. (1) "Expect great things from God, (2) attempt great things for God," which produced such a powerful impression as led the association to resolve that a plan for a missionary society should be presented at the fall meeting; and on the second of October, the plan was adopted, the society formed, and a contribution of £13 2s. 6d. made on the spot. Several meetings were held soon after, and the contributions increased.

Mr. Carey had his attention directed to the South Seas; and he proposed to go, if any society would send him out, with the means of support for one year. But, after the formation of the society, he became acquainted with the fact that a Mr. Thomas, who had been a surgeon in the East Indies, and afterwards had become a preacher, was collecting funds for a mission in Bengal; and sought to unite the two objects. And the committee, having satisfied themselves as to the character of Mr. Thomas, and being fully of opinion that a door was opened in the East Indies for preaching the Gospel to the heathen, agreed to invite him to go out under the patronage of the Society, agreeing to furnish him with a companion, if one could be obtained. Mr. Carey was asked if he was inclined to accompany him, to which he answered in the affirmative. While they were discussing the matter, Mr. Thomas came in, and Mr. Carey rising from his seat, they fell on each other's necks and wept. "From Mr. Thomas' account," said Mr. Fuller, "there is a gold mine in India, but it seems almost as deep as the centre of the earth. Who will venture to explore it?" "I will go down," said Mr. Carey, "but remember, that you must hold the ropes." This they solemnly engaged to do.

But Mr. Carey found difficulties in his way. His wife was utterly adverse to the mission, and refused to accompany him. She consented, however, to his taking with him their eldest son Felix.

An effort was made in London, in behalf of the object; but it was viewed with great distrust, and the leading men were afraid of committing the denomination to the Society. Mr. Thomas visited different parts of the country, to awaken interest and collect funds. Mr. Carey made repeated attempts to persuade his wife to accompany him; but she resolutely refused. Yet, he considered his duty to God paramount, and amidst the severest struggles of mind, resolved to go, intending to return for her as soon as he had secured a footing for the mission. But, being dissatisfied of sailing at the time set, in the interval before another vessel was to sail, Mr. Carey visited her again, with the hope that she might change her mind; but she still refused. Mr. Thomas, however, took up the case of his friend, and after renewing his appeals with reiterated urgency, she yielded, and accompanied her husband. They embarked, June 13, 1793, and arrived at Bala-sore, on the 7th of November. For the history of the early trials and struggles of this mission, the reader is referred to the appropriate head, under the article "HINDOOSTAN."

In 1795, the Society determined on establishing a mission in Africa; and two young men were sent out, who reached Sierra Leone on the first of December the same year. But one of them was obliged to return on account of his health the next year, and the other embroiled himself in disputes with a principal person in Sierra Leone, so that the Governor insisted on his leaving the colony, and he was discharged from the service of the Society.

The organization of this Society is very simple, a contribution of 10s. 6d., constituting membership, with the right of voting at its meetings. Its officers are chosen at the annual meeting by ballot. Its affairs are conducted by a committee of 36; and all honorary and corresponding members of the committee, together with all ministers who are members of the Society, and officers of London auxiliaries, are entitled to vote at the meetings of the Committee.

This Society have extended their missions to the different portions of India, and have them now in operation, in Calcutta, Bengal, Northern India, Madras and Ceylon; also, in the West Indies: in Jamaica, Trinidad, Bahamas, and Hayti; in Africa, and in France. The table at the close of this article exhibits the present state of their missions, and shows the success which has attended their labors.

Receipts.—The following table shows an approximation to the aggregate receipts of the society from its organization to March 31, 1853, with the average annual receipts for the periods specified. It is not, however, perfectly accurate, as no financial statements appear in the reports for the first five years; and in two other years in which they are lacking, we have given the amounts of the preceding and following years:

1792 to 1812, 20 years,	£54,647—Annual average,	£2,732
1813 " 1816, 4 "	30,646	7,661
1817 " 1820, 4 "	39,011	9,752
1821 " 1824, 4 "	55,099	13,774
1825 " 1828, 4 "	43,553	10,888
1829 " 1832, 4 "	56,086	14,021
1833 " 1836, 4 "	76,317	19,079
1837 " 1840, 4 "	78,970	19,742
1841 " 1844, 4 "	106,854	26,713
1845 " 1848, 4 "	89,317	22,329
1849 " 1852-3 4 "	72,082	18,020
1854 " "	24,759	" "

£627,341

The receipts for the year ending March 31, 1853, were £17,225. These receipts present the same general feature contained in the financial reports of all missionary societies: a general and steady advance in the contributions. The large amount for the period ending in 1844, is explained by the fact that it includes a special jubilee fund, collected for the Society's 50th anniversary.

BARAKA: Station of the American Board in West Africa, at the mouth of the Gaboon river.

BARAPUTSA: A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society in South Africa.

BARBADOES: See West Indies.

BARODA: The chief city of a district of the same name, in India, 230 miles from Bombay and 78 from Surat: Pop. 100,000. Near the city is a bridge, over the River Visuamitra, which is remarkable as being the only one in Gujerat. A station of the London Missionary Society.

BARRA POINT: A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society in West Africa, near St. Mary's.

BARRIPORE: A station of the Gospel Propagation Society in India, 16 miles south-east of Calcutta.

BARTICA GROVE: A station of the Church Missionary Society in British Guiana.

BASLE MISSIONARY SOCIETY: A seminary was established at Basle, in Switzerland, in 1815, for the education of missionaries to the heathen. That year, a Russian army was encamped on one side of the town, and a Hungarian army on the other, and a torrent of bombs was opened upon the town. But the Lord sent a violent east wind, which had such an effect upon the fire of the enemy, that the bombs were exhausted in the air before they could reach the houses. In consequence of this remarkable deliverance, the people of God resolved to establish a mission seminary, to train up pious teachers for the heathen. The first year, they had only a few rooms, and a small number of scholars, their income being £50; but in the sixth year, they were able to build a missionary college, their receipts having increased to £5,000. More than 40 auxiliary societies had been formed, in Switzerland, Germany, and France. This institution has since sent out a large number of valuable and devoted laborers, who have been employed in different parts of the world. It has furnished the Church Missionary Society many of their most efficient laborers. In 1842, the institution had sent out 175 missionaries, and 28 more were pursuing their studies.

It was no part of the original plan to send out missionaries to the heathen; but in 1821, a society was regularly organized, (Die Evangelische Missionsgesellschaft zu Basel), with the design of engaging fully in the missionary work. Its first representatives went forth in the following year. It now has 16 missionaries in Western Africa; 28 in India; and 3 in China. It has also a mission in North America. From the last report it appears that the receipts of the previous year were 304,298 fr. The disbursements were as follows:—for the African mission, 71,291 fr.; for the India mission, 156,849 fr.; for the Chinese mission, 21,193 fr.; for North America, 1,443 fr.; for the Missionary Institute, 39,815 fr.; for other expenses, 22,221 fr. The payments exceeded the receipts in the sum 8,514 fr. One year before, the debt of the society was 55,000 fr. Towards the liquidation of this amount, 26,402 fr. have since been paid, 12,568 fr. having been received from the city of Basle for this purpose.

BASSETTERRE: A station of the United Brethren in St. Kitts, West Indies.

BATH: A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society in Jamaica, West Indies.

BASSEIN: A district and a city in Burmah, near the borders of Arracan, and the seat of a mission of the Am. Baptist Missionary Union. The mission is principally for the Karens.

BASSA COVE: A settlement on the W. coast of Africa, at the mouth of the Mechlin river, a station of the Am. Baptist and Episcopal Missions in Liberia.

BATAVIA: A city and seaport of Java, capital of the Dutch possessions in the east, and of residency of same name, at the mouth of the Jaccatra river, on the north coast of the island. Pop. in 1842, 53,861, of whom about 3,000 were Europeans, the rest Chinese, Javanese, Malays, &c.

BATHURST: A village of recaptured Africans, in the parish of St. James, Sierra Leone, West Africa, a station of the Church Missionary Society. Also a station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, in Great Namaqualand, South Africa.

BATTICALOA: A town and district on an island three miles in circumference, on the east coast of Ceylon, 66 miles S. S. E. from Trincomale. A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society.

BATTICOTTA: A station of the Am. Board, in the northern part of Ceylon, about 6 miles north-west of Jaffnapatam, and 7 miles south-west from Tillipally. It is the seat of the male seminary, now in charge of Mr. Hastings.

BAU: One of the Feejee Islands, about two miles in circumference, most inconveniently situated for every thing except defence. The town is continually in ruins from fire, some part of it being constantly ignited by careless or malicious people. It is one of the largest towns, and the metropolis of Feejee. A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society.

BEAUFORT: A station of the United Brethren, in Jamaica, West Indies.

BEECHAM-DALE: See Aotea.

BEERSHEBA: A station of the Rhenish Missionary Society, in Great Namaqualand, South Africa, near Bethany.

BEERSHEBA: Station of the French Protestants, in South Africa, on the Caledon river, 60 miles south-west of Plaatberg.

BEKA: A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society in Kaffraria, South Africa.

BELGAUM: A town in the province of Bejapoor, India, lat. $15^{\circ} 53'$ N., and long. $74^{\circ} 42'$ E. Its climate is healthy, but all external trade is stopped for six months in the year, by the rains. Population in 1820, 7,654, one-third Mahrattas, one-sixth Mohammedans, one-eighth Jains, and one-ninth Brahmins. A station of the London Missionary Society.

BELIZE: A town of 400 houses, situated at the mouth of a river of the same name, in Honduras Bay. A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society.

BELLARY: A fortified town in the Bala-gant ceded districts, India, and the head quarters of a civil and military division; lat. $15^{\circ} 5'$ N., long. $76^{\circ} 59'$ E. The town is large and populous. Population of the district, 927,857. A station of the Loudon Missionary Society.

BENARES: A large and celebrated city, in the Presidency of Bengal, capital of a province and district of the same name. It is situated on the north bank of the Ganges, 460 miles north-west of Calcutta. Population 632,000. It is the most holy city of the Hindoos, the ecclesiastical metropolis of India, and is resorted to by pilgrims from all quarters. Benares is crowded with mendicant priests. There are said to be 8,000 houses occupied by Brahmins, who live upon the alms and offerings of the pilgrims. This city is believed by the Hindoos to form no part of the terrestrial globe, but to rest upon the point of Siva's trident; hence, they say, no earthquake can ever affect it.

BERBICE: A colony in British Guiana, about 70 miles east of Georgetown, in which there are several stations of the London Missionary Society.

BEREA: Station of the French Protestants in South Africa, on the Caledon river.

BERHAMPORE: A town in Bengal, situated on the east bank of the Cossimbazar river, about six miles south from Moorshedabad. Population 20,000. It became a station of the London Missionary Society in 1824.

BERHAMPORE: A town in Orissa, in Hindoostan, on the coast of the Bay of Bengal. It is the most southern station of the General Baptists in Orissa.

BERLIN MISSIONARY SOCIETY: An institution was formed at Berlin, in 1800, by members of the Lutheran Church, designed to qualify pious young men for missionaries. The number of students who had been educated there, amounted, in 1825, to 40. The Society has 14 missionaries in South Africa; but it has, in general, assisted other bodies of Christians in the work of evangelizing the heathen, rather than sought to establish missions itself.

BERLIN MISSIONARY UNION FOR CHINA: This society was formed in June, 1850, during a visit of Dr. Gützlaff to Berlin. Dr. F. W. Krummacher was chosen President, and Prof. Lachs, Secretary. The object of the society is to send forth European laborers, male and female, and also to support institutions for the training of native preachers; and it hopes to aid in evangelizing, not only China, but Thibet and the adjacent countries.

BERMUDAS: A numerous cluster of small islands in the Atlantic Ocean, extending about 45 miles from S. W. to N. E., and having their northern point in long. $63^{\circ} 28'$ W., lat. $32^{\circ} 34'$ N. Population 9 or 10,000. The Wesleyan Missionary Society have several stations on these islands. (See West Indies.)

BETHANY: A station of the Berlin Missionary Society in S. Africa.

BETHABARA: A station of the Moravians in Jamaica, W. I.

BETHEL: A station of the Berlin Missionary Society, South Africa.

BETHEL: A station of the Moravians on St. Kitts, W. I.

BETHELSDORP: Station of the London Missionary Society, a settlement of Hottentots in South Africa, 450 miles east of Cape Town, and 7 miles north of Fort Frederick.

BETHESDA: Station of the French Protestants in South Africa, 73 miles N. E. of Cape Town.

BETHESDA: A station of the Moravians on St. Kitts, W. I.

BETHULLA: Station of the French Protestant Society in South Africa, 54 miles S. E. of Philipolis. Inhabitants, 2,500, chiefly Batlapis.

BETTIGHERRY: A station of the German Missionary Society in India.

BETHANY: A station of the Rhenish Missionary Society in Great Namaqualand, South Africa.

BEULAH: A station of the London Missionary Society in the Society Islands.

BEXLEY: A settlement in Western Africa, on the Mechlin river, six miles from the coast, the chief station of the American Baptist Mission.

BEIRUT: The ancient Berytus, a seaport, and the chief town of the Druses. Its streets are narrow and irregular, and the suburbs are nearly as large as the town, consisting of houses interspersed with gardens planted with trees, which give it a beautiful appearance. The environs are laid out in plantations full of fine trees, and a stream descending from Mount Lebanon winds through the country to the sea. The mountains enclose a fine plain filled with mulberry-trees, on which is reared the finest silk in Syria. Population estimated from 12,000 to 20,000. Beirut is the first commercial port of Syria, and is visited by the Turkish and European steamers, and vessels from different parts of the world. The people are divided into different sects, but are principally of the Arab race, and speak the Arabic language. Beirut is the principal station of the American Board in Syria.

BHAGALPUR: A station of the Church Missionary Society, in North India.

BHINGAR: In Hindoostan, two miles east of Ahmednuggur, and was occupied as a station by that mission in 1846. Pop. 4,000.

BIABOU: A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society on the Island of St. Vincent, W. I.

BIBLE SOCIETIES: Origin.—Until the formation of the British and Foreign Bible Society, in 1804, it is believed that there did not exist in the world any society having for its sole object the distribution of the Holy Scriptures without note or comment among the people generally. An association had existed in London for several years, having for its object the supply of the Scriptures to the soldiers and sailors. It was afterwards somewhat remodeled, and called the "Naval and Military Bible Society," but its efforts were directed to a single point, and were somewhat limited even there. A society called the "French Bible Society," was formed in France, in 1792, but its operations were impeded from various causes, and after struggling along for a few years, the society disposed of the Bibles on hand, settled up their accounts, and dissolved in August, 1803. It is not, however, to be supposed that no effort had been put forth to furnish a supply of Bibles for the destitute generally, for the several missionary societies in England and Scotland published large editions of Bibles and Testaments, as well as other religious books, and tracts. One society alone, "The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge," formed in 1698, printed the New Testament in Arabic, the whole Bible in the language of the Isle of Man, and four editions of it in the Welsh language, besides many editions in English. The operations of this society are still increasing. By the efforts of these societies many copies of the Scriptures were put in circulation, while as yet there was no general society to supervise the effort, and carry forward the work with an energy and system becoming its importance. The supply of an edition of the Welsh Bible, for distribution in that principality, seems to have been the moving spring of the establishment of the British and Foreign Bible Society. The Rev. Mr. Charles, a Welsh minister, had urged that something should be done, and at length, the Rev. Joseph Hughes, a dissenting minister, who had traversed the ground, wrote and published an essay, setting forth the importance of the subject, the necessity of speedy and vigorous action, and suggesting the formation of a large national institution. These hints rested with weight in the minds of many benevolent men, a general meeting was invited, and the British and Foreign Bible Society was duly organized on the 7th of March, 1804. Immediately after the formation of the society a correspondence was opened with many friends of the Bible, in all the large cities on the continent of Europe, and in other places more distant, unfolding the views entertained, as well as the plans proposed; urging coöperation either by the formation of distinct societies, or becoming auxiliary, and offering pecuniary aid if needed. It was not long before a response came from Germany. The friends of the cause at the city of Nuremberg assembled and formed a Bible Society on the general principles of the British and Foreign Society, calling it the "Nuremberg Bible Society." In about two years the seat of the society was transferred to Basle, as possessing more facilities for printing and distributing the Scriptures. The Society is now known as the "German Bible Society."

Other places soon followed, and in a few years the great work was fairly under way. In ten years from the formation of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and mainly through their advice and coöperation, 82 large, independent Bible societies had been formed in Europe, several having many auxiliaries of their own; five important branches had been established in Asia, four of them auxiliary to the British Society, viz., Calcutta, Colombo, Bombay and Java, and one, viz., Astrachan, auxiliary to the Russian. Two auxiliary societies had been formed in Africa, viz., one on the isles of Mauritius and Bourbon, and the other at St. Helena. One hundred and twenty-nine Bible societies had been formed on the American continent, exclusive of one at Quebec, and one at Pictou, with the "Nova Scotia Bible Society," established at Halifax, with branches in all the principal towns in that Province. Two auxiliaries to the British Society were formed in the West Indies, viz., one at Jamaica, of colored people, and one at Antigua. The same time that the work was thus advancing in the four great quarters of the globe, no less than 559 societies auxiliary to the great parent society in London, had been formed within the British dominions.

The following table will exhibit the names of the several large independent societies on the continent of Europe, and in Asia and Africa, previous to the formation of the American Bible Society, with the date of their several organizations.

The establishment of the American Bible Society forms a grand era in the Bible operations on the globe. It is believed that the first Bible Society in the United States, was the Philadelphia Bible Society, which was formed in the year 1808, but not very long after this Bible societies were also formed in Connecticut, Massachusetts, Maine, New Hampshire, New York, New Jersey, Virginia, and other southern states, while the active exertions of Messrs. Mills and Schermerhorn, who performed a missionary tour to the south-west and west, in 1814, aided by the Philadelphia, Connecticut, and New York Bible Societies, were instrumental in arousing the churches, and procuring ultimately, the establishment of Bible societies in Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, and Louisiana, comprehending both state and county societies, so that on the establishment of the American Bible Society, in 1816, there existed more than fifty Bible Societies in the United States in active operation, forty-three of which became at once auxiliary to the National Institution.

The subject of forming a national society, had been agitated from year to year, among friends of the Bible cause in various parts of the country, but nothing definite had been effected, until the year 1815, when a plan was sketched by the New Jersey Bible Society, and sent out to the sister societies for concurrence. This plan met with very general favor, and not long after, the managers of the New-York Bible Society expressed their views in a series of resolutions, approving of the plan, and concluding by requesting the Hon. Elias Boudinot, then President of the New Jersey Bible Society, to invite a general meeting to be held in the city of New York on the second Wednesday in May, 1816. This was done, and the meeting was held accordingly, and 61 delegates, from ten different states in the Union, appeared with credentials from between 30 and 40 different local societies; the subjects involved were all carefully examined, and on the second day of meeting, viz. Thursday, May 11th, 1816, a constitution was adopted, and "THE AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY" was duly organized.

From that time to the present, the American

Bible Society has gone steadily onward, enlarging its operations from year to year until its influence has been felt to some extent by almost every nation under heaven. Every State and Territory in the Union has coöperated in the good work, either directly or through societies auxiliary to the national institution, of which, up to May, 1853, there were 1457, with 2500 branches, scattered throughout the United States. For about twenty years, most if not all of the evangelical denominations coöperated harmoniously in the operations of the American Bible Society. At length, in 1835, a disagreement arose between the Baptist denomination and the Managers of the American Bible Society, in relation to the principles on which new versions should be made in foreign languages; and in consequence of the action of the latter, in adopting a resolution to the effect that they "feel at liberty to encourage only such versions as conform in the principles of their translation to the common English version, at least so far as that all the religious denominations, represented in this Society, can consistently use and circulate said versions in their several schools and communities," the principal part of the Baptist denomination in the United States withdrew from the Am. B. S., and in 1837, they formed the American and Foreign Bible Society; a provisional organization, under the same name, having been formed in New York the year before. This Society now has about 850 auxiliaries. But a portion of those who left the American Bible Society, on this occasion, were desirous of making an entire revision of the English version. This produced a division in the American and Foreign Bible Society, which led to the formation of the American Bible Union in 1850.

We have sketched the history of the British and Foreign Bible Society on the foregoing pages, from its formation in 1804 to the formation of the American Society in 1816. Its progress for the thirty-seven years which have transpired since that time has been, in a most emphatic sense, upward and onward. From a handful of men at the beginning, not more than could sit around a table, it has become a Samson in strength, stretching its giant arms, laden with blessings, to the utmost limits of the world. The Bible Societies in continental Europe, as well as in Asia and Africa, have experienced many changes in the last thirty-seven years. Some which were then formed have ceased to exist, and many others have been organized, and at the present time Bible societies are found in successful operation in every European nation, as well as in many important places in Asia, on the African coast, and in many isles of the sea. It might be difficult to name them all, were we to attempt the task, but we are safe in the assertion that as many as one hundred independent societies are now in operation, exclusive of many hundreds of auxiliaries and branches which are clustering around them. Such is a very brief sketch of the origin and progress of Bible societies to the present time. We turn now to trace the Results.—Very great and encouraging results may be stated here in very few words. The British and Foreign Bible Society celebrated a jubilee on the 8th of March, 1853, on entering the fiftieth year of their existence, and then reported that the society had issued Bibles and Testaments to the number of 25,402,309 copies, and had expended in that work four millions of pounds sterling, about twenty millions of dollars. The number of languages and dialects in which it had printed and circulated the Scriptures was 148. The number of its auxiliaries direct, was 4,257.

The American Bible Society, from its institution, in 1816, up to May 1, 1853, a period of thirty-seven years, has put into circulation, 9,088,352 copies of the Scriptures, in many different languages, raising from various sources about four and a half millions of dollars, at least $400,000 of which has been expended to aid in furnishing the Scriptures for distribution among the heathen.

In addition to what has been accomplished by these two great national institutions, with their host of auxiliaries, the Bible societies in continental Europe, in Asia, and in Africa, have published and circulated some five or six millions of copies of the Holy Scriptures, in the various languages spoken there; while the American and Foreign Bible Society, during the sixteen years of its existence, has put into circulation more than half a million of copies of the Scriptures, in 35 different languages, and as many more in English, and expended more than half a million of dollars, nearly 265,000 of which was expended in the foreign work. The aggregate of all these operations is the publication and circulation of nearly 50,000,000 copies of the Holy Scriptures, in almost all the languages spoken upon earth, and the expenditure in this important work of at least thirty millions of dollars. Such are the great results of the operations of Bible societies in the last fifty years. These results encourage the hope that the time promised is at hand, when the gospel shall blossom and bud, and fill the face of the world with fruit. For the details of this subject, the reader is referred to the Annual Reports of the Brit. and Foreign Bib. Soc.; Owen's History of the first ten years of that society; the Annual Reports of the Am. Bib. Soc.; and the *Annual Reports of the Am. and For. Bib. BIMBIA: A station of the English Baptists at Old Calabar, West Africa.

BINTENNE: A station of the Wesleyans on an island on the east coast of Ceylon.

BIRKLANDS: Station of the London Missionary Society, in South Africa, containing a large population of Kaffres.

BLACK TOWN: The fortified and most populous portion of the city of Madras, on the eastern coast of Hindoostan. It was occupied as a station of the Am. Board, in 1849.

BLINKWATER: A station of the London Missionary Society, on the Buffalo river, in South Africa.

BLUEFIELDS: A station of the Gospel Propagation Society, in Jamaica, W. I.

BLYENDAAL: A station of the London Missionary Society, in Berbice.

BOMBAY: A city on the west coast of India, occupying an island of the same name, 8 miles in length N. to S., and 2 or 3 in width. The population, as reported in 1851, is 556,000. Of these, 297,000 are Hindoos, speaking the Mahratta and Gujathe languages, and 124,000 are Mohammedans. The rest are Parsees, Jains, &c. The Mohammedans generally speak Hindostanee. The Parsees of Bombay are about 100,000 in number, while the Jains number only a few thousands. The Roman Catholics are numerous. Bombay, next to Madras, is the oldest of the British possessions in India, and commands the whole trade of the north-west coast, and of the Persian Gulf. The Am. Board commenced its mission here in 1812.

BOOK AND TRACT SOCIETIES: The Bible itself is a series of inspired tracts, gathered into a sacred volume. Wickliff was the author of more than one hundred volumes against Popery, besides commentaries on the Scriptures, and numerous tracts, which were extensively read, notwithstanding they were ordered to be burned. Some of his tracts, borne to Bohemia by an Oxford student in 1389, sowed the seeds of truth in the heart of John Huss, whose writings in turn were blessed to Martin Luther, who was the author of 740 tracts and books, which bore no inconsiderable part in the Great Reformation. The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge was formed in England in 1701, partly "to disperse both at home and abroad, Bibles and tracts of religion." In 1750, was formed the first institution of a catholic character, of which there is any notice—"The Society for Promoting Religious Knowledge among the Poor," and its works were extensively useful. In 1756, similar institutions were formed in Edinburgh and Glasgow. Near the close of the last century, the deluge of infidel publications, the offspring of the French Revolution, prompted Mrs. Hannah More to prepare a series of tracts, entitled "The Cheap Repository Tracts," which had an immense and useful circulation. More than 2,000,000 copies were scattered abroad. The demonstration of the power of a cheap, popular religious literature, in the success of Mrs. More's efforts, and the benevolent zeal of the Rev. George Burder, led to the formation of

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY, LONDON, in 1799; which may be regarded, perhaps, as the parent of the numerous and respectable progeny of tract societies throughout the world. The object of their organization was to publish and circulate evangelical truth, in simple, unsectarian forms. The committee was composed of equal numbers of churchmen and dissenters; and their first address declares that its publications shall contain "nothing of the shibboleth of sect; nothing to recommend one denomination, or to throw odium on another; nothing of the acrimony of contending parties against those that differ from them; but pure good-natured Christianity, in which all the followers of the Lamb, who are looking for the mercy of the Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life, can unite with pleasure, as in one great common cause. Nor should any worldly scheme be interwoven with the truth, or attempted to be concealed under its folds. Here should not be seen the slightest vestige of any carnal end, in any form or for any purpose, however laudable some may think it; nothing but divine truth, unmingled, unadulterated, and pure as it came from heaven, fit for the whole human race to imbibe."

The site occupied by the Society's edifice in London is one of the most interesting in historical association to be found in the metropolis. It adjoins St. Paul's church-yard, where Wickliff met his persecutors, and Tyndale's Testaments and Luther's writings were committed to the flames, and where martyrs suffered for the truth. It is a befitting spot for the multiplication of those gospel writings which symbolize the revived power and ultimate triumph over all error and opposition, of the Gospel itself, in all lands.

The publications of the "Religious Tract Society" are about 5,000 in number, and are so varied in character, style and language, as to meet the wants of all classes. Besides a valuable series of tracts and children's tracts, several hundred books for the young, a rich variety of standard, practical treatises, and many helps to the study of the Scriptures, the Society issues four or five periodicals for young and old, with a wide and useful circulation. Of "The Leisure Hour," about 80,000 are circulated; of the "Sunday at Home," about 45,000; and of the "Child's Companion" about 40,000.

The total circulation of the London Society's publications exceeds six hundred millions of copies. Its total annual receipts are about £70,000 or about $350,000, including £8,000 or £10,000 in donations. Its total receipts for the first fifty years were, in donations £152,552, and for sales £1,023,215 = £1,202,242, or about $6,000,000. Its gratuitous issues and grants of money, paper, engravings, &c., for the foreign Christian press in fifty years, amounted to £155,372, or about $750,000.

The fruits of these stupendous operations are found in every part of the world, and many have been garnered for the great day. A fact of pleasing interest in the early history of this society must conclude our condensed sketch. Scarcely were its own foundations laid, and its special work commenced, before its founders and early managers were providentially led to consider the necessity of a kindred society for the circulation of the Holy Scriptures. The secretary and committee of the Tract Society became the founders of the British and Foreign Bible Society in 1804, and the Rev. John Hughes, secretary of the former, became the first secretary of the latter. Thus were linked together by parental and filial ties two of the most influential and useful of the benevolent institutions of the world.

THE AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY was formed in New York, May 11, 1825, and has become the largest institution of its class in the world. A brief sketch of its history befits these pages. Soon after the organization of the Religious Tract Society, London, the Massachusetts Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, commenced in 1803 the publication of tracts and books. The Connecticut Tract Society, Rev. Dr. Dwight, president, and Jeremiah Evarts, secretary, was formed in 1807, and other kindred institutions came into being. The tracts of Hannah More found their way to Boston, and reached the youthful members of a commercial firm, by whom they were highly prized. They caused several numbers to be reprinted, and were in the habit of accompanying the packages of goods sent from their store to various parts of the country, with some of these tracts. During long and useful lives, Homes and Homer continued the active friends of the Society which owed its origin in a considerable degree to their influence. In 1814 the New England (afterwards the American) Tract Society, was formed at Boston—a suggestion at a meeting of half a dozen Christian friends having led to the contribution of sums for printing several tracts, and after a few months of deliberation and experiment, to the organization of a society which put in circulation about 4,250,000 of publications in the ten succeeding years. Other societies, catholic or denominational, were formed in various parts of the United States, and the total circulation previous to 1825, reached about 10,000,000 copies.

In 1824, a correspondence commenced between the New York Religious Tract Society and the American Tract Society at Boston, which resulted in a public meeting held in the city of New York, March 11, 1825, at which the plan of a national tract society was adopted, to be submitted to the principal tract societies; and a subscription for the erection of a tract-house was commenced with $5,000 by Mr. Arthur Tappan, $3,000 by Mr. Moses Allen, and $1,000 each by W. W. Chester and Richard T. Haines, which were afterwards increased to more than $25,000 by donors in New York city. A convention of delegates from various tract societies assembled in New York, May 10, 1825, the Rev. Dr. Milnor, chairman; the constitution was approved, and, on the succeeding day the organization was effected, and the corner stone of the tract-house laid with solemn religious services; S. V. S. Wilder, Esq., president; Rev. Wm. A. Hallock, secretary; Moses Allen, Esq., treasurer; Rev. Drs. Milnor, Spring, Knox and Edwards, and Rev. Messrs. Sommers and Summerfield, Publishing Committee. It was near the close of this meeting that the lamented Summerfield made his last public address, in which he said, "In all the anniversaries I have ever attended, in Europe or America, I have never been so conscious of the presence of the Holy Spirit and Christian love pervading every heart. Again and again I could not refrain from weeping. The very atmosphere we breathe is the atmosphere of heaven; one in which angels come down to inhale, and in which God himself delights to dwell." Of the institution so auspiciously formed, the American Tract Society at Boston, became a branch, transferring its stereotype plates, and rendering the most efficient coöperation to the present time. Other catholic societies also became auxiliaries of the new institution.

"The basis of union" was declared in the first address of the Executive Committee to the Christian public to be the following great doctrines of the Gospel, in which evangelical believers are agreed: "Man's native sinfulness; the purity and obligation of the law of God; the true and proper divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ; the necessity and reality of his atonement and sacrifice; the efficiency of the Holy Spirit in the work of renovation; the free and full offers of the Gospel, and the duty of men to accept it; the necessity of personal holiness; and an everlasting state of rewards and punishments beyond the grave."

Besides the preparation of a series of tracts and children's tracts for domestic circulation, the claims of the Christian press in Pagan lands were recognised from the outset, and appropriations were made for this object in the second and third years, as in all the subsequent years of its history. The principles governing foreign grants were drawn up by Jeremiah Evarts, Esq., then the far-sighted Secretary of the A. B. C. F. M. How extensive and useful this coöperation with the missionary work has been, will appear hereafter.

Volume Enterprise.—In the third year, the Society commenced the Volume Enterprise, by stereotyping Doddridge's Rise and Progress, at the expense of benevolent friends, followed by Baxter's Saint's Rest, and Call to the Unconverted, Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, and other practical works. The Rev. Dr. Plumer, of Virginia, prompted an enterprise for supplying the southern Atlantic States with these volumes, which was extended to other states. Agents were raised up who visited congregations in various parts of the country to promote the circulation of good books by the aid of voluntary distributors; and the foundations were laid for the employment of the standard religious press as a means of popular evangelization. The various "Boards of Publication," and the unprecedented activity of religious book-publishing, may be traced, in a good degree, to the prosperity and success of the "Volume Enterprise."

Systematic Distribution of Tracts.—In the fourth year attention was directed to systematic tract visitation, or the employment of faithful personal effort for the salvation of individual souls, in connection with the systematic distribution of religious tracts. Harlan Page, then the Society's depository, enlisted his energies in this work, and furnished an illustration of the efficiency of the principle underlying this system of doing good. Numerous auxiliary societies were formed, especially in our great cities and larger towns, which still persevere in the tract-mission work, and are widely useful to the neglected classes of the population. The New York City Tract Society employs 26 missionaries, including three for German and other emigrants, and one for seamen, who have associated with them 1,110 visitors, and distribute annually about 1,500,000 tracts. The results are most cheering, as appears from the following statistics for 1853: Tracts distributed in English and other languages, 1,579,756, embracing 6,319,030 pages; Bibles and Testaments supplied to the destitute, 2,434; volumes lent from ward libraries, 5,416; children gathered into Sabbath-schools, 2,247; into public schools, 284; into Bible classes, 121; into church, 1,602; temperance pledges obtained, 562; district prayer-meetings held, 1,483; backsliders reclaimed, 32; persons reported as hopefully converted, 173; converts united in the evangelical churches, 154.

Colportage.—In May, 1841, the system of Colportage commenced. The Volume Enterprise had not reached the destitute classes, and tract visitation had been restricted mainly to large cities and towns. The combination of the elements of both enterprises, systematically applied to the destitute, constituted the basis of the new movement; and competent agencies for directing and superintending the labors of colporteurs had been providentially trained in the Volume Enterprise. The annual report for 1841 presented a view of the destitutions of the country. The secretary for this department, (Mr. Cook,) immediately after the anniversary at New York, addressed the annual meeting of the Society at Boston, and made an appeal for men and funds to begin the colporteur enterprise; he has been the author of all the public documents and appeals relating to it. From the four or five candidates who presented themselves the next morning, two were selected and commissioned; Mr. Asa Prescott, now a pastor in Illinois, who went to a destitute part of Indiana; and Rev. P. Follansbee, who labored with great acceptance for four years in Kentucky, and then entered on his gracious reward. They were the first American colporteurs. The number increased from 11 in 1841, to 508 in 1850, and 619 in 1854, for the whole or part of the year.

In the summer of 1842, one of the secretaries made an official extended tour at the West, and became familiar with the condition and wants of the German emigrant population. His representations led to the successful application of colportage to the various classes of emigrants, Germans, French, Irish, Welsh, Dutch, Norwegian, and Spanish, both Protestant and Papal. An average of about 100 colporteurs are employed among them; and perhaps no feature of the Society's work is more important and hopeful than this. Some of the most cheering records of modern evangelization may be found among the reports of the German and Norwegian colporteurs. The first German colporteur in this country was Leger Ritty, a converted Roman Catholic.

The plan pursued in the prosecution of colportage is as follows; the qualifications of the colporteur having been investigated and a commission issued, he is supplied with the publications of the Society and proceeds to his prescribed field, ordinarily one or two counties. He goes from house to house, selling his books when practicable, but supplying the families of the poor and the erring gratuitously, accompanying his visits with personal religious conversation and prayer; holding prayer-meetings, delivering public addresses, forming Sabbath-schools, promoting temperance, and advancing the kingdom of the Redeemer in all appropriate ways. Monthly reports of his labors are made to the Superintendent of colportage, and quarterly reports both to the Superintendent and to the Committee. Superintending agencies are established at important commercial centres, with depositories, as at Rochester, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Richmond, New Orleans, Mobile, St. Louis, Cincinnati, Chicago, &c., with experienced agents, having each the oversight of 30, 50, or 100 colporteurs. Minute attention is thus given to the wants, character and labors of this self-denying band of Christian men. They also have the oversight of the Society's general agents, as they traverse their fields, and come in contact with the colporteurs, and of the executive officers, who occasionally convene them, and spend several days in intercourse with them. It is much due, under God, to these precautions that the system has thus far worked without friction or disappointment.

Among the three thousand different persons enlisted in this cause, since the enterprise began, more than 1000 have been connected with about 50 different colleges, universities and theological seminaries, of about 20 different denominations, engaged in a course of training for the gospel ministry. And besides accomplishing untold good to others, their discipline has been of much benefit to themselves, in preparing them for the practical duties of pastoral life. Many who are usefully employed in the sacred office in this or other lands will unite in the testimony recently borne by the first American colporteur: "Among all the means of preparation which the Lord has spent upon me, I look upon my colporteur labors as holding an important, if not the most important place, except the agency of the Holy Spirit."

The statistics of colportage furnish an impressive illustration of its practical efficiency and usefulness. In the first 13 years of the enterprise, no less than 3,820,101 families have been visited, with 1,887,225 of whom the colporteurs had religious conversation or prayer, generally both. The number of religious books sold to these households was 3,900,739; and the number granted to the destitute was 1,068,662, of the pecuniary value of $178,000. The aggregate circulation of books by the Society during these thirteen years was 7,875,224. The moral and religious condition of the families reached by colportage may be inferred from the fact that 483,135 of them habitually neglected evangelical worship; 541,397 were destitute of all religious books except the Bible, and 235,002 had not a copy of the Holy Scriptures. The number of Roman Catholic families, or other errorists, was 365,166. The number of prayer-meetings held or public meetings addressed was 100,169. These statistics embrace the emigrant population, and relate to all the States and Territories in the Union. They are worthy of attention and study on the part of Christian philanthropists.

The bearings of such a wide-spread system of evangelical effort, among our unevangelized population, cannot but be the most happy, on all interests, civil, social and religious. As a practical demonstration of evangelical unity; as an illustration of the power of the Christian press, and a restraint and corrective for the ills of a corrupt literature; as a means of awakening the spirit of active piety; as an agency for exploring and revealing our moral wastes, and dispensing the means of grace among the scattered households in our new settlements, as well as among the neglected abodes of crowded cities; as a well-adapted agency for reaching the emigrant classes, who crowd our shores; as an instrumentality for imparting the truth in love to papists, infidels and others who come not to the evangelical sanctuary, and are not otherwise blessed with saving truth; as the handmaid of the Sabbath-School and temperance and Bible and Sabbath observance enterprises; as a cementing influence, in Church and State; and above all as a heaven-blessed means of edifying the body of Christ, converting souls and promoting the revival of God's work among men, Colportage has demonstrated its claim to the regard of those who love their country, and especially of those who love the Redeemer's Kingdom.

Foreign Distribution.—The enterprises of the American Tract Society in foreign and pagan lands, have been carried forward steadily, almost from its foundation. Limiting its appropriations to the preparation and circulation of publications accordant with its principles, and aiming to meet the wants of the missions and societies especially of American origin, in all parts of the world, it has come to be identified with almost every plan for furnishing the nations with a Christian literature. The following schedule of the appropriations in money, amounting to $423,794, aside from the grants of publications, engravings, &c., up to 1854, will show how wide is the sphere of its operations in this department. There have been remitted in cash to the Sandwich Islands $25,300; Java, Borneo and Malacca, $800; China, the various missions, $49,150; Siam, $20,300; Assam, $3,900; Burmah and Karens, $32,600; Northern India, $37,500; Calcutta, $800; Orissa, $10,250; Telooogoos, $2,600; Madras, $19,750; Madura, $7,750; Ceylon, $32,300; Bombay, $14,198; Ahmednuggur, &c., $2,901; Africa, $4,200; Nestorians, $4,500; Syria, $5,750; Turkey, $35,930; Greece, $21,200; Italy, $2,800; Russia and Poland $22,900; Sweden, $2,200; Denmark, $1,400; Berlin, $2,800; Hamburg, $19,200; Bremen, Barmen, Calw and Hungary, $4,550; Basle, $1,500; Belgium and Holland, $2,650; Societies in France, $23,020; Spain, $1,400; Moravian missions, $3,000; Indian missions, $3,144: add grants for the blind, $1,500—total, $423,794.

The number of books and tracts approved for distribution in foreign lands is 2,885, including 282 volumes; and the Society and the institutions it aids, have issued publications in one hundred and nineteen languages and dialects, as follows:

Seneca, Mohawk, Delaware, Ojibwa, Otoe, or Iowa, Wea, Putawatomie, Shawanoe, Kansas, Osage, Ottawa, Abenakis, Sioux, or Dakota, Pawnee, Creek, Choctaw, Cherokee, Nez Perces, Creole, or Negro-German, Negro-English, English, Welsh, Irish, French, Low Breton, Flemish, Spanish, Portuguese, Italian, Dutch, German, Romanese, Lithuanian, Bohemian, Hungarian or Magyar, Slavonian, Upper Wendish, Nether Wendish, Vandalian, Servian, Wallachian, Croatian, Danish, Norwegian, Icelandic, Greenlandish, Esquimaux, Swedish, Polish, Judeo-Polish, Finnish, Lapish, Russ, Rival-Estonian, Dorpat-Estonian, Mongolian, Lettish, Tartar-Turkish, Thibetan, Bulgarian, Armenian, Armeno-Turkish, Hebrew, Hebrew-German, Hebrew-Spanish, Modern Greek, Greco-Turkish, Arabic, Syriac, Nestorian, Persian, Grebo, Mpongwe, Bakali, Bassa, Kaffre, Zula, Sessuto, Wanika, Kinika, Timneh, Mahratta, Goojuratee, Latin, Tamul, Cinguliese, Telooogo, Oriya, Bengali, Canarese, Malayalim, Tulu, Hindui, or Dev Nagare, Hindoostani, or Urdu, Panjabi, or Gurmukhi, Cashmire, Burman, Peguan, Salong, Sgau Karen, Sho Karen, Kemmee, Siamese, Assamese, Tai, or Khamti, Singpho, Naga, Chinese, Japanese, Malay, Bugis, Javanese, Lettinese, Dyak, Hawaiian, Marquesas, Feejee. Total, 119.

One or two illustrations of the usefulness of tract distribution abroad, from the countless instances in the records of this branch of benevolence, must suffice. The Rev. Dr. Duff, the eminent Scotch missionary from India, stated at the last anniversary of the American Tract Society, that a missionary visited the west of Bengal, and found that several years before his visit, a tract called the "Ten Commandments" had fallen into the hands of a Hindoo devotee. The devotee had died unaffected, but the good seed had come in contact with the soil of honest hearts, and did a noble work. Very soon one hundred souls were baptized, all the fruit of that single tract.

The present amazing revolution in China, threatening the existence of the Tartar dynasty and the overthrow of idolatry in that vast Empire, may be traced, in the wonder-working Providence of God, to the influence of a Chinese tract, which fell into the hands of Tae-Ping-Wang, the insurgent chief, in 1834. Leang-Afa, the faithful native preacher, was the author of "Good Words to admonish the Age," copies of which he distributed among the literati during the examinations at Canton, in 1833-4, suffering persecution for his zeal. The head of the present movement was among the literati, and gained his first knowledge of the Christian scheme from the tract thus placed in his hand. Ten years later "he is found traveling through Kwangsi, preaching the new doctrine;" and in 1846, receiving the instructions of the American missionary. As the insurgent army, of which he is the leader, advances in its progress toward the capital of the Empire, 400 printers are employed in multiplying copies of the Pentateuch and the Gospel of Matthew, Gutzlaff's version, so numbered as to indicate the purpose of printing the sacred volume entire; and one account represents the forces of the chief, as "an army of colporteurs," scattering publications more or less pure in their religious tenets, among the provinces they traverse. They are described by a missionary as follows: "These tracts show a very correct knowledge of all the most important points of Christian doctrine, and were prepared and printed by the insurgents themselves. One of them contains a summary of the Ten Commandments, each commandment being accompanied by a brief explanation and a verse of a hymn. Forms of prayer are also given, one of which contains several of the petitions of the Lord's Prayer. Prayer is offered for the influences of the Holy Spirit to change the corrupt heart, and for the intercession of Jesus Christ as Mediator. The observance of the Sabbath is enjoined, as also morning and evening worship, and giving of thanks at meals. These precepts, it is believed, are strictly observed by the whole army. Theft and opium-smoking are both capital offences."

Whatever may be the issue of this remarkable movement, and how much soever of superstition may be mingled in the religious elements of the insurrection, it is an impressive illustration of the power of the Christian press, and a demonstration of the efficiency of the humblest means when employed by the Providence and Spirit of God for the accomplishment of vast results.

Religious Periodicals.—Besides the enterprises thus noticed, the Tract Society has become one of the most extensive publishers of Religious Periodicals in the world. In 1843 the "American Messenger," a monthly newspaper of a highly evangelical, practical character, was commenced, and it has advanced in circulation from year to year, till it has reached the immense number of 204,000 copies monthly, or about two and a half million copies in a year. The "Amerikanischer Botschafter," (American Messenger in German) was issued in 1847, and has gained a circulation (about 25,000 monthly) greater than any religious periodical in that language. "The Child's Paper," a beautifully illustrated newspaper for the young, began Jan. 1852, and already reaches more families than were supplied with juvenile papers of all classes, at the time it was issued; while most others have since improved in character and in circulation. The number printed monthly is not far from 300,000 copies, requiring the time of a power-press forty-six days for each monthly issue, printing two papers each stroke of the press. A demand has arisen for the "Child's Paper" in Great Britain, and several thousand copies are sent monthly to Edinburgh, Scotland. Since these enterprises commenced, there have been printed of the American Messenger, 16,125,600 copies; of the Botschafter, 1,366,000; and of the Child's Paper, 6,611,000; total, 24,102,600.

Publications.—The publications of the society printed in this country, now number about 2,000, including more than 400 books. Of these 65 volumes and 186 tracts and children's tracts are in the German language; 21 books and 102 tracts in the French; 13 books and 65 tracts in the Spanish; 22 books and tracts in the Portuguese; 16 in the Italian; 35 in the Welsh; 27 in the Dutch; 44 in the Danish; 28 in the Swedish; and 4 in the Hungarian; the remainder being in English. They embrace as rich and varied a collection of standard works in practical theology as exists in any language. The style of printing and illustration in which they are issued does credit to American art. In cheapness they are believed to be unrivaled. The circulation of some of the tracts has exceeded half a million copies; and of particular volumes, 200,000 or 300,000. Baxter's Call has had a circulation of 400,000 copies; the Pictorial Tract Primer, 300,000; and D'Aubigné's History of the Reformation, 82,000, sets of 4 or 5 volumes. The aggregate circulation of tracts has been about 140,000,000, and of volumes about 10,000,000, embracing 15,000 libraries; making a total, including 24,102,600 copies of periodicals, of about ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-FIVE MILLIONS OF PUBLICATIONS. If to this be added the publications distributed in foreign lands by the society's friends, estimated to average 20 pages each, 21,115,200 copies, it will make a grand total of about TWO HUNDRED MILLIONS OF PUBLICATIONS, or an average of more than one for each family of the human race.

Tract House.—The Tract Society's House is a spacious edifice near the City Hall, New-York, about 80 feet on Nassau street, and 100 feet on Spruce street, and is five stories high in front and six stories in the rear, with a central court for light and air. It was built in 1825 on the site previously occupied by a small tavern or grocery, and rebuilt in 1846 to provide for new machinery, and to meet the increasing necessities of the Society's business. Its fifty apartments are heated throughout by steam. Besides the two stores and offices now rented to others, it furnishes accommodations for nearly thirty printing and hydraulic presses, propelled by steam, and for nearly 300 persons engaged in the executive, commercial and manufacturing departments of the Society's service. A debt of about $40,000 still incumbers the estate of the Society. The first building was the scene of the extensive revivals of religion, connected with the labors of Harlan Page; and a daily prayer-meeting of the employees in the Tract House, now hallows all its influences for good. The meetings of every committee are uniformly opened with prayer.

Executive Officers of the American Tract Society.—Hon. Thomas S. Williams, President; Rev. Wm. A. Hallock, D.D., Rev. O. Eastman and Rev. R. S. Cook, Corresponding Secretaries; Rev. Charles G. Sommers, Recording Secretary, O. R. Kingsbury, Assistant Secretary; Moses Allen, Esq. Treasurer and Isaac W. Brinckerhoff, Depositary.

THE PRESBYTERIAN BOARD OF PUBLICATION was organized by the General Assembly in 1840. Its great design was to cooperate with the Christian ministry in publishing divine truth. One of the specific objects of the Board is, to counteract the influence of licentious literature. Another is, "to furnish a thoroughly sound Calvinistic literature." It does not, however, attempt to furnish exclusively doctrinal works, but also such as are practical and devotional. A large portion of its issues are of the latter description, and such as may be read without offence by all evangelical denominations.

Publishing Department.—During the year ending March 31, 1854, the Board have published 16 new books, of which is in the German language. Of these books, there have been printed 38,250 copies. They have also added to their Catalogue 9 tracts in 12mo, and 1 in 18mo, of which have been printed 26,000 copies. They have also printed 25,000 copies of the Presbyterian Family Almanac. Total copies of new books and tracts, 89,250. The reprints of former publications during the year, amount to 506,500 copies. Total amount of copies published during the year, 595,750. The aggregate number of volumes published by the Board, from their organization in 1840, to March 31, 1853, has amounted to 2,020,450. The aggregate number of tracts published during the same period has amounted to 2,131,450.

The total number of volumes and tracts published by the Board, from 1840, to March 31, 1853, has amounted to 4,151,900.

Besides this, the Board printed and circulated, the last year, 15,000 copies of the Home and Foreign Record, and of the Sabbath-School Visitor, 41,000.

Receipts.—The receipts of the past year have been, for books and tracts sold, $77,648; donations for salaries and expenses of colporteurs, $15,866; for Sabbath-School Visitor, $6,111; for distribution of books and tracts, $1,413; for stereotyping certain books, $1,175. The aggregate amount of sales, from the 1st of April, 1841, to April 1, 1853, is $466,573 75. The aggregate receipts for colportage, from April 1, 1847, to April 1, 1853, have amounted to $47,677 10. The aggregate receipts for distribution, from April 1, 1848, to April 1, 1853, have amounted to $6,085 19. Total amount of receipts for colportage and distribution, during the periods above mentioned, being $53,762 29. The total increase of receipts from all sources, the year past, amounts to $12,052 35, which is nearly 14 per cent. compared with the receipts of 1844. It appears that the income of the Board has been trebled in ten years, and, indeed, compared with that of 1848, the year in which the colporteur enterprise commenced, the increase has been nearly as great, presenting $103,544 46, instead of $38,213 92, or $65,330 54 increase.

The Colporteur Enterprise.—"This branch of service is every year increasing in interest, and opening before the Church most pleasing prospects of great and permanently beneficial results." The following summary will show what has been done the past year:

1. Whole number of Colporteurs, 151; of whom one was in India, six in the British Provinces, three in Maine, two in New Hampshire, twenty-two in New York, four in New Jersey, sixteen in Pennsylvania, one in Maryland, two in Virginia, twelve in North Carolina, six in South Carolina, fifteen in Georgia, two in Florida, one in Alabama, one in Mississippi, one in Louisiana, five in Texas, one in Arkansas, two in Kentucky, one in Michigan, six in Tennessee, nine in Ohio, three in Iowa, fourteen in Indiana, ten in Illinois, four in Missouri, and one in Wisconsin; or 144 distributed in 25 States of the Union.

2. Distribution of Books.—Sales 91,885 volumes. Gifts, 9,581 volumes. To which add 28,000 volumes distributed by the Synods of Pittsburgh (23,000) and Virginia (5,000), and 6,517 included in the report of donations; the total is 135,983 volumes.

Distribution of Tracts.—By the colporteurs, 871,547 pages; by the Synods of Pittsburgh (25,000) and Virginia (23,000)—48,000, and included in the report of donations 381,000; making a total of 1,300,547 pages.

4. Families visited, 65,734; and 2,451 in Synod of Pittsburgh; total, 68,185.

5. Presbyterian families without the Confession of Faith, 2,340.

6. Families without any religious book except the Bible, 1,603.

7. Time spent by colporteurs, 41 years and a few days.

Of the practical results of this enterprise, the Board say, in their report:—"By the testimonies of clergymen of our own and other churches, as well as those of colporteurs, and by the opinions of others, well qualified to judge, we are satisfied that the books of this Board are exerting a most potent and salutary influence on the religious character of our nation. This is done, as well by a positive effect in informing men's minds and moving their hearts, as by the indirect, but no less valuable operation of converting wrong tastes and moulding religious thinking to some definite shape. The historical, biographical, and practical works are extending and deepening the impressions of a common Christianity and a common Protestantism, and aiding other influences in fixing upon the hearts of our people the great principle, that the Christianity of the Bible is the strong defence, as it is the true source, of our civil and religious liberty. Of actual conversions through the instrumentality of books and tracts, our colporteurs relate numerous pleasing accounts."

Gratuitous Distribution.—The Board have made donations of books and tracts the past year, exclusive of those given away by colporteurs, to the amount of $2,358, viz.: to Sabbath-schools, 2,535 volumes; to naval and military stations and ships-of-war, 142; to humane institutions, 60; to literary and theological institutions, 226; to ministers, 850; to feeble churches, 1376; to individuals for gratuitous distribution, 1328; total volumes, 6,517, and 381,032 pages of tracts; 9,581 vols. and 871,547 pages of tracts have been given away by colporteurs.

The aggregate number of volumes given away, independent of the donations made by colporteurs, from 1847, when the Board commenced making donations, to 1854, is 32,285. The aggregate number of pages of tracts given away during the same period, is 1,467,300.

THE "METHODIST BOOK CONCERN," New York, is the extensive and enterprising publishing agency of the Methodist Episcopal Church, North. By a recent decision of the Courts a pro rata portion of its accumulated funds have been or are to be paid over to the Methodist Church, South; and the latter organization formed an establishment in 1854, for publishing at the South. From the imperfect data available, we can only give the facts of 1853-4, as follows: the number of volumes of general catalogue books printed, 680,500; number of Sunday-school books, 1,128,000; number of tract books, 110,000, making the issues of a single year, of larger or smaller books, not far from 2,000,000. The "Sunday-School Advocate," has a circulation of about 115,000, semi-monthly. The "Missionary Advocate" has a monthly circulation of 50,000. The Christian Advocate and Journal, weekly, a circulation of 33,000. The statistics of the "Concern" at Cincinnati, O., are not included, for the most part, in the above.

THE AMERICAN BAPTIST PUBLICATION SOCIETY was formed in 1824. Its publications, denominational and general, now number 456, of which 208 are volumes. Of the tracts, 218 are in English, 15 in German and 3 in French. The receipts for 1853-4 were $49,612, of which $35,218 were for sales of publications. The number of colporteurs employed was 62, including 13 students for short periods, who sold 18,866 books; granted 609 books and 236,308 pages of tracts; visited 32,690 families and 3,758 vessels and canal boats; held 1,081 meetings; preached 1,558 sermons, and organized 10 churches, and 7 Sunday-schools. The Society has a building fund of $25,000.

CONGREGATIONAL BOARD OF PUBLICATION.—The Doctrinal Tract Society was formed in 1829. For about 20 years its operations were confined to the publication of Doctrinal Tracts, setting forth and defending the doctrinal views, which have from the beginning, distinguished the leading divines among the orthodox Congregationalists of New England. In 1850, its constitution was revised, so as to embrace the publication of books; Rev. Sew all Harding, was appointed Secretary and General Agent; and an act of incorporation was obtained. The object of the Society is thus stated in the second article of its constitution:

"It is the object of this Society to procure and circulate such tracts and books, as are adapted to explain, prove, vindicate and illustrate the peculiar and essential doctrines of the gospel, and to discriminate between genuine and spurious religious affections and experience."

In their report for 1852, the Executive Committee say: "In pursuance of this object, the Society first published a series of tracts, forty-five in number, on important subjects of Christian doctrine and practice. More recently they have given their attention to the publication of books; and they design to make this Society, for the Congregational churches of our land, what the Presbyterian Board of Publication is for the Presbyterian churches. And it might be appropriately called, as it is in fact, the Congregational Board of Publication. We have commenced the work of publishing the writings of the most distinguished New England theologians; and we hope to be able to continue this, until we have issued editions of the works of that class of men, so distinguished for their theological acumen, and whose writings and labors have been so highly appreciated, and so signally blessed, in the formation and prosperity of our religious character and institutions."

GENERAL INCREASE OF RELIGIOUS BOOKS.—

The foregoing statements show the most gratifying results of the Christian press, in furnishing to the masses a truly Christian literature. But vast and beyond calculation as they appear, they by no means present a complete view of the immense diffusion of religious truth, by this instrumentality, for the last half century. The improvements in the art of printing, the more general diffusion of wealth, the enterprise of Christian societies, and the progress of religion, have greatly stimulated the production and circulation of books, and especially good books. In England, a century ago, the sales of books and periodicals amounted to less than $500,000 per annum. Now, they exceed $10,500,000. In 1471, Sweynheim and Pannartz, printers at Rome, whose entire stock of books was 12,000 volumes, tell the Pope, in a petition, "You will admire how and where we could procure a sufficient quantity of paper, or even rags, for such a number of volumes," which 1,000 reams of paper would have produced! Isaiah Thomas, in his History of the Art of Printing, says, "The paper manufactured and used for book printing (in 1810) may be calculated at about 70,000 reams, (probably equal in weight and size to 30,000 reams of the style now used,) a considerable part of which is used for spelling and other small school-books. The price, at $3 50 a ream, amounts to $245,000, and it may weigh about 630 tons." Such was the book-trade in this country less than forty years ago. In 1848, the sum of $142,122 was paid for paper alone by the American Bible, Tract, and Sunday-school societies—$67,000 by the Tract Society—an amount exceeding one-half the amount paid in the whole country in 1810. Probably a single private publishing house pay as much as all these societies together—possibly as much as all publishers in 1810.

As late as 1825, publishers of religious books often resorted to subscriptions to secure themselves from loss. Such works as are now abundant, at the lowest prices, could hardly be procured at bookstores; and bookstores were few in number, and of doubtful success. An examination of the files of the New York Observer shows that the whole number of religious books noticed in any way in its columns in 1826, was seventeen. For months together, there was no advertisement of a religious book. Scott's Commentary was offered for $24. In 1835, the "new publication" list had twenty-four new books by the trade. At this period commenced the vigorous prosecution of the "volume circulation" by the American Tract Society, and other institutions were stimulated to effort, or brought into being. The issues of the book-trade rapidly increased, and, in 1841, the Observer's "new publication" list noticed one hundred and twenty-five religious works by the trade—exclusive of all by publishing societies—or five times as many as in 1835. In 1841, colportage, or the systematic circulation of good books, especially among the destitute, commenced, and it has been constantly increasing since. Other institutions have greatly extended their efforts for the distribution of good books. But the book-trade has also stretched forward its successful enterprises simultaneously; and one hundred and sixty-eight religious books issued by the trade, are noticed in the Observer of 1848, or an advance of seven hundred per cent. on the issues of 1835. Publishers now issue editions of 3,000 or 5,000 copies of such books, as in 1826, they would have regarded it hazardous to publish, except by subscription. The bookselling business was never so safe, lucrative, and prosperous as now. Several extensive houses are engaged exclusively in the publication of religious books; and it is probable that one of them issues more practical religious works annually, than were sold by the whole corps of booksellers in the United States twenty-five years ago. Thus showing that the production and circulation of cheap religious books by benevolent societies, while it may deprive the trade of a certain class of books, far more than compensates for this loss by the taste which it creates for solid and religious reading.

The foregoing statements respecting the operations of benevolent institutions, including the Christian press, show that they are the right arm of the missionary enterprise, in all lands. The domestic missionary who wisely avails himself of the aid he may derive from Sabbath-school publications, tracts, books and periodicals, either as a means of edification and salvation for the people of his charge, or as an instrumentality for extending his influence beyond the boundaries of his congregation, may multiply his power for good indefinitely. And, by calling in the help of a faithful colporteur, to penetrate the 'regions beyond,' and convey the knowledge of Christ to the destitute and erring whom he may not personally reach, the leaven of the Gospel may be made to pervade the masses of the people, and a demand be created for pulpit ministrations, such as might not exist in long years, were these auxiliary influences neglected or overlooked. And so of the Foreign Missionary. If succeeding generations of missionaries are to profit by the experience of their predecessors, the results of that experience must be committed to the press. If the schools on heathen ground are to be made the source of abiding good, there must be a Christian literature provided for the generations of readers thus trained. If the Gospel is to be proclaimed beyond the restricted precincts of the several missions, and any considerable portion of the existing generation of heathen are to have the word of life, it must be conveyed to them by the printed page. If the mountains of superstition and error and ignorance are to be lifted off from the heathen mind, the lever of the press must be applied.

If the advances made from year to year in the acquisition of languages and in the adaptation of truth to simple minds, are to be perpetuated, the missionaries must employ their pens, and the printing-press must embody and multiply the results of missionary toil. The stupendous undertaking of printing a Christian literature for the world must be prosecuted with steady zeal and enlarged liberality. The improvements constantly making in all that relates to the printing art must be potent to the missionary cause; and the religious literature of standard worth in the English language must be made the heritage of the reading world. The systems of aggressive Christian effort now associated with the press in America, should become a part of the machinery of missions universally; so that native piety may find active employment, and the unevangelized hordes be approached with adapted agencies for their elevation and salvation. Way-side, fire-side preaching, oral and printed, should attend and complement the more formal proclamations of divine truth, until the time comes when none need say to his brother, "know the Lord, for all shall know him from the least even unto the greatest."

BOODALLOOR: A station of the Gospel Propagation Society in India.

BOOTAN: A village in the district of Maulmain in Burmah—also, a district in Koordistan.

BORABORA: One of the Society Islands and a station of the London Missionary Society.

BORNEO: See Indian Archipelago.

BOSJESMANS: The same as Bushmen, which see.

BRAHMA: The supreme god of the Hindoos. In Hindustani, the word is a neuter noun, derived by grammarians from the verb brih to grow, and the suffix man, and thus means that which grows, or the Supreme Being regarded under the aspect of development, and revealed by the creation of worlds. The word, however, is used in a secondary sense, also, and means the Supreme Absolute Spirit, not regarded as a creative force, but shut up in himself without external manifestations of any kind.

BRAHMINS: The name employed to designate that body or order of priests, who have always been the sole guardians, preceptors and ministers of the Hindoo religion. This order is of extreme antiquity, and they and their followers are universally acknowledged as a tribe sprung from the Caucasian variety of the human species. Their sacred books or vedas represent them as invading India from the north-west, through Afghanistan and the Punjaub, at a very early period, when they seem to have made more considerable progress in literature, philosophy, mathematics and medicine, than their cotemporaries in other regions of the world.

BRAHMINISM : The religion of the Brahmins, which is the prevailing religion of Hindoostan, and professed by about 150,000,000 of people, is one of the grossest impositions ever made upon an ignorant and degraded people, by a corrupt and avaricious priesthood, bearing, in many particulars, a striking resemblance to Popery.

Ideas of God.—The Hindoos, in general, entertain vague, incongruous, and unworthy notions of the Deity. Some call him the invisible and ever blessed; others ascribe to him a form; others suppose he exists like an inconceivably small atom; sometimes he is represented as male, and at other times, as female; sometimes both male and female, producing a world by conjugal union; sometimes the elements assume his place, and at other times he is a deified hero. According to the Hindoo theology, Brahme, the great Being, is the supreme, eternal, uncreated Being. Bramha, the first created being, by whom he made and governs the world, is the prince of good spirits.—Veeshnu, or Vishnoo, is the great preserver of men. He is said to have appeared on earth nine times, in so many incarnations. Seeva, or Siva, is the destroyer. This three-fold divinity, armed with almighty power, has under him no less than 333,000,000 of inferior deities. These are represented in innumerable forms, by dumb idols of wood and stone. The Hindoos also worship men, cows, monkeys, tigers, serpents, trees, stones, rivers, and even Satan himself.

Character of their gods.—The Hindoo gods are represented as practising without restraint every species of wickedness that can be imagined; and their sacred books are filled with details of these disgusting abominations, too polluting to be recited. In obscenity, nothing can be compared with one of these sacred books, called Bhagawata. Yet it is the delight of the Hindoos, and the first book they put in the hands of their children; as if they deliberately intended to form them to dissolute habits. The most frightful images are made as representations of their gods. Doorga, the wife of Siva or Seeva, the Destroyer, is represented with a frowning countenance and naked breast. Her right foot treads on a lion. She has four hands, in one of which she holds an infant by the hair of the head, while its body is pierced through with a trident she holds in the second hand. The other two hands are filled with weapons of destruction; and she is ornamented with a necklace of human skulls. Siva, also, is represented in a most terrific form, ornamented with serpents, covered with the ashes of a funeral pile, alighting in cemeteries, and accompanied by a train of ghosts and goblins. In this character, human victims, or the blood of beasts, is necessary to appease their wrath.

Character of their Priesthood.—The Brahmins are the legal priests of Hindoostan; and from them it is called Brahminism. They exalt themselves above every other class of their countrymen. They are arrogant, subtle, avaricious, deceitful, selfish, and vicious. They make great pretensions to learning and sanctity; while they are really ignorant and exceedingly dissolute and destitute of principle. Hindooism, from the foundation to the topstone, is one cold system of selfishness. Its ultimate object is the aggrandizement of the priesthood; and to accomplish this, they keep the people in darkness and ignorance. Their sacred books are kept in a language unknown and forbidden to the people, and can be explained only by the Brahmins. All learning is monopolized by them; and the people are discouraged from any attempts to elevate their intellectual condition. In their domestic and social capacity, nothing can be done without a Brahmin; and a Brahmin cannot work without a fee or a feast. All offerings made to the gods, go to these avaricious priests; and the giving of presents and distribution of money to Brahmins is the most effectual way of gaining the favor of the gods, and obtaining the pardon of sin. The Brahmin is revered as a god, and addressed and worshiped as a god. The people fall down before him, and lick the very dust of his feet. They believe that the Brahmin can, by his enchantments and righteousness, control both the gods and men; and this gives him a wonderful preëminence. In all things he dominates over the multitude; works on their fears; turns every superstition to his own account; and takes every advantage of their ignorance, superstition, and credulity, to enrich himself and increase his power. The pride and dissimulation, and the intrigue and dishonesty of a Brahmin, are proverbial.

Religious Mendicants.—Monkery is a very necessary appendage to every system of priestcraft; and, of course, might be expected to find a place in Brahminism. The monks of Brahminism, like those of Popery, are divided into numerous classes; and several of the highest of these classes are only open to the Brahmins. Some persons become ascetics by inheritance, and in consequence, enjoy certain revenues; others become such from necessity; others, on account of their pretended sanctity and abstraction from the world; others, on account of a vow, devote themselves to what they call a religious life. Most of them pretend to be religious teachers. The Hindoos entertain the idea that religion is some wild vagary, attainable only by priests and devotees, but not practicable for people in common life. These Religious Orders are beggars by profession; and it is esteemed meritorious to give to them. They are a great scourge to the country, contributing greatly not only to impoverish it, but also to corrupt and debase the morals of the people. These idle and pretended devotees assemble sometimes in armies of ten or twelve thousand, and, under pretense of making pilgrimages to certain temples, lay whole countries under contribution. They are generally robust and stout. They wear no clothes, and commit all manner of excesses. These men inflict voluntary penances upon themselves, of an extraordinary character. They sometimes hold up one arm, in a fixed position, till it becomes stiff, and remains in that situation during the rest of their lives. Some clench their fists very hard, and keep them so till their nails grow into their palms, and appear through the back of their hands. Others turn their faces over their shoulders, and keep them so, till they fix their heads looking backwards. By such means they increase their celebrity, and become objects of greater veneration. The supposed holiness of these men seems to sanctify, in the minds of the people, all their licentiousness and abominations.

Character of their Worship.—From what we have seen of the character of their gods, it may be readily perceived what kind of worship would be supposed to be pleasing to them. The most unbridled and disgusting licentiousness is made a part of the public worship of these false gods; and every temple has a company of dancing girls, who are married to the gods, and are kept for purposes of impurity. In the presence of some of the most celebrated idols, among which is Juggernaut, all distinctions of sex and caste are abolished, so that men may gratify their evil desires with impunity.

Hindoo notions of sin.—The notions of sin, inculcated in the Hindoo sacred books, like every other part of the system, are calculated to exalt the priesthood. Even the Brahmins, their religious teachers, show the most stupid deficiency in distinguishing between good and evil. They call good evil, and evil good; light darkness, and darkness light. Lying is good, if it result in immediate benefit; to speak the truth is evil, if it terminate in immediate loss. Meats and drinks, divers washings and corporeal inflictions, make up their righteousness, while sin is really but a transgression of the laws of caste. To lie, steal, cheat, deceive, commit adultery, and wallow like swine in moral turpitude, is too trifling a thing to be named; it is only what their gods did before them. But to eat with a man of another caste, however respectable he may be, or to drink out of the same cup, is a sin only pardonable by a large sum of money. He who breaks his word with a Brahmin, or occasions him any detriment, directly or indirectly, in his temporal concerns, will, according to the Hindoo scriptures, be condemned, in his second birth, to become a devil. He will not be permitted to dwell on the earth or live in the air; but will be obliged to make his abode in a thick forest, among the branches of a bushy tree, where he shall never cease to groan by night and day, cursing his unhappy lot, and deprived of all food but toddy, mixed with the slaver of a dog, which he shall drink out of the skull of a death's head. It is in this way that offences, imaginary or of small account, are menaced with endless punishment; while adulterers, perjurers, robbers, and other real offenders, are absolved by the Brahmins of their actual crimes, for selfish objects, and assured of a recompense after death.

Hindoo ideas of Atonement.—The fact that all false systems of religion contain devices of atonement for sin, is a strong testimony that an atonement is necessary; while the Gospel of Jesus Christ alone reveals the only true and rational method of reconciliation between offending man and offended Deity. But, the blind heathen, conscious of his guilt, resorts to vain and foolish expedients for taking away sin. Brahminism abounds in atonements. Holy bathing, reading the shastras, pilgrimage, fasting, giving to the Brahmins, feeding devotees or religious beggars, building temples, with the endless routine of sacrifices, penances, and religious austerities, which make up a very important part of Hindooism, constitute their atonements for sin. Some of these penances are very expensive, and most of them attended with great bodily mortifications; while others are disgusting, filthy, and degrading. Among these are, drinking the water in which a Brahmin has washed his foot, and taking atonement pills, which are composed of the milks, curds, clarified butter, and excrement of a cow. A man in Bombay had been performing a penance of a very painful character for sixteen years. He sat in a miserable shed, holding on his left hand a vessel of about ten pounds weight, which contains the sacred shrub. His whole arm was withered, and the finger nails had shot out like ram's horns, five or six inches in length. Another man sat in the open air, for three months, during the coldest part of the year, almost naked; confining himself to a spot about eight feet in diameter. Passing a rod of iron through the tongue; hanging suspended by the legs from a tree, over a slow burning fire, inhaling the smoke and sparks; leaping on a plank set full of sharpened plates of iron; lying on a bed made of a plank set with iron spikes; looking at the meridian sun for whole days in succession; falling on the face, marking the place of the head, rising and falling again from the marks, and repeating this, till a specified distance has been measured; swinging through the air, suspended from a hook inserted in the back; and other penances, too numerous and too foolish to be mentioned, are resorted to as expedients for taking away sin, and accumulating righteousness. And their sacred books prescribe even the most indecent crimes, as atonements for sin.

Fate—Accountability.—The Hindoos are the most cold-blooded fatalists in the world. Every occurrence in life is, according to their notions, the result of dire necessity. If they are prosperous, it is fate. If they are in distress, it is fate. To lie, cheat, or steal, is fate. To be idle, dissipated, poor, and imprisoned, is fate. The poor sufferer apparently feels no remorse that his own sin has brought misery on him. He only curses his hard fate. When the criminal is detected and condemned, he seems never to regard himself as suffering the just penalty of the law; it is all fate. The Hindoo writings teach, that it is the Great Spirit which is diffused through every form of animated matter; that actions of every kind are his. By this doctrine, all accountability is destroyed, and liability to punishment rendered preposterous.

Notions of Futurity.—The Hindoo scriptures teach that the soul must pass, in certain circumstances, into eight million four hundred thousand different animal bodies, after it leaves the human. Yet, the people are wholly in the dark on the subject of futurity. They say they can know nothing about it. Beyond the present life, all is impenetrable darkness to the Hindoos.

Different Ages of the World.—The Hindoos hold that there are four ages of the world, the first three of which are already past. The first was the golden age, of 1,728,000 years duration; the second, the silver age of 1,296,000 years; the third, the brazen age, of 864,000 years; and the fourth, which is the present, the iron age, of 432,000 years. They believe that in the first age, men were as tall as trees, and lived many thousand years: but as every age became worse and worse, the people diminished in size, and their lives were shortened; that even the Brahmins themselves, the gods of the people, have lost their holiness, and are now filled with covetousness and many vices. Thus they account for the prevailing vice and degradation, instead of tracing it to the depravity of their own hearts.

Caste.—There is no part of the Hindoo system, which exerts such despotic sway, and so effectually prevents all improvement, as CASTE. They were originally divided into four castes or tribes, viz., the Brahmins, the Kshatriyas or Ketras, the Vaisyas or Bices, and the Sudres or Sooders, each of which is again subdivided into a large number of branches. Every individual remains invariably in the caste in which he was born, practices its duties, and is debarred from ever aspiring to a higher, whatever may be his merit or his genius. The members of each tribe must adhere invariably to the profession of their ancestors, and continue from generation to generation, to pursue one uniform walk of life. In consequence of this unnatural distinction of caste, all motives to exertion, inquiry, or improvement, are completely extinguished among the Hindoos; for the most honorable actions, the most beneficial discoveries, the most virtuous conduct, secure no respect or advantage to a person of inferior caste. None of the high castes will cat with any of the low castes. The fourth and most numerous castes are the Sudres or Sooders. Their business is servile labor; and whenever the original spirit of the institution has not been infringed on, their degradation is inhuman. They are compelled to work for the Brahmins, being considered as created solely for their use. They are not allowed to collect property because such a spectacle would give pain to the Brahmins. To them, the Vedas, or sacred books, must never be read. There is also a race of the most degraded and universally insulted outcasts, called Parayas. In many places, their very approach is sufficient to pollute a whole neighborhood. They must not enter a street where the Brahmins live. When they transgress, the higher classes will not assault them, for it is pollution even to touch them with a long pole; but through the medium of others, they often beat them at pleasure, and sometimes put them to death, without dispute or inquiry. For every species of labor, there is a distinct class of men. This division of labor is regulated according to caste. The divisions of the former, however, are so much more extensive than the nominal grades of the latter, that different individuals of the same caste are engaged in different occupations. Still, whatever be a man's capacities, he can never rise above the calling of his father. He will perform only that kind of labor to which his own subdivision of caste are accustomed. One man of low caste may be a dobee or washerman, and another of the same caste, a coolie or carrier of burdens, and a third, a palanquin bearer. But a dobee would scorn to act as a coolie. Even the foot pedlar will not carry his own pack of goods; nor will the Hindoo servant, who provides for his master's table, bring from the market a piece of meat, or a basket of vegetables. He must employ a coolie. The coolie in his turn can do nothing that does not come within the sphere of his business. The first missionaries in Southern India undertook to accommodate Christianity to the prevailing prejudices of the people. The Rev. Hollis Read, who has traveled extensively among the Hindoos, regards caste as one of the most exceptionable features of Hindooism; and the Bishop of Calcutta has become so well convinced of its utter inconsistency with Christianity, that he has addressed two charges to the missionaries of the Church of England, requiring them no longer to tolerate the distinction of caste in the native churches. "The main barrier to all permanent improvement," says he, "is the heathen usages of caste, in the Christian churches." He says, "the different castes sat on different mats, on different sides of the church, to which they entered by different doors. They approached the Lord's table at different times, and had once different cups, or managed to get the catechists to change the cup, before the lower castes began to communicate; they would allow no persons at baptism, of an inferior caste; and they had separate divisions in the burial grounds." The usages of caste enter so deeply into the social constitution of the Hindoos, that every thing is affected by it. It creates great inconvenience, and constitutes the greatest barrier against improvement either of the social or religious condition of the people. There can be nothing more at variance with the spirit of the Gospel than the spirit of caste.

Rev. Dr. Allen, late missionary at Bombay, makes the following statements respecting the bearing of Caste upon the missionary work:

"The missionaries of the American Board, in India and Ceylon, have always required a renunciation of Caste, just as much as of idolatry, and other parts of heathenism, of all converts before they were baptized. No arrangements, nor accommodations, nor changes have ever been made in the seats, or in the sitting in the churches, or in the administration of the ordinances on account of the Caste. Caste was in no respect recognized. All were treated as of one class, as much as Christians in this country are so treated.

"It would naturally be expected that such a public renunciation of Caste, and such subsequent treatment of it, would be sufficient to extinguish it in the church. But experience has shown that it was not sufficient. Caste has been found to be surprisingly insidious in its influence; and to be capable of assuming almost any complexion and shape, suited to the native character and their circumstances. In some places, as in the north part of Ceylon, Caste, though religious in its origin, yet retains now but little of its religious character. It has now become chiefly a social distinction, and is valued as conferring personal and family respectability. In proportion as it loses its religious character, it becomes easy for those who have abandoned it to be restored to their former state. This state of feeling in the community presents a constant motive for those native Christians who were originally of high Caste, to abstain from those things in their habits, and from those persons in their social intercourse, which affect their personal or family respectability. In such circumstances, Caste becomes analogous to the civil distinctions of society, and resembles those antipathies and aversions which exist between different classes and races of people.

"The lower castes are also very unclean in their food, drink, &c. In some districts where I have been, their food consisted chiefly of cattle and other creatures, that died of themselves in the adjacent cities and villages. They appeared almost to live on carrion, and their roads and houses are exceedingly offensive, disgusting and filthy. Now the Brahmins never eat any kind of meat; and the Hindoos of all respectable castes hold the eating of beef in the greatest abhorrence. With what feelings, then, must all such castes regard the Pariars or Parayas and Mahars; and what must be their involuntary shrinking from contact, or close personal intimacy with them? The Brahmins and other high castes naturally and necessarily feel far more aversion to associate intimately with Mahars and Pariars, and to have personal contact with them, than the most refined and delicate people in this country would feel in associating intimately with the most degraded and filthy.

"It should not appear strange, then, in view of these things, if persons recently converted from the darkness and ignorance of heathenism, should yield to the influence and motives which continually surround them, and exhibit the feelings, and perform, or refuse to perform the actions which are ascribed to Caste; especially when they know what respect was formerly shown to such feelings and actions by some of the best men, (as Schwartz, and his fellow-laborers,) ever engaged in the missionary cause; and know also, how such feelings and actions are still regarded in some native churches, and by some missionaries. Feelings of this character are sometimes developed unexpectedly and in much strength, where none were supposed to exist. These facts show the importance of continually watching such a hydra-headed monster as Caste. Various ways and means have been tried to develop these feelings, and so to extinguish, as far as possible, the spirit in which they originate.

"The Madras Missionary Conference 'recommend a love feast, at which all the members of the church, including the pastor and teachers, shall partake of a simple and suitable repast.' This custom has been observed in the missions of the American Board, and with very good effect. When the spirit of Caste at these meetings, or on any other occasions, has appeared, it has been made the subject of admonition, or suspension, or exclusion from the church, according to the nature of the offence.

"During a residence of more than a quarter of a century in India, I had opportunities of seeing missionary operations and mission churches in Bengal, in Madras, in Ceylon, and in Bombay; and I can fully concur in the sentiment of the Madras Missionary Conference, that 'Caste is one of the greatest obstacles to the progress of the Gospel in India. It meets and thwarts the missionary, not only in bearing the unsearchable riches of Christ to the unconverted Hindoos, but also in building up the native church in faith and love; and to tolerate it in any form, is to oppose the law of Christ.' And again, in a communication of a subsequent date, they say, 'We have long regarded Caste as a most formidable opponent to genuine Christianity, and a deadlier enemy, in some respects, to the souls of this people, than even idolatry. We are called to unceaing effort to extinguish its spirit and power in native Christians who have openly renounced it.' 'Caste is a deadlier enemy to the souls of the Hindoos than idolatry,' on account of its assuming, as experience shows, almost any complexion—adapting itself to circumstances and exigencies, and then again assuming its positive character. In the system of Hindooism, it is decidedly religious in its nature—and yet, in connection with the Danish and German missions, it became so far divested of its religious character that it was admitted into the church, and there tolerated for a long time, as containing only civil and social distinctions not inconsistent with the principle and spirit of Christianity. After it had gained admission into the native Christian community, it again assumed a religious character, and those of high Caste became as much attached to it, and as reluctant to abandon its usages, as the heathen around them. And considering how little was known of the nature of this peculiar feature of Hindooism, when the first missionaries of the Board went to India and Ceylon, and the state of the Protestant churches in India, in connection with the high character and great veneration of Schwartz and his fellow-laborers, who formed these churches and presided over them, there is cause for gratitude and thankfulness, that Caste has never been knowingly admitted into any of our mission churches; has never been recognized by any arrangements to favor it; and when its spirit has been manifested in any manner which has called for the consideration of the missionaries and their churches, discipline has been administered in the way of admonition, suspension, and excommunication, according to the nature of the offence. Thus, while in looking back we see reason to thank God, the present state of this cause is such, that in looking forward we see reason to take courage."

Superstitions.—Like the votaries of all false religions, the Hindoos are very superstitious. And, in proportion to their ignorance and degradation, their absurd superstitions have dominion over them. There is scarce an occurrence in life, which, to the superstitious Hindoo, is not ominous of good or evil; and scarcely an hour of the day when he is not bound to the performance of some ceremony, or not made a slave to some superstition. He leaves his house in the morning; but if he sees a bird fly in a wrong direction, or meets an animal of ill-omen, or first sees a person of a certain caste, or any object betokening ill, he must return, and relinquish his enterprise, and perhaps may not go out of his house again that day. These superstitions are of endless variety; and only a few will be specified here. The cholera is regarded as a malignant goddess, whom they worship, in order to deprecate her anger. They believe that this goddess walks to and fro, up and down the earth, afflicting the people in one place, and then moving off to another, where she commences the same work without mercy or compassion. In order to propitiate this malignant demon, they make offerings of rice, ghee, flowers, fruits, and the like, and sacrifice to her sheep, goats, buffaloes, and fowls. Consistently with their belief, they cannot take medicine for the cholera. The only way is to exorcise the demon. This, they pretend, may be done by the numtra, which is the grand charm of the Brahmins. This bears a very prominent place in the Hindoo religion. It is a mystic verse or incantation, the repetition of which is declared to be attended with the most wonderful effects. None but Brahmins and the higher order of Hindoos, are allowed to repeat it. The lower castes are forbidden to repeat or even hear it, on pain of eternal torment. All things are subservient to the numtra. The gods themselves cannot resist it. It is the essence of the Vedas, or sacred books; it is the united power of Bramha, Vishnoo, and Siva. By its magic power, it confers all sanctity; pardons all sin; secures all good, temporal and spiritual, and procures everlasting blessedness in the world to come. It possesses the wonderful charm of interchanging good for evil, truth for falsehood, light for darkness, and of confirming such perversions by the most holy sanctions. There is nothing so difficult, so silly, or so absurd, that it may not be achieved by this extraordinary numtra. As might be expected, it is employed very extensively for removing pains, for the curing of diseases, the bite of venomous snakes, &c., &c. But the cholera is by no means the only disease which is supposed to be the effect of an evil spirit; or of some animal or other object in the part affected. Every disease is represented as possessed of a bodily form. A liver complaint is said to be caused by a crab, who is eating the liver; a cough, by a large caterpillar in the throat; the tooth-ache, from the gnawings of a little worm in the decayed tooth. The Hindoos believe that if they look at the moon on a certain day, they shall be instantly struck dead. Nothing will induce a man to raise his eyes to the moon on that day.

The Hindoo sacred books abound with directions about such frivolous things as cleaning the teeth, bathing and washing, cooking and eating, washing or drying clothes, &c., there being some lucky or unlucky omen connected with the particular manner in which every thing is done. Of these, only a very few specimens can be given. Eating with the face to the east, ensures long life; with it to the south, celebrity; to the west, wealth; to the north, pecuniary embarrassment. If, before eating, they do not make a circular mark, with water, around where they set the dish, it is said the demons will devour the food. On the first day of the moon, he who eats a pumpkin becomes indigent. Ignorance follows eating the cocoa-nut on the eighth. It is said to be sinful to eat beans on the eleventh; and so on, through the whole month. He who puts on new apparel on Sunday, becomes poor; on Monday, is afflicted with boils; on Tuesday, is subject to much trouble; on Wednesday, will have means of purchasing new clothes; on Thursday, will become learned and happy; on Saturday, will be involved in trouble and disputes. He who shaves on Sunday, becomes miserable; on Monday, happy; on Tuesday, hastens his own death; on Wednesday, accumulates wealth; on Thursday, becomes dishonorable; on Friday, childless; on Saturday, brings on his head every misfortune. And, so on, to every action of life. To sneeze, when one is about to sit down, or lie down, or eat, or is dressing, or bestowing gifts, is highly inauspicious. These are but a few, among a vast multitude of such ridiculous notions, by which the minds of the people are held in bondage. Their notions of ceremonial impurity are also equally burdensome and inconvenient.

The Hindoos believe that a person about to be executed, imparts an extraordinary sanctity to every thing he touches. For this reason, he throws flowers, fruits, and spices, to the crowd about the gibbet, who eagerly catch them, and preserve them as a sort of charm. In one instance, they actually worshiped the dead carcass of a man who had been executed, while hanging on the gibbet, in consequence of a report that miraculous cures had been experienced by touching his body. Amulets are almost universally worn by the Hindoos, for preventing or curing diseases and the bite of serpents. The Hindoos suffer exceedingly, on account of their superstitions in reference to sickness and disease. Many a wretched creature spends all his living for the prescriptions of some quack, or drags out a miserable existence, and dies in the midst of the charms and the enchantments of the Brahmin. The number of the blind, lame, maimed, leprous, and diseased in India, is astonishingly great; and no doubt one principal reason for this is the bad treatment, or the want of good treatment, in the original complaint. They have a singular superstition respecting the eclipse of the sun. They suppose that a kind of corporeal divinity, very malignant and mischievous, very black, foul, and impure, seizes on the sun, blackens it as with ink, and thus infects and obscures it. The sun, which they suppose to be a similar divinity, but of a benevolent and perfect order, is put into extreme pain and terrible anguish, at thus seeing himself seized and tortured by the monster; and in order to relieve him of this distress, they make use of many prayers and foolish ceremonies. There is no slavery so grievous as the slavery of superstition; and none which so much exposes an ignorant people to the cupidity of an avaricious priesthood.

Cruelties of Brahminism.—A superstitious religion is invariably a religion of cruelty. Such, then, we may expect Hindooism to be. And, in no respect is this cruelty more conspicuous than in the treatment of females; but especially widows and female children. The Suttee, or burning of widows on the funeral piles of their husbands, arose from their oppressive customs in relation to widows. Religion and custom have rendered widowhood so wretched and disgraceful, that the Hindoo wife, on the demise of her husband, chooses death rather than so miserable a life. The widow is stripped of her ornaments, compelled to wear white clothing, have her head shaven, and submit to many other tokens of degradation. She is excluded from all ceremonies of joy; forbidden to marry, and shut out from respectable society. This is no doubt the cause of the burning of widows, and burying them alive with their deceased husbands. The former of these practices, has, however, been abolished by the British government. When the aged become burdensome, they are often dragged to the borders of some sacred river, by their own children, their mouths filled with mud, and thus abandoned to die. There is no benevolence, no disinterestedness, no mercy, in the Hindoo character. In times of prevailing disease, this is perspicuously manifest. People are left to expire unattended, and their bodies to consume in their own houses. Women, in performance of some vow, cast their children, in cold blood, into the sacred rivers, and coolly look on, and see them devoured by the sharks. And, in some sections of the country, a large portion of the female children are murdered by their parents as soon as they are born. Surely, the Hindoos are "without natural affection." The various tortures resorted to for penance, also indicate the cruelty of Hindooism.

Holy Days.—These are among the most fruitful sources of poverty, covetousness, and depravity, among the Hindoos. Of these, they have no less than one hundred and forty-five; ten of which occur monthly, and twenty-five are anniversaries. When it is considered that, on these days, they abandon all their employments, and give themselves up to all manner of licentiousness, the effect upon society may readily be imagined. We see the demoralizing effects of two or three of these holy-days in a year, in our own country; what then may we suppose them to be, where they embrace nearly one-half the days of the year, on which all manner of restraint is thrown off. A description of the ceremonies of these holy-days would be both tedious and disgusting. The festival of the dewalee is perhaps the worst of the whole. It continues three days, during which, gambling revelry, debauchery, lying, roguery, and dissipation of every description, are not only tolerated, but esteemed praiseworthy and religious acts. And to these may be added a multitude of private observances, on account of births, marriages, deaths, &c. From the first existence of the child, to his death, there is probably not a month, perhaps not a week, in which it is not required that some ceremony be performed, when a Brahmin must be called, and presents given; and when he is dead, he must be feasted through a Brahmin's mouth, and offerings must be made for his benefit through a Brahmin's hand.

Holy Places.—Another fruitful source of poverty and vice among the people, and of aggrandizement on the part of the Brahmins, is the multitude of Holy Places, celebrated for their sanctity, to which pilgrimages are made, as means of accumulating merit. To an ignorant and self-righteous people, the idea of pilgrimage is extremely fascinating, and the subtle priest is not slow to turn this principle of human nature to his own account. Various expedients are resorted to by the Brahmins, to keep up the reputation of these Holy Places. The principal ones are Benares, Jugunath, and Rameshwur; but there are a great number of other places which are held in high estimation; and to all of them, crowds of pilgrims are continually flocking: persons who have left their homes, and sacrificed their all, with the vain expectation of laying up a stock of merit, by visiting a sacred place. They are soon, by the wiles of old pilgrims and covetous Brahmins, stripped of every thing, and plunged into all manner of excesses. Those who have read the disgusting accounts of pilgrimages to Jugunath, "of the roads for fifty miles being marked by the skulls of those who have perished on the way;" and of the thousands who are left to die on the banks of the Ganges; and those who will take the pains to calculate what must be the probable consequences of a company of people, both poor and unprincipled, leaving their houses for nearly a year, traveling across the country, and visiting the central places of iniquity in India, may form some idea of the effects of these pilgrimages.

Degradation of Females.—There is no feature of Brahminism more revolting to the benevolent heart, and the ingenuous mind, than the condition of Hindoo females. The genius of Hindooism saps in the heart of man the very foundation of all those tender and noble affections of his soul, which capacitate him to appreciate and admire those excellencies which are peculiar to the other sex. Hindooism must make its votaries selfish, distrustful, and brutish. Love, tenderness, sympathy, weakness, modesty and dependence, which we accord to the female as her appropriate virtues, are ridiculed, if not despised, by the Hindoo. He marries, or rather buys a wife, as he would a beast of burden, and afterwards regards her in very much the same light. All those civilities and attentions which females receive in a Christian country are unknown in India. Were a Hindoo to inquire after the health of his neighbor's wife or daughter, the husband and father would deem himself insulted. A Hindoo is never seen to treat his wife with familiarity or fondness. All this is in accordance with the principles of the Hindoo scriptures. According to them, "the supreme duty of the wife is to obey the husband. Let the wife, who wishes to perform sacred ablution, wash the feet of her lord, and drink the water; for the husband is to a wife greater than Shunura or Vishnoo. Her husband is her god and gooroo, (teacher,) and religion and its services; wherefore, abandoning every thing else, she ought chiefly to worship her husband." This implicit obedience of the wife extends to any thing which the husband may choose to command. His will and authority are paramount to any law, human or divine. If he command his wife to lie, steal, or commit adultery, she must obey. Such is the language of the Hindoo scriptures. To become the father of a son is regarded the greatest honor and happiness; but the birth of a daughter is a calamity. Thus the girl, from her infancy, is made to feel her inferiority. She is regarded as incapable of mental improvement, and is doomed to a servile life. Ignorant and indolent, she becomes a wife, without any choice of her own, and often sadly against her wishes. If she be of high birth she is little more than the prisoner of her husband. He immures her within the walls of a gloomy mansion, and watches over her with a jealous eye. But if of low caste, she becomes the wife and the drudge at the same time; carrying burdens, laboring in the field, bringing water, gathering cow-dung, kneading into cakes, and drying it for fuel, are her appropriate departments of labor. Nearly every occupation which nature points out as the sphere of the harder sex, is, in this country, assigned to the woman; while her appropriate labors are performed by men. Her washing is done by the washerman; her sewing, by the tailor; her milk and butter, and all articles of food, which require but little cookery, are purchased in the bazar. She has no furniture to clean, no floors to sweep or scrub. A coat of cow dung and water, once a week, settles that long account, which the industrious housewife in this country, has with her floors. Indolence and dirt at home, and drudgery and disgrace abroad, seem the only alternatives of Hindoo women. Such is the condition of females in Hindoostan; and for this there is no remedy but Christianity. Wherever this has prevailed, the rights of women have been acknowledged, and their character and condition elevated.

Character of the People.—After what has been already said, little need be added under this head. It can hardly be expected that the character of any people will be better than that of their gods, their priests, and their mothers. And when to these sources of corruption, are added the demoralizing influence of ignorance, superstition, the doctrine of fate, and heathen festivals and pilgrimages, we are prepared to contemplate a people reduced to the lowest state of moral degradation. To provide for the daily wants of the body, seems to absorb the whole soul of the Hindoo. His immortal mind is permitted to remain enveloped in all its ignorance, without making any proper efforts for its illumination. The great mass of the people are content to do as their fathers did, and to worship what their fathers worshiped, and whether that object be a god or a devil, it matters not, provided it be the custom of the people to do so. Custom with them is law, to which reason and conscience must submissively bow. Moral principle and benevolent feeling seem to be entirely obliterated in the heart of the Hindoo; and he knows no higher motive of action than selfishness. He will lie, cheat, steal, and commit all manner of licentiousness, whenever it will serve his turn, without the least compunction. Although exceedingly zealous in their religion, scrupulously maintaining, in their way, their daily devotions, and having temples in every village; yet, all their holiness is ceremonial, having no respect whatever to the state of the heart, or the character of the actions.

Brahminism and Popery compared.—The similarity of Popery and Brahminism, is so striking, that it is worth while to occupy a small space in drawing a comparison between the two systems; especially as this resemblance has fallen under the eyes of the missionaries, who see them both in operation, side by side; there being many Roman Catholic convents and churches in India. The following comparison, somewhat abridged, was drawn upon the spot, by Rev. Mr. Ramsay, missionary in India. The Hindoos acknowledge one supreme god, with many subordinate deities, entitled to worship. The Brahmins are held to be the representatives of God, possessing the keys of life and death, heaven and hell, and therefore they are worshiped by bowing down before them, and kissing their great toe. The Pope, in like manner, considers himself the vicar of Christ, and every priest is his representative. He too holds the keys of heaven and hell, and his toe has been favored with many a kiss. By the Hindoo laws, none but their priests are permitted to read their sacred books; and to secure this end, the priests oppose education, and labor to keep the people in ignorance. The Romish priests will not allow the people to read the Scriptures; and to secure their own ascendancy, they strive to keep the people in ignorance. The Hindoos have a multitude of idols, which they daily worship. Some of them consider the idol as the representative of God, and others worship the thing itself, and go no further. Besides temple deities, they have household gods, which they worship daily. The Romanists in India have also images of saints in their chapels, and in their houses, to which they bow down daily. In the streets, crosses are set up; and in the evenings, lamps are placed at the feet of them, after the Hindoos' mode of placing lamps before their idols. As they pass these crosses, the Romanists take off their hats and bow down to them, or prostrate themselves before them. The worship of images is sanctioned by the church in India, as it is also by the second council of Nice. The Hindoos have many millions of inferior deities, corresponding to which the Romanists have multitudes of angels. The Hindoos have their Gooroos to intercede for them; and the Romanists have their saints, for the same purpose. The Hindoos hold that a man may obtain righteousness by his own works, and more than he needs for himself, the surplus, of which he may sell. The Romanists also have their works of supererogation, which lead to the sale of indulgences. The Hindoos observe a ceremony, in which they offer up prayers for the dead, and for which they feed and fee the Brahmins; the Romanists also fee the priests to say mass for the benefit of the souls of their deceased relatives. The Hindoos say prayers and count their beads, and undergo severe penances to obtain righteousness. The Romanists do the same. They both alike have their fasts, in which they eat no meat. They both have their festivals, in honor of their saints. They both have their holy places and their pilgrimages. They both have their holy water. The Hindoos divide their sins into two classes, inward and outward; the Romanists, into venial and mortal. They both have their monks and hermits, and religious mendicants, of equally debased character. The Hindoos have their females married to the gods; and the Romanists have their nuns, who are formally married to Christ. Both are devoted to the same purpose. Both carry out their images in solemn procession, in great display. Both have their small bells, to jingle during their religious services in their temples. They both use rosaries, and carry images about their persons. Many more marks of resemblance might be named: but these are sufficient to show that both systems have a common origin.

The Remedy.—The Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ is the only remedy for heathenism. This, with the power of the Holy Ghost, can raise them from the lowest depths of filth and degradation. It has done it, and it can do it again. But, when we look at the state of things in Hindoostan, we must despair of help from man, and look to the power of God, which alone is able to accomplish so great a work. The labors of the missionary alone surely cannot accomplish such a change. The power of God alone can produce it.—The Christian Brahmin; Ramsay's Journal; Ward's India and the Hindoos; Hooker's Plea for the Heathen.

BUDHISM: The religious system, called Buddhism, is exceedingly complicated, being made up of legends, superstitions, and absurdities so numerous and strange that to give a condensed and intelligible view of them is almost impossible. Volumes have been written on the subject by missionaries, distinguished travelers, and English gentlemen of learning and research, resident in India, and from this mass of materials the summary here given is derived. The work of R. Spence Hardy, member of the Royal Asiatic Society, has been found especially serviceable on account of its systematic arrangement of topics, although it devotes nearly 450 octavo pages to a consideration of the subject. The substantial agreement of authors in regard to the origin and character of Buddhism leads to the belief that they have attained to a great degree of accuracy, and the following view, though it omits numerous details, will, it is hoped, be found to be a correct presentation of the leading facts of the system.

Origin of Buddhism.—The founder of the sect of Buddhists was Gotama Budha, born B. C. 624. At the moment of his birth, (so says the legend) he stepped upon the ground, and after looking around towards the four quarters and the four half quarters, above and below, without seeing any one in those ten directions who was equal to himself, he exclaimed, "I am the most exalted in the world; I am chief in the world; I am the most excellent in the world; this is my last birth; hereafter there is to me no other existence." He had however previously existed through a vast number of ages, and exercised all the virtues which were necessary to his future office, and taking his position in the sixth of the divine worlds, the gods and brahmas, after the appropriate period had passed, went to his dwelling and begged his appearance in this human world. Thereupon he was born, and proclaimed his own greatness as above. He then passed twenty-nine years in worldly wealth and grandeur, and six more in mortification and penance; and then sitting down under a bo-tree, declared he would not rise up till he became Budha, Lord of the Universe. Upon this a great number of chiefs, brahmas, and gods, made their appearance as his retinue, and then his adversary, Maraya, came with a great army to try to hinder his becoming lord of the world. Upon this, panic-struck, the gods and brahmas all fled and hid themselves. Maraya then brought on thick darkness, but the body of Budh was light as a thousand suns. He then attempted to strike him, and asked him, "Who is your witness that you have done works of merit, for which you should deserve this seat?" Then Budh exclaimed, "I have no rational witness here," and called upon the earth to proclaim his actions in the course of his endeavors to become Budh. Upon this the earth rumbled 100,000 times, and began to turn round. Whereupon Maraya was dismayed and defeated, and acknowledging the superiority of Budh, fled ashamed, and all the gods and brahmas of the universe came and ministered to Budh triumphant; thus completely extinguishing evil, and acquiring omniscience, he became perfect Budha.

The places near which he exercised his ministry were Benares, and other parts of northern India, and he is said to have proceeded as far south as Ceylon. He died at the age of eighty, or as some say eighty-five, having previously foretold that his religion, after extending over the world, would become extinguished, and be renewed by his successor, Maitra Budha, who is now in a divine state, and after the appropriate age will become Budha.

The Budhas are beings who appear after intervals of time inconceivably vast. Previous to their reception of the Budhaship, they pass through countless phases of being, and in the birth in which they become Budha, they are of woman born. At their death they cease to exist. They do not continue to be Budhas, nor do they enter upon any other state of being.

Doctrines of Budha.—According to the doctrines propounded or rather ascribed to Gotama Budha, there are innumerable systems of worlds, called Sakwalas, which attain their prime, and then decay and are destroyed, at periods regularly recurring, and by agents that are as regularly recurring. Buddhism teaches that there is no Creator, no being that is self-existent and eternal. All sentient beings are homogeneous. The difference between one being and another is only temporary, and results from the difference in their degrees of merit. Any being whatever may be a candidate for the Budhaship; but it is only by the uniform pursuit of this object through innumerable ages that it can be obtained.

The power that controls the universe is karma, literally action; consisting of kusala and akusala, or merit and demerit. There is no such thing as an immaterial spirit, but at the death of any being, the aggregate of his merit and demerit is transferred to some other being, which new being is caused by the karma of the previous being, and receives from that karma all the circumstances of its existence. Thus, if the karma be good, the circumstances are favorable, producing happiness; but if it be bad, they are unfavorable, producing misery.

The manner in which being commenced, according to Buddhism, cannot now be ascertained. The cause of continuance of existence is ignorance, from which merit and demerit are produced, whence comes consciousness, then body and mind, and afterwards the six organs of sense. Again, from the organs of sense comes contact; from contact desire; from desire sensation; from sensation the cleaving to existing objects; from this cleaving, reproduction; and from reproduction disease, decay, and death. Thus, like the revolutions of a wheel, there is a regular succession of death and birth, the moral cause of which is the cleaving to existing objects, whilst the instrumental cause is karma. It is therefore the great object of all beings who would be released from the sorrow of successive birth, to seek the destruction of the moral cause of continued existence, that is to say, the cleaving to existing objects, or evil desire. It is possible to accomplish this destruction, by attending to a prescribed course of discipline, which results in an entrance to one of the four paths, with their fruition, that lead, by different modes, to the attainment of nirvana, or annihilation. They in whom evil desire is entirely destroyed are called rahats. The freedom from evil desire ensures the possession of miraculous energy. At his death the rahat invariably attains nirvana, or ceases to exist.

The Sacred Books.—The sacred books of the Buddhists are called Dharma, which means, emphatically, the truth. They contain the incidents of Gotama Budha's life, his discourses, and the voluminous commentaries that have been added. From the moment that Gotama obtained the state of a supreme Budha, to the time of his dissolution, an interval of forty-five years, in all that he uttered, to whatever order of intelligence, he had only one design, which was, to assist sentient beings in the reception of nirvana. The discourses of Budha are divided into 84,000, and include all that was spoken by him. These discourses are divided into 275,250, as to the stanzas of the original text, and into 361,550 as to the stanzas of the commentary. All the discourses, including those of Budha and those of the commentator, are divided into 2,547 vanavaras, resembling the sidarim into which the books of the Old Testament were divided by the Jews, being the portion read in the synagogue upon one Sabbath day; and these contain 737,000 stanzas, and 29,368,000 letters.

The system propounded by Gotama Budha, was not committed to writing either by himself or his immediate disciples. It is asserted that his discourses were preserved in the memory of his followers during the space of 450 years, after which they were reduced to writing in the Island of Ceylon. The documents themselves are an evidence that a considerable period must have elapsed between the death of Budha and the compilation of the Pitakas in their present form. They contain the record of numerous events that never could possibly have happened; they are distorted by fictions and legends which it must have taken a long time to invent and impose upon the people; and they abound in the grave recital of miraculous events and supernatural interferences, that any inhabitant of earth would have known to be false; and 400 years would be no more than a sufficient period for all these perversions.

For the establishment of the text of the Pitakas, or sacred books, it is said that three several convocations were held; but it is impossible in so short a space, to go into the history of these convocations and the rules by which they were governed, so unintelligible is much of the language, and so numerous and senseless the repetitions.

In size the Pitakas surpass all western compositions, and are only exceeded by the sacred books of the Brahmins. Josephus mentions that his own antiquities contain 60,000 lines; but the sacred books of the Buddhists, it is estimated, contain 2,000,000 of lines. These books were written in the Pali language, which was the vernacular tongue in the time of Gotama Budha. It was carried to a high state of cultivation, as is evident from the fact that in Ceylon a modern writer found as many as thirty works on Pali grammar, some of them of considerable extent.

The sacred books are literally worshiped, and benefits are expected to result from this adoration as from the worship of an intelligent being. The books are usually wrapped in cloth, and they are often placed upon a rude altar near the roadside, after the manner of images in Roman Catholic countries, that those who pass by may place money upon them and obtain merit. The praises of the bana, or word, are a favorite subject with the native authors. Whenever an opportunity is presented they launch out into a strain of commendation, heaping epithet upon epithet with untiring zeal, as in the following instance: "The discourses of Budha are as a divine charm to cure the poison of evil desire; a divine medicine to heal the disease of anger; a lamp in the midst of the darkness of ignorance; a fire like that which burns at the end of a kalpa, to destroy the evils of repeated existence; a meridian sun to dry up the mud of covetousness; a great rain to quench the flame of sensuality; a thicket to block up the road that leads to the narakas; a ship in which to sail to the opposite shore of the ocean of existence; a collyrium for taking away the eye-film of heresy; a moon to bring out the night-blowing lotus of merit; a succession of trees bearing immortal fruit, placed here and there, by which the traveler may be enabled to cross the desert of existence; a straight highway by which to pass to the incomparable wisdom; a door of entrance to the eternal city of Nirwana; a talismanic tree to give whatever is requested; a flavor more exquisite than any in the three worlds; a treasury of the best things it is possible to obtain, and a power by which may be appeased the sorrow of every sentient being."

The advantages to be derived from listening to the bana are represented by the native authors as being immensely great. In the early ages of Buddhism, when the bana was in the vernacular language of the people, it is evident that great effects were produced by its recitation, and by the discourses that were given in explanation of its doctrines and duties; but its rehearsal has now degenerated into an unmeaning form, and is attended with very little power.

Modes of Worship.—The Buddhists of the present age are image-worshippers; but it is not known at what period they adopted this custom, nor indeed at what period it was introduced into India. The Buddhists of Ceylon have a legend that in the lifetime of Gotama Budha, an image of the founder of their religion was made by order of the king of Kosala, and the Chinese have a similar story; but it is rejected by the more intelligent of the priests, who regard it as an invention to attract worshippers to the temples. The images are sometimes recumbent, at other times upright, or in a sitting posture, either in the act of contemplation, or with the hand uplifted in the act of giving instruction. At Cotta, near Colombo, in Ceylon, there is a recumbent image 42 feet in length. Upon the altar, in addition to flowers, there are frequently smaller images, either of marble or metal, the former being brought from Burmah and the latter from Siam. In the shape of the images each nation appears to have adopted its own ideas of beauty; those of Ceylon resembling a well proportioned native of the island, while those of Siam are of a more attenuated figure, and in Nepaul they often have three heads and six or ten arms. The idol manufactories present strange sights to the eye of a Christian, such as sign boards with the inscription, "Precious Budhas manufactured or repaired;" "The Golden Budha Shop;" and these shops containing groups of images, some black with age and sent thither for gilding, and others gaudily painted and fresh from the hand of the artist.

The Buddhists have numerous temples, pagodas, and sacred places, to which the people resort to hear the bana read and to perform their religious rites. From the ruins which appear in various places it is evident that these temples were anciently very costly and beautiful, much more so than any of modern construction; but a particular description of them must be omitted. The bo-tree, under which Gotama attained the Budhaship, was an object of worship at a very early period. Near this tree the city of Budha-Gaya was afterwards built, which, from the vast extent of its ruins, must have had, at one time, a numerous population; but it declined rapidly, and in the fifth century was entirely deserted. A bo-tree flourishes at present on the same spot, and is believed by the Buddhists to be the very tree under which Gotama sat. This place is situated in British India, in the Presidency of Bengal, about 40 miles S. W. of Bahar. It is a good deal resorted to by pilgrims, and is supposed to have once been the centre of Buddhism, but now no Buddhists reside at or near it. In the court-yard of nearly every wihara (temple) in Ceylon there is a bo-tree, said to be taken from the original tree. Numerous forms of relic-worship are observed by the Buddhists, and many of them, for extreme folly and absurdity, will compare with anything ever invented by Rome herself. They have, for example, the left canine tooth of their sage, and it is regarded by the Kandians of Ceylon as the palladium of their country. The impressions of Gotama's foot are also worshipped. There are believed to be many of these impressions in various parts of India, but the most important one is on the top of Adam's Peak, in Ceylon, 7,420 feet above the level of the sea, and the summit of this peak is visited by great numbers of pilgrims. The soles of Budha's foot are represented as being divided into 108 compartments, like a pictorial alphabet, each of which contains a figure. One of the titles of the monarch of Siam is, "The pre-eminent merciful and munificent, the soles of whose feet resemble those of Budha."

It was an ordinance of Budha, that the priests, who were then supposed to dwell most commonly in the wilderness, should reside during the three months of the rainy season in a fixed habitation. This season is called wass, and it is at this period that the priests read bana to the people. The place of reading, called the bana-maduwa, is usually a temporary erection in the form of a pagoda. In the centre of the interior is an elevated platform for the convenience of the priests, and the people sit around it upon mats spread on the ground.

No part of the rough material of the maduwa is seen, as the pillars and the roof are covered with white cloth, upon which mosses, flowers, and the tender leaf of the cocoa nut are worked up into various devices. Lamps and lanterns are suspended in great profusion and variety, and the impression produced by the scene in some localities is most striking, and forms the most magnificent sight ever seen by many of the worshippers. The females are arrayed in their gayest attire, and flags and streamers and figured handkerchiefs float from every convenient point. At intervals tom-toms are beat, the rude trumpet sends forth its screams, musketry and jinjalls add their roar, and with the help of glaring lamps, floral displays, and the noise of the people, a most exciting and bewildering effect is produced.

The copies of the sacred books now used are beautifully written in large characters, upon the best talipot leaves that can be procured, with marks to point out the conclusion of the sentences. Upon some occasions one priest reads the original Pali, while another interprets what is read in the vernacular tongue; but generally the Pali alone is read, so that the people understand not a word of it; and even when the word is explained, most of them fall asleep, or idly chew their favorite beetle, regardless of what is said. The folly of the priests, in confining their public ministrations to the simple reading of the bana, has caused a class of persons, called upasakas, in some districts, to go about from house to house, after the manner of the Scripture readers, reading works that are written in the vernacular tongue, accompanied with familiar expositions. It is by this means that Buddhism in many places is principally supported.

The Modern Priesthood.—The number of Buddhist priests in Ceylon is estimated at 2500, which is about one in 400 of the population. In Burmah the proportion of priests is much larger, and in Siam it is larger still. The priests of Ceylon trace their origin from a remote period, as, according to the native legends, Buddhism has there been professed more than 2000 years. But different sects have arisen, and the doctrines and ministrations of Buddhism are not everywhere identical. There appears to be a general similarity between the Buddhism of Ceylon, Burmah, Siam, and China; but in Nepaul, Thibet, and Japan it is essentially different. In Thibet the superior priests are called lamas, and are regarded as incarnations of Budha; and they possess so large a share of political authority that they can depose the sovereign of the country and substitute another in his stead. The dress of the grand lama is yellow, that of other lamas of superior rank red; and as these dignitaries wear broad-brimmed hats, their costume closely resembles that of the cardinals of Rome. The Buddhism of Thibet and of Japan resemble each other, in having a visible representative of Gotama, possessed of unlimited power.

The Burmans, Siamese, Nepaulese, Chinese, Japanese, and Thibetans, are the principal nations, in addition to the Ceylonese, who now profess Buddhism, once the predominant religion throughout Hindoostan; it is now nearly unknown in that vast region, where it has been superseded by other forms of superstition.

It has already been intimated that the system of Buddhism includes two leading and fatal elements—atheism and annihilation. When Gotama Budha died, he did not enter upon a future state of being; his existence was not renewed in another world; he forever ceased to be, as truly as the light of a lamp ceases to be when its flame is extinguished. Budha can, therefore, in no sense, be an object of trust or confidence; his guidance and blessing cannot be sought, and when his name is invoked, it is under the vague supposition that by some latent, unknown process, the prayer will be answered, without the agency of an intelligent cause. And as Budha ceased to exist, so does every other being. There is no such thing as an immortal soul. The attainment of nirwana, or extinction, is the only hope to which the Buddhist can aspire; though this extinction necessarily produces another being to whom are transferred all the merit and demerit that have been accumulated during an unknown period and by an almost endless succession of similar beings, all distinct from each other, but all bound by this singular law of production to every individual in the preceding link of the chain.

With such withering skepticism at its foundation, it is impossible that Buddhism should be productive of any good fruits. There are indeed some good moral precepts in the sacred books; but as explained in the commentaries and received by the people, they are wholly inoperative. Man has no Maker, is responsible to no superior being, and has before him no future. If he has enjoyment, it is the result of merit acquired in other ages and by other births; and the sense of gratitude, obligation, and dependence, is unknown to him. Little motive can exist therefore for the restraint of the passions or for purity of life, and the debased and corrupt state of Buddhist communities is the natural fruit of their religious belief.

As to what Budha himself taught, little can be known, for he left nothing in writing; and those who have most thoroughly studied this intricate system, are of the opinion that the works which profess to record his discourses have little if any foundation in truth; that he never laid claim to the miracles with which his name is connected, and which have been for ages one of the principal supports of the system; and that the accounts given of Budha's life, except the mere outlines relating to his birth, family, and death, are the merest fictions.

Those who wish more thoroughly to explore the depths of the system of Buddhism—the involved and endless definitions, rules and rites contained in the sacred books; the history of mosques, temples, pagodas, and sacred places; the disgusting legends relating to miracles, relics, and images; the celibacy, mendicancy, diet, and dress of the priests; and numerous minor points connected with these, are referred to the extended and elaborate works of R. Spence Hardy, D. J. Gogerly, Rev. Howard Malcom, and others.—REV. E. D. MOORE.

BUNGALOW: The name given in India to a house or villa of a single floor. Dāk Bungalows are thatched houses, constructed at the public expense, and placed at intervals, in many parts of India, for the accommodation of travelers.

BURDWAN: A town in the province of Bengal, the capital of a district of the same name, 60 miles N. N. W. of Calcutta. Population about 54,000. The population of the whole district is estimated at 1,444,000.

BURISAL: The principal town in the district of Bahargany, India, about 185 miles north-east from Calcutta. It stands on the point of an oblong island, formed by the broad branches of the great Ganges, which here present an immense expanse of water, and a very great facility of inland navigation. It is a station of the English Baptist Missionary Society.

BURMAH: A country situated in south-eastern Asia, in the region beyond the river Brahmapootra. It is possessed by the Burmese, the limits of whose dominions have been greatly contracted by British conquests. On the west, where it is conterminous with British territories in India, Burmah is bounded by the province of Arracan, surrendered to the British by the treaty concluded with the Burmese in 1826, and by the petty states of Tipperah, Munnepore, and Assam, from which countries it is separated by lofty ridges of mountains; on the south, by the newly acquired British province of Pegu; on the north by Assam and Thibet; and on the east by China. Its limits extend from lat. $19^{\circ} 25'$ to $28^{\circ} 15'$, and from long. $93^{\circ} 2'$ to $100^{\circ} 40'$; comprising a territory 540 miles in length, from north to south, and 420 in breadth, with an area of 96,000 square miles.

Topography.—That portion of Asia in which Burmah is situated slopes from the central mountains towards the south; and as it approaches the Indian Ocean, it subsides into an extensive champaign country, which is overflowed in the rainy season, by the swelling of the rivers. The Burmese territory is watered by three great streams, the Irrawaddy, the Salwen, and the Kyen-dwen, a tributary of the Irrawaddy. These rivers have their sources in the northern chain of mountains in the interior, some of which are covered with perpetual snow; and they run in a southerly course to the Indian Ocean. The Irrawaddy and the Salwen are large rivers, which overflow the flat country on their banks, during the season of the rains. Burmah, having been despoiled of Pegu, contains neither maritime districts nor alluvial plains, but is altogether an upland territory, bounded at its southern extremity by a frontier line at the distance of about 200 miles from the mouth of the Irrawaddy. From this point, the country begins to rise, and thence for about 300 miles farther it may be considered hilly and elevated. Beyond this, it is wild and mountainous. To the W. and N. W., it is divided from Arracan, Munnepore, and Assam, by mountainous ridges, often of great elevation.

Population.—From their resemblance in features and form, the Burmese appear to be of the same race as the inhabitants of the countries that lie between Hindoostan and China. They may be generally described as of a stout, short, active, but well-proportioned form; of a brown, but never of an intensely dark complexion; with black, coarse, lank, and abundant hair, and a little more beard than the Siamese. The population has been variously estimated and exaggerated from seventeen to thirty-three millions; but Mr. Crawford, from the best data that he could procure, estimated the population so as to give the present limits of Burmah 2,112,000.

Social and Political Institutions, Arts, &c.—The Burmese appear to be inferior to the Hindoos, and still more to the Chinese, in arts, manufactures, industry, and all the institutions of civil life. Their government is a pure despotism, the king dispensing torture, imprisonment, or death, according to his sovereign discretion. The chief object of the government appears to be the personal honor and aggrandizement of the monarch; and the only restraint on the exercise of his prerogative is the fear of insurrection. He is assisted by a public and privy council, but may punish any of his high officers at his pleasure. The country at large is ruled by provincial governors, and is divided into provinces, townships, districts, and hamlets. In all the townships and villages there are judges of subordinate jurisdiction; but as no officer receives a fixed salary, the people are subject to the most shameful extortion. The criminal code is barbarous and severe, and the punishments shocking to humanity. The Burmese are divided into seven classes, viz.: the royal family; the public officers; the priesthood; the rich men; the cultivators and laborers; and the slaves and outcasts; each of which have their badges of distinction. But any subject, except slaves and outcasts, may aspire to the highest offices.

In the useful arts, the Burmese have not made any great advances; and their currency is of the rudest description, being composed of uncoined lead, silver, and gold, valued by weight. The Burmese are entirely ignorant of literature and science. Morality is at a low ebb among them, and their rulers have no conception of either the excellence or utility of good faith.

mah. (See Budhism.) Foreigners enjoy religious toleration; but the Burmese rulers view any attempts to convert the natives to the Christian, or any other foreign faith, as an interference with their allegiance, and therefore discourage them.—Encyclopedia Britannica.

MISSION—AMERICAN BAPTIST UNION.—The first mission of the American Baptists in Burmah was commenced by Rev. Adoniram Judson,* who, with Mrs. Judson, landed at Rangoon, in July, 1813, and immediately began to study the language of the country. So soon as Mr. Judson had sufficiently mastered the language, he prepared a tract, to be read in manuscript by the Burmans, on the nature of the Christian religion, containing an abstract of its leading doctrines. This was his first public labor. In 1816, Rev. George H. Hough and his wife arrived at Rangoon, as missionaries of the Board. Mr. H. had been a printer, and on his way, at Serampore, had received a printing-press and a font of Burman types, which were presented to the mission, and which had preceded him to Rangoon. Mr. Judson's tract and a catechism were immediately printed, and they were soon followed by a translation of the Gospel of Matthew. In the summer of 1818, the mission was for a time interrupted by persecution, and Mr. and Mrs. Hough sailed for Bengal, taking with them the printing-press. Mr. Judson was absent at the time, but Mrs. Judson determined to remain at her post, and was soon afterwards rejoined by her husband, and they together quietly waited till the storm had passed away.

In September, 1818, the mission was increased by the arrival of Rev. Messrs. Colman and Wheelock, with their wives. Mr. Wheelock, however, was, at the close of a single year, compelled, by failing health, to withdraw from the mission, and was drowned at sea on his passage to Bengal. It was not till 1819 that the first zayat was opened for public worship and religious teaching. It was a small low building, situated on the Great Pagoda road, and surrounded by the magnificent temples of heathenism. Here Mr. Judson began his public labors as a Christian teacher, and here for the first time he celebrated the public worship of God. In June of the same year, nearly six years after his arrival in Rangoon, he had the satisfaction of baptizing and receiving into the mission-church Mounng Nau, the first Burman convert to Christianity. In the following November, two others were in like manner baptized and admitted to the Church. These instances of baptism, together with the increasing number of inquirers who frequented the zayat, attracted the interposition of the Buddhist priests, also of the Viceroy, and in consequence attendance at the zayat for a time almost entirely ceased.

* For previous notice of Mr. Judson, see article on Am. Baptist Missionary Union.

This fact revealed to Mr. Judson most distinctly the precarious situation of the mission, and determined him to go immediately to Amarapura, the seat of the imperial government, in order, if possible, to obtain toleration for the Christian religion. Accompanied by Mr. Colman, his associate in the mission, in the winter of 1819, he ascended the Irrawaddy to the capital, and presented himself before the Burman king, with rich and showy offerings, in order the better to secure a favorable hearing for his humble request. The occasion was one of great ceremony, but the petition of the missionaries was contemptuously rejected, and they immediately returned to Rangoon. This stern repulse at first decided Messrs. Judson and Colman to abandon Rangoon and retire to the adjacent district of Arracan, which was under the government of Bengal; but on announcing their decision and its cause to the three Burman disciples, these recent converts from heathenism evinced such firmness of faith, and so eagerly entreated them not to abandon the mission, that it was at length determined that Mr. and Mrs. Judson should remain at Rangoon, while Mr. and Mrs. Colman repaired to Chittagong, in order to provide a place of refuge, in case of persecution, for the members of the mission, and others who might hereafter join them. The plan, however, was entirely frustrated, and Mr. Colman fell a victim to the fever of the climate, at Cox's Bazaar, in 1822.

Meanwhile the mission at Rangoon was awakening a wider and wider interest among the people. In the summer of 1820, Mr. Judson baptized seven additional converts, who at the peril of their lives, professed their faith in Christ. Among them was a learned teacher, who was able to render most important service to the missionaries in translating the Scriptures, and in other labors of the mission. The failing health of Mrs. Judson now rendered it necessary that she should for a time leave the climate, and in the summer of 1821, she embarked for Calcutta for the purpose of taking passage thence to England and the United States. The visit of this accomplished and heroic lady to this country in 1822 and 1823, was productive of many important benefits. It awakened a deeper interest in the mission, and enlarged the contributions of the churches, and especially it was the occasion of several young men dedicating themselves to the service of Christ among the heathen. On her return to Burmah she was accompanied by Rev. Jonathan Wade and Mrs. Wade, and they all reached Rangoon in December, 1823.

During the absence of Mrs. Judson the mission had been also reinforced by the arrival of the Rev. Jonathan Price, a physician as well as minister, who with Mrs. Price arrived at Rangoon near the close of the year 1821, and about the same time Mr. and Mrs. Hough also returned to the mission with the much-needed printing-press and types. So soon as the Burman king learned that Dr. Price was possessed of medical skill, he summoned him to Ava, which was now become the capital of the empire. Accordingly Dr. Price accompanied by Mr. Judson, who alone understood the language, proceeded up the Irrawaddy and presented themselves at the court of the Burman monarch. Mr. J. was recognized by several of the ministers of the court, and in one of his visits at the palace he was particularly questioned by the king respecting his religion, and whether any Burmans had embraced it, and also commanded to show the members of the court the manner in which he preached. During his stay of several months at the capital, while Dr. Price was in high favor with the monarch, Mr. Judson also had many opportunities to commend the new religion to persons in high official stations, and to bespeak for it a toleration from the government. He returned to Rangoon early in 1823, not without a promise given to the king that he would soon come back and bring Mrs. Judson to reside with him at Ava. Accordingly so soon as Mrs. J. landed at Rangoon on her return from the United States, it was arranged that Mr. and Mrs. Judson should proceed to Ava, while Mr. and Mrs. Hough, and Mr. and Mrs. Wade were to remain at Rangoon. Scarcely had these arrangements been carried into execution when the threatened hostilities between Burmah and Great Britain began to spread their blighting influence over the prospects of the mission. These hostilities broke out in open war in May, 1824, when Rangoon was captured by a small fleet of English transports which landed the forces of Europeans and Sepoys under the command of Sir Archibald Campbell.

The war which now began was not terminated till the close of February, 1826, nearly two years from its commencement, by the treaty of Yandaboo, by the terms of which the provinces of Arracan, Maulmain and Mergui, together with a part of Martaban were ceded to the English. It of course, immediately suspended all the operations of the mission at Rangoon, and compelled Messrs. Hough and Wade to retire from the country—while upon Messrs. Judson and Price and their families at Ava it brought calamities and sufferings, protracted through the entire continuance of the war, whose record forms one of the most affecting passages in the history of modern missions. For a full account of these sufferings and the manner in which they were endured by the heroic missionaries, the reader is referred to the lives of Dr. and Mrs. Judson, and also to the history of the American Baptist Missions.

But, notwithstanding the frightful cruelties to which the missionaries had been subjected, they rendered most important services to the Burman king in conducting the negotiations for peace, and on their conclusion, were strongly urged to remain at Ava. Dr. Price acceded to the request and passed the remainder of his life at the Burman capital. Mr. and Mrs. Judson, however, decided to withdraw with the English commander, and henceforward to prosecute the labors of the mission in that portion of the country which had been ceded to the British Government. The place finally selected for this purpose, was Amherst, a town planted by the English as the seat of government for the newly acquired territories, and named for Lord Amherst, at that time the Governor-General of India. Here he left his family under the protection of the British flag, and in the society of British officers, while he accompanied, as translator, the embassy of Mr. Crawford, who in the summer of 1826, repaired to Ava for the purpose of negotiating a commercial treaty with the king. Mr. Judson's motive was to obtain, if possible, a clause in the treaty for securing religious toleration, an enterprise which terminated in failure, and was also associated with events of the most afflictive character; for it was while detained at Ava, by the duties of the embassy, that he received the intelligence of the death of Mrs. Judson, a calamity which was soon followed by the death of his infant daughter. On his return to Amherst he thus found himself a widowed and childless man, on the spot where he had hoped long to share the sympathies of the faithful wife, who during the weary months of his imprisonment had ministered to his necessities with a fidelity that never failed, and a fortitude that was equal to every emergency.

Mr. and Mrs. Wade had already removed to Amherst, and early in 1827 they were joined by Rev. George D. Boardman, and Mrs. Boardman, as missionaries from the United States. But Amherst proved to be inconveniently situated for the purposes of the capital of British Burmah, and Sir Archibald Campbell soon removed the head-quarters of the army to Maulmain, a new town on the Salween river, about twenty-five miles from its mouth. It was at first arranged that Mr. and Mrs. Boardman should settle at Maulmain and that Mr. and Mrs. Wade should remain at Amherst, while Mr. Judson should divide his labors between the two settlements. But Amherst declined as Maulmain grew, and before the beginning of 1828 the entire mission was removed to the new seat of government. This arrangement, however, was not designed to be permanent, and in April, 1828, Mr. Boardman, with his family, settled at Tavoy, a place which had been fixed on as a station of the mission, about one hundred and fifty miles south of Maulmain. It was one of the principal strongholds of Buddhism in British Burmah, and was celebrated for the magnificence of its temples, the number of its priests, and the splendor of its idolatry. Here Mr. Boardman immediately opened a zayat, and commenced the work of teaching, preaching, and conversing with all who would visit him.

From this period the chief stations of the mission in British Burmah, for several years were at Maulmain and Tavoy. These were the permanent homes of the missionaries and the seats of their principal councils and labors. Around these cities, in the neighboring jungle, were also soon established numerous out-stations, or places of preaching and instruction, which became at length the seats of Christian churches and congregations. In Burmah Proper, a little church was still maintained at Rangoon, under the charge of a native pastor, and the missionaries from Maulmain, in 1830, resided several months in this part of the country—Mr. Wade at Rangoon, and Mr. Judson at Prome, a large town on the Irrawaddy, about midway between Rangoon and Ava. The main operations of the mission, however, were of necessity still confined to those portions of Burmah which were under the government of Great Britain. It was during Mr. Judson's residence in Burmah Proper, and especially at Rangoon, that he was able to hasten forward the translation of the Scriptures, which he had previously commenced. He also took advantage of the great assemblages of merchants and others, who came from all parts of the empire to Rangoon, at the great festivals of their religion, to scatter as widely as possible the tracts and books which he had printed, as well as to preach the doctrines of the Gospel. During one of these festivals, which was celebrated with unusual pomp, he was frequently visited by persons from a great distance in the interior, who came to him with the inquiries: "Are you Jesus Christ's man? Give us a writing that tells about Jesus Christ." Others would say to him, "Sir, we hear there is an eternal hell. Pray give us a writing that will tell us how to escape it;" and others still would say, "We have seen a writing that tells about an eternal God. Are you the man that gives away such writings, for we want to know the truth." He estimated the number who visited the mission-house on this occasion alone, with inquiries like these, at not less than six thousand. These inquiries were gratifying fruits of the labors of the mission, which had now been in progress many years, and evidently spread their influence to the remotest portions of the Burman territories.

In the summer of 1831, Mr. Judson returned to Maulmain, where he found that part of the mission greatly advanced during the thirteen months of his absence. It had been strengthened by the arrival of Rev. Messrs. Mason, Kincaid, and Jones, with their wives. The church had been enlarged by numerous baptisms, and the missionaries had extended their labors to distant villages in the jungle, at several of which converts had been baptized. In the annual report of the mission for the year 1831, it is stated that the number who had been baptized during the year was in all two hundred and seventeen. Of these eighty-nine were Europeans, the rest being natives of the country. During the eighteen years which had elapsed since Mr. Judson first landed at Rangoon, the growth of the mission had been slow but constant and healthy. Besides its original seat it now had stations at Maulmain, Tavoy, and Mergui, three of the principal cities on that part of the coast which had been ceded to the English. The missionaries were now fourteen in number—seven males and seven females, and the number who had been baptized and admitted to the churches was three hundred and ninety-three of whom two hundred and eighty were natives, the others being chiefly soldiers of British regiments stationed in the country. The press had printed not less than two hundred thousand tracts and books, among which were the New Testament and several books of the Old Testament. Schools were also established and in successful operation at all the stations in British Burmah, and the mission, in all its departments, was just entering on that career of eminent usefulness and success, which it has since pursued.

For many years after the commencement of the mission in Burmah, the missionaries directed their entire efforts to the conversion of the Burman race, without having much intercourse, or becoming much acquainted with the other races that inhabit the country. When, however, Mr. Boardman went to reside in Tavoy, there was living in his family a man of middle age, who had been a slave, but whose freedom had been purchased by the missionaries. His name was Ko-Thah-byu, one of the race of Karens, or Karians, who are found in great numbers in all parts of Burmah and the neighboring kingdom of Siam. He had already been converted to the Christian faith while at Maulmain, and was baptized soon after his removal to Tavoy. This man's conversion, and his subsequent character, were the means of attracting the particular attention of the missionaries to the singular race to which he belonged, and of establishing among them a mission, whose growth and success have scarcely been equaled by any other of modern times.

This interesting people are widely scattered over the Burman empire, but are entirely distinct from the Burmans, by whom they are regarded as inferiors and slaves. They have adopted many of the customs and modes of life of the Burmans; they are generally industrious, and, with the exception of intemperance, are but little addicted to the vices of barbarian tribes. Their condition is a degraded one, being everywhere oppressed by their Burman masters, and compelled to perform every kind of servile labor. Hence they lead a wandering life, and dwell in temporary villages planted in remote places, in order to escape the exactions of their oppressors. With few exceptions they reject Buddhism, and present the extraordinary phenomenon of a people without any form of religion or established priesthood, but believing in the existence of God and in a state of future retribution, and cherishing a set of religious traditions resembling the truths of revelation, which they transmit from age to age in the poetic legends of their race. Blending with these traditions are some singular prophecies asserting their future elevation as a race, and that white strangers from across the sea would come to bring them "the word of God." It was on this account that when the missionaries first became acquainted with them, they evinced unusual interest in the truths of the Gospel, and regarded them as the fulfilment of the predictions which had been delivered to them by the "Elders" of a former age. These traditions of their race, acting on a people long crushed by oppression, but possessed of unusual moral sensibility, unquestionably gave the missionaries great advantages in their early labors among the Karens.

Mr. Boardman, on his removal to Tavoy, immediately found himself in intimate relations with these people, many of whom were first brought to him by the converted slave, Ko-Thah-byu. The tidings of the arrival of a "White Teacher" soon spread beyond the city into the distant jungle, and brought the Karens in great numbers to the house of the missionary to listen to his instructions. As an illustration of their moral sensibility, the story of the deified book is often mentioned. It had been left in one of their villages some twelve years before by a traveling Mussulman, who was understood to have told the people it was to be worshiped as sacred. Though entirely ignorant of its contents, the person with whom it was left carefully preserved it, and in virtue of possessing it became a kind of sorcerer, of great importance among the people. It was brought one day to Mr. Boardman, and on being unrolled from the coverings in which it was enveloped, it proved to be the "Book of Common Prayer and the Psalms," printed at Oxford. From this period Mr. Boardman devoted the remnant of his too brief life almost exclusively to labors among the Karens. Early in 1829, he made an excursion to the jungle and mountains where their villages were most numerous, and saw much of their condition and modes of life in their native wilds. He also conferred with the British Commissioner for the district, and formed liberal plans for schools, and other agencies of civilization, while he gave a large part of every day to preaching and conversation among the people. In the summer of 1830, however, his strength had become exceedingly reduced by repeated attacks of hemorrhage of the lungs, and he sailed for Maulmain. Here he regained a temporary strength, and after a few months returned to Tavoy, where he found many converts waiting to be baptized, and still many more daily visiting the zayat for religious inquiry and instruction. A large number were baptized by Moun-Ing, one of the native Burman preachers, under the direction of Mr. Boardman. Just at this time Mr. and Mrs. Mason arrived at Tavoy as auxiliaries to the mission, and in their company and that of Mrs. Boardman, this excellent missionary made an excursion into the country for the purpose of meeting and baptizing a large number of converts, who had often visited him in the city. The journey of three days was accomplished, and the baptism of thirty-four persons was performed in his presence by Rev. Mr. Mason. But ere he could reach his home in Tavoy he sunk beneath the exhausting malady which had long pressed upon his constitution. His tomb is at Tavoy, and the marble slab which covers it is inscribed with a simple epitaph, which records his heroic services for the Karens of the neighboring forests and mountains.*

The labors thus nobly begun by Mr. Boardman were continued by Mr. Mason, his successor in the mission at Tavoy, which has been ever since that period almost entirely devoted to the benefit of the Karens. They have, both here and in other parts of Burmah, received the Gospel with far greater readiness than the Burmans themselves. The mission, from its very beginning, was marked by unusual prosperity and success. So rapid was the spread of Christian truth, and the ennobling influence which it exerts, that when, in 1832, Mr. Mason visited the Karen villages, to the south of Tavoy, which had been under the superintendence established by Mr. Boardman, he was surprised at their condition of neatness and order, their regular industry, and their well-ordered worship. In a letter written on the spot, he gives utterance to his feelings in these strong expressions: "I no longer date from a heathen land. Heathenism has fled these banks. I eat the rice and fruits cultivated by Christian hands, look on the fields of Christians, see no dwellings but those of Christian families. I am seated in the midst of a Christian village, surrounded by a people that love as Christians, converse as Christians, act like Christians, and, in my eyes, look like Christians."

The Karens, though they are usually, in some imperfect degree, acquainted with the Burman language, yet have a language of their own, which, however, at this time, had not been reduced to writing. This deficiency not only presented an obstacle to the labors of the missionaries, but it also opposed an effectual barrier to the progress of the people in religious knowledge. Accordingly, in 1832, Mr. Wade, who had been longest acquainted with their spoken tongue, with such aid as he could derive from the Christian Karens, made an alphabet of its elemental sounds, compiled a spelling-book of its most common words, and translated two or three of the tracts already printed in Burman. This was the beginning of a most useful and important work. It has since been carried onward to its completion and perfection; and the Karens now rejoice in a written language taught in their schools, and containing already the rudiments of a Christian literature.

The interval which elapsed between the years 1832 and 1835 was marked by the arrival of large reinforcements of missionaries, and also by the adoption of arrangements for the more systematic prosecution of their diversified labors. At the beginning of this period the number of missionaries, both male and female, at all the stations in Burmah, was fourteen. On the first of January, 1833, were added Rev. Thomas Simons, Mr. Hancock, a printer, and his wife, and Miss Cummings, a teacher; and in the following June, Rev. Messrs. Brown and Webb, with their wives, and Miss Harrington, afterwards Mrs. Simons, the latter company repairing almost immediately to Rangoon. In connection with the former of these missionary companies were also received two additional printing-presses, a large font of types, and the materials for a type foundry, by means of which tracts and portions of the Scriptures were soon printed at Maulmain in the Burman, the Karen, and the Taling or Peguan languages. These missionary companies were followed by a third company, who landed at Amherst on the 6th of December, 1834, consisting of Rev. Messrs. Howard, Vinton, Dean, and Comstock, and Mr. Osgood, a printer, with their wives, and Miss Gardner, who was to be employed as a teacher. Mr. Dean was destined for a new mission just at that time established in the kingdom of Siam. Thus within the space of two years there arrived in Burmah reinforcements numbering in all not less than eighteen missionaries, both male and female, with other important accessions to the apparatus of the mission. During the period in question, also, Mr. Judson brought to its completion his translation of the Bible into the Burman tongue. It had been his daily task amid the vicissitudes of many years. It had been his solace in grief, his companion in solitude, his support in weariness and depression. It was completed on the 31st of January, 1834, and on its completion the heroic and faithful missionary "retires alone, and with the last leaf of his imperishable work in his hand, he prays for the forgiveness of Heaven on all the sins that have mingled with his labors, and devoutly commends it to the mercy and the grace of God, to be used as an instrument in converting the heathen to Himself." Mr. Kincaid, who was attached to the department of the mission in Burmah Proper, in April, 1833, ascended the Irrawaddy from Rangoon, and, after landing at a multitude of villages on the banks of the river, reached Ava, the Burman capital, on the 30th of May, where he maintained a branch of the mission for a period of more than four years. Early in 1836 he was joined by Mr. Cutter, the printer, from Rangoon, who also brought one of the printing-presses; but the mission was jealously watched by the Buddhist priests and the officers of government, and though Mr. Kincaid had an opportunity of studying Burman character in favorable circumstances, and also of exploring the country beyond Ava, he was able to accomplish but few results that have contributed to the advancement of the mission in that portion of the empire. He, however, lingered at Ava, with several of his associates of the mission, until the summer of 1837, when, in consequence of a civil war and the accession of a new king, who threatened again to commence hostilities with the English, they abandoned the station, and soon afterwards, with the missionaries at Rangoon, repaired to Maulmain or to other portions of British Burmah. They left at Ava a church of twenty-seven members, which had been gathered by their labors.

One of the most important undertakings belonging to this period of the mission was the attempt to unite the Christian Karens, who were scattered over the jungle, in compact villages, where they might pursue the avocations of regular industry, and be united in Christian churches, supplied with ministers and the ordinances of the Gospel. In this manner a number of Christian villages were formed under the auspices of the missionaries, and adopted as out-stations of the mission. The principal of these villages were within a district sixty miles around Maulmain and Tavoy, and among them were Wadesville, Newville, Chummerah, Dong-Yahn, and Matah. They were composed principally of Karens, but their formation belongs to a period prior to any separate organization of the Karen and Burman missions. As a step in the civilization of the people, and their progress in the social virtues which Christianity enjoins, it was exceedingly important, and, it is believed, has been productive of many beneficial results.

In April, 1835, the American Baptist Triennial Convention—the name which the missionary organization of the Baptists of the United States then bore—held its eighth triennial session at Richmond, Va. Twenty-three years had now elapsed since, in poverty and weakness, in misgiving and doubt, this association had been formed for the spread of the Gospel among the heathen. The number of missionaries who were now in the field, and the results which they had been enabled to accomplish, filled its members with new energy and hope. Large and liberal plans were devised, and assurances were given of more effective aid from the churches in all parts of the country. The Board of the Convention de-terminated to send one of their number, Rev. Howard Malcom, D.D., to visit the stations and advise with the missionaries respecting the best mode of conducting their labors. This service was performed by Dr. Malcom, who sailed from the United States in the year 1835, and returned in 1838, during which period he visited the missions of the Board in Burmah and other countries of Asia.*

The early periods of a Christian mission planted in a heathen land are necessarily periods of experiment. This was particularly true in the infancy of modern Protestant missions. They were undertaken without experience, and the best mode of conducting them was but imperfectly apprehended. Even now, after the lapse of more than forty years, many questions are still unsettled and many principles yet remain to be adequately tested and established. This remark finds frequent illustration in the operations of the Burman mission at the period of which we now write. In this outline, however, it is impossible to do more than refer to the leading features of the general plan in accordance with which those operations were conducted.

The general organization of the mission for some years subsequent to 1835, was but an expansion and development of that which had been established on the settlement of the missionaries in British Burmah. The three great stations of the mission were at the three capital cities of the provinces ceded to the English, Maulmain, Tavoy and Mergui. Besides these, a station, as we have already seen, was maintained, not without several interruptions, at Rangoon, in the kingdom of Burmah, and also for short intervals at Ava and at Prome. In the districts around each of these central stations, there were numerous villages designated as out-stations, at which Zayats for preaching were maintained and in some of which schools were established and churches were organized. At some of these villages missionaries and teachers resided during as much of the year as the climate would allow, while to others they made only occasional visits, the preaching being performed principally by the ordained native assistants, who had now become quite numerous both among Burmans and Karens. The labors of the missionaries were exceedingly varied, and amid the inequalities of an eastern climate and the imperfect physical comforts with which they were obliged to be content, often proved exceedingly injurious to the constitution. At the principal stations of the mission they were engaged in frequent public preaching, in daily conversation with all who would come to inquire, in the study of the language, in the writing of tracts and the translation of the Scriptures, and in superintending the operations of the several presses, of which they were now in possession. During the rainy season they were for the most part restricted to the large towns and fully occupied in the employments above indicated. So soon, however, as the rains had ceased, they went forth from their homes to visit the villages and out-stations that were scattered over the jungle within the field of their operations. Traveling in litters over the mountains or embarking in boats upon the rivers, they made their way once or twice each year, to all the out-stations of the mission—preaching and distributing books as they went, instructing the churches and their pastors, inspecting the schools—baptizing new converts, forming new churches, planting new stations according to the wants of the rural population whom they met. The incidents of their excursions to the jungle are often recorded in the journals of the missionaries, and they furnish the best illustration which can be given of the modes of life in the mission.

The schools were for the most part under the direction of the ladies who were attached to the several stations, and it sometimes happened that a solitary female teacher would spend the entire dry season at one of these distant villages, engaged in the work of instructing the rude people around her. This was especially true of the villages of Dong-Yahn and Chummerah, the former thirty-five and the latter some sixty miles from Maulmain. At these places schools were maintained for several years by Miss Macomber at one and Miss Cummings at the other, which were brought to a close only by the early death of these indefatigable and heroic ladies. Separate schools were usually maintained for the Burmans and Karens, and in some places for other races of the country, and those in Maulmain and Tavoy were in part supported by allowances from the British East India Company, and embraced instruction in English and in the rudiments of general education as well as of religious knowledge. This arrangement, however, was not permanent, as it proved to impair the control which it was necessary that the missionaries should exercise over the schools. In addition to these a higher seminary was established at Tavoy in 1836, for instructing native converts of suitable qualifications in the doctrines of Christianity, in order to prepare them to preach the Gospel to their countrymen. It was opened in May of that year with eighteen pupils, of whom twelve were Karens—five were Burmans and Peguans, and one was a Hindoo. It was at first placed under the charge of Mr. Wade, but on the failure of his health, at the close of 1837, the school at Tavoy was suspended and another especially for Burmans was immediately opened at Maulmain, to which the Burman pupils were removed. This was placed under the charge of Rev. Edward A. Stevens, who has ever since devoted himself largely to this department of labor.

In 1835 a branch of the mission was commenced by Rev. Mr. Comstock and Mrs. Comstock at Kyouk-Phyoo, in Arracan, one of the provinces which had been ceded to the English by the treaty of Yandaboo in 1826, containing a population of about two hundred and fifty thousand souls of the same races as the people of Burmah. This part of the mission however, was but imperfectly sustained for several years, in consequence of the feeble health of Mr. and Mrs. Comstock, and the early death of Rev. Levi Hall and Mrs. Hall, who arrived in Arracan in 1837, but died before their labors began. After a year's absence Mr. and Mrs. Comstock, in 1839, returned to Arracan bringing with them Rev. Lyman Stilson and his wife, but they now settled in Ramree, where they hoped to find a climate more favorable to health than that of Kyouk-Phyoo. They were accompanied by four or five native assistants, by whose aid they immediately established schools and the other agencies usually employed in a mission. This was the condition of affairs in Arracan when Messrs. Kincaid and Abbott arrived in the province in 1840, on finding themselves obliged to abandon their stations in Burmah Proper. Their object in going to Arracan was to be in a situation as favorable as possible for keeping up a communication with the native churches and pastors, and the numerous inquirers whom they had left under the cruel sway of the Burman king. For this purpose Mr. Kincaid went to Akyab, where he established a mission for the Arracanese, and Mr. Abbott repaired to Sandoway, near the Burman frontier, in order to be as near as possible to the Karens in the districts of Bassein and Rangoon. He soon contrived to send information of his residence, to the people on the other side of the mountain ridge which separates the two countries, and though the passes were constantly guarded by jealous Burman officers, the eager Karens found their way in great numbers across the mountains to Mr. Abbott, some asking for baptism, others seeking books for their countrymen at home, and others still desiring to remain and study with the missionary. They came from the districts of Maubee and Pantanau, and even from the vicinity of Rangoon, telling him of the progress of the Gospel among their countrymen. Through a wide extent of country, village after village received the Gospel, and within the first year of his residence at Sandoway Mr. Abbott baptized nearly two hundred of those simple-hearted and interesting people. He made occasional visits to the Burman frontier and entered the territory of the king, always finding scores of converts awaiting his coming, and desiring to be baptized. In one of these excursions in which he was absent thirty-one days, he visited all the churches along the frontier, received reports from all the native pastors and preachers, and administered the ordinance of baptism to two hundred and seventy-nine persons who professed their faith in Christ. During the year 1844 the number of persons baptized by Mr. Abbott and his native assistants through the regions here referred to was upwards of two thousand, and the whole number thus baptized within five years after his arrival at Sandoway was considerably more than three thousand, a number larger than had at that time been baptized in all the other missions of the American Baptist Board taken together. But these numbers but imperfectly indicate the extent to which the Gospel began to exert its influence on the Karens of that district. Multitudes more were instructed in its doctrines, and became obedient to its precepts, though they never presented themselves to the missionary for baptism. An entire change came over the population of the district. They assumed an aspect of higher civilization. They became honest and industrious; the vices common to their race disappeared, and they were eager for knowledge, and every kind of personal and social improvement.

In 1843 the persecution of the Christian Karens, which for a time had been intermitted, was renewed with increased violence, and these poor people were subjected to cruel and vengeful sufferings inflicted on them by their Burman oppressors. Large numbers of them were seized and chained together, and marched away in companies to distant prisons, from which they were liberated only by the payment of a ransom which exhausted their entire wealth. They bore these persecutions with heroic Christian fortitude. They refused to abandon the faith which they had embraced, and maintained it with a firmness which commanded the respect even of their persecutors, and commended the Gospel still more widely to the people around them. So frequent and violent were these persecutions that the Karens, in large companies, abandoned their homes and their country and fled across the mountains to Arracan. In the course of a single season Mr. Abbott received upwards of two hundred families at Sandoway. Many others went to other regions, and many perished by the way from the ravages of the cholera; but the emigration of these humble martyrs for conscience sake, still went on till the districts to which they belonged were well nigh depopulated. They awakened the sympathy not only of the missionaries, but also of the resident English, who made contributions for their comfort and support. The pages of missionary history do not record a more signal display of divine grace than was seen among these simple dwellers among the mountains of Arracan. With but little instruction from human lips, they seem to have been largely taught of the Holy Ghost. With no outward aids or encouragements, they clung to their faith with a tenacity that nothing could subdue, and in the day of frightful persecution they literally gave up all for Christ.

Such were the labors of Mr. Abbott at Sandoway, during this interesting period of Karen awakening and persecution. He was to them not merely their religious teacher, but protector and friend. He provided for the necessities of the emigrant families, found them places of settlement and productive occupation, and enlisted in their behalf the sympathies and active charities of the humane Europeans who were residing in the country. These varied cares and labors, however, combining with the heaviest of domestic afflictions, soon made serious inroads upon his strong constitution, and in 1845 he was compelled to seek a change of climate by a brief return to the United States.

Meanwhile Messrs. Kincaid and Stilson remained for two or three years at Akyab, where they found a small native church, which had been planted many years before by some English missionaries. Their arrival immediately gave new life to the Christian disciples, and in a little time they were surrounded by a large congregation, among whom several appeared to be sincere inquirers respecting the new religion. This indication of interest, however, soon awakened the jealousy of the Buddhist priests and other persons of influence, but the church still increased in spite of the opposition, and another was now planted at an out-station called Cruda, five days' journey from Akyab. In the course of the year 1841, the missionaries were visited by several persons belonging to a tribe dwelling among the mountains, and known as the Kemees. They were, in many respects, especially in their docility and moral sensibility, very similar to the Karens. These people soon sent to Mr. Kincaid a formal invitation, signed by their chief and several of his subordinates, urging him to visit them in their mountains, and promising to send their children to school, if he would establish one in their village. The invitation was soon followed by a visit from the chief himself, who came in person, to urge his request. Both the missionaries soon afterwards visited these interesting people and in several subsequent visits and frequent intercourse with them at Akyab, Mr. Stilson mastered the peculiarities of their dialect, and prepared to reduce it to writing, in order that a branch of the mission might soon be established among them. But Mr. Kincaid was soon obliged, by ill-health, to leave the province; and the absence of Mr. Abbott and the lamented death of both Mr. and Mrs. Comstock, left Mr. and Mrs. Stilson the solitary conductors of the entire mission in Arracan. The plans which had been formed for the Kemees were, in consequence, of necessity abandoned, and they have since been but imperfectly carried into execution.

While these changes, both joyous and sad, were in progress in Arracan, the branches of the mission established in the other provinces of British Burmah, or Tenasserim, as it was now called, were still prosecuted with varying success. Their principal stations, as has been mentioned, were at Maulmain, Tavoy and Mergui, the two former of which had become so extensive as to be organized into separate missions, and to be designated as such. At Maulmain there were residing in 1840, Messrs. Judson, Howard, Stevens, Osgood and Simons, in connection with the Burman department, and Mr. Vinton, in connection with the Karen department of the mission. At Amherst, also, was a secondary station, where Mr. Haswell was engaged in preaching to the Talings or Peguans, and in translating the New Testament into their language. The ladies of the mission, at both these stations, were usually employed in the schools, some for Burmans and others for Karens. Around Maulmain were now seven other tributary stations, all for Karens, which were generally under the charge of native assistants, but were visited by the missionaries at least once during every dry season. The number of churches thus connected with what was called the Maulmain mission was seven, containing in all, four hundred and fifty-four members.

The mission at Tavoy, though embracing a single Burman church, was devoted almost exclusively to the Karen population of the city and district. There were dwelling there in 1840, only Messrs. Wade and Mason, with their wives, Messrs. Bennett and Hancock being at the time absent on account of ill-health. Around Tavoy were eight out-stations, all having churches, now numbering four hundred and seventy-three members. Mergui was a tributary station of this mission, and was the residence of Mr. Ingalls, a preacher in Burman, and Mr. Brayton, a preacher in Karen. In the vicinity of Mergui, and under the care of its missionaries, were also eight out-stations, with six churches, numbering in all, one hundred and thirty-one members. Under the direction of the missionaries at Maulmain were thirty native assistants and seven schools of different grades, for a population of several different races, while at Tavoy there were sixteen schools, nearly all for Karens, and twenty native assistants. The schools and the native assistants, both at Tavoy and Maulmain, however, were supported in part by contributions of benevolent individuals residing in those cities.

Mr. Judson, though usually preaching on the Sabbath to the Burman congregation at Maulmain, devoted his largest labor to the work of revising his translation of the Burman Bible, a work which he prosecuted with the utmost care, and which he found to cost him even more time and labor than the translation itself. It was committed to press in October, 1840, twenty-seven years after his first attempt at learning the language. It has been often examined by critics and philologists acquainted with the Burman tongue, and has been, we believe, invariably pronounced to be an excellent translation. It will for ever remain in the literature of the country, the noblest memorial of the illustrious missionary who first introduced the Gospel to the Burman people. Soon after its completion Mr. Judson began the preparation of a Dictionary in English and Burmese, a work to which he had been repeatedly urged by missionaries, and which he now undertook at the special request of the Board, as an important and much needed aid in prosecuting the mission. The Burman Theological School at Maulmain, was continued by Mr. Stevens till 1841, when, in consequence of the small number of pupils, it was suspended till 1844, and then reopened, though with only eight members. The Burman race, though that to which the missionaries were originally sent, at this time had received the Gospel with far less readiness than the Karens, whom they everywhere despised and oppressed. Superior in intelligence and in social position, they yet clung to their ancient superstitions, and turned away from the revelation of God which had been given to them. The Karens, on the contrary, though furnished with more limited means of instruction, presented one of the most remarkable instances on record, of a people readily accepting the Gospel of Christ. Its influence was now perceptible wherever their villages were scattered throughout the provinces of Tenasserim, in the elevation of individual and social character and the growth of all the kindly charities and domestic virtues of civilized life. The entire New Testament was not translated into their language till 1843, but long before that time, the churches and schools which had sprung up among them were so numerous as to far transcend the ability of the missionaries to give them adequate supervision and instruction. The officers of the East India Company, in these provinces, co-operated with the missionaries in promoting their improvement, and protecting them from Burman oppression, and though of necessity left, in a great degree, to the care of native assistants, who were but imperfectly instructed themselves, they yet exhibited a striking illustration of the power of Christian truth over the characters and manners of a rude and barbarous people. In order to supply these obvious deficiencies in the Karen department of the mission, it was decided by the Board of managers, to establish, without delay, a school for the instruction of Karen preachers, and Rev. J. G. Binney, pastor of the First Baptist Church in Savannah, Ga., was appointed to assume the charge of it. He sailed from Boston, in November, 1843, in company with Rev. E. B. Bullard, and Mr. T. S. Ranney, a printer, with their wives, and Miss Julia Lathrop, all appointed to the mission at Tavoy, with the exception of Mr. and Mrs. Binney, who were to be stationed at Maulmain. They were followed in the succeeding year by Rev. E. B. Cross and his wife, and also a teacher for the Karens.

The missionaries at Mergui, at this period, became acquainted with a singular people inhabiting the islands on the coast and known by the general name of Salongs. They evinced much interest in the teachings that were imparted to them, and a large number of them professed their faith in Christ and were baptized. Their language was reduced to writing by Mr. Stevens, and schools were established for their instruction, for the support of which a thousand rupees were contributed by Major Broadfoot, the liberal-minded and generous Commissioner for the district of Mergui.

In April, 1834, Dr. Judson had married Mrs. Sarah H. Boardman, who since the death of Mr. Boardman, had been connected with the mission at Tavoy, as one of the most efficient and devoted of its members. From the date of her marriage to Dr. Judson she had been residing at Maulmain, and had shared in all the vicissitudes of labor and patience through which her husband had been called to pass. But her health had now become seriously and it was apprehended fatally impaired, and her physicians prescribed a voyage beyond the tropics as the only means of prolonging her valuable life. Accordingly, in April, 1845, Dr. Judson and Mrs. Judson embarked at Maulmain on a voyage to the United States. He took with him his two Burman interpreters, thinking thus to hasten forward the preparation of the Burman and English Dictionary to which he was then devoting his constant labors. On his arrival at the Isle of France, however, he sent back the interpreters, hoping from the apparent improvement of Mrs. Judson's health, that he might soon return himself. But in this he was doomed to be disappointed. The health of Mrs. Judson soon began again to decline, and she died on her arrival at St. Helena, Sept. 1, 1845. The now solitary missionary, with his three eldest children, who had accompanied their parents, proceeded on his voyage and arrived at Boston on the 15th of the following October. He remained in the United States till the following July, a period of nearly nine months, when he took his final leave of his native land, and returned to his station in the mission.

The circumstances and results of this visit of Dr. Judson to the land of his birth were marked with unusual interest, and are worthy of a brief mention in this narrative. He had been absent thirty-three years, during which he had been living in the midst of oriental heathenism, associating with races of inferior civilization and speaking languages of strange and uncouth structure. From the honored Board of Commissioners under whose auspices he had first become a missionary, he had withdrawn, and for many years had been acting under the direction and depending upon the support of those whom he had never seen. The country too, which he had left thirty-three years before, had entirely changed in nearly every phase of its social and religious life. Art and commerce and Christianity had multiplied their wondrous triumphs on every hand. The missionary was bewildered at the amazing contrast, between all that he had left and all that he had now gazed upon. The homes of his boyhood—the places of his education—the large cities and the humble villages were alike changed, till the land seemed no longer to be the land of his nativity. He was everywhere received with an honor and respect for which nothing could have prepared him. He was publicly welcomed at Boston by the officers of the Board, and in every city which he visited throughout the land he was received with an interest and attention such as are seldom accorded to any private individual. Members of every Christian denomination and citizens of every rank were eager to do honor to a man who had proved himself, by a lifelong service, to be a benefactor of mankind. In November, 1845, a month after his arrival, he was present at the meeting of the American Baptist Missionary Union, and for the first time became acquainted with the brethren and friends under whose guidance and support the noble labors of his missionary life had been performed. His presence everywhere awakened the liveliest interest and enthusiasm. The history of American missions seemed to be embodied in him, and the cause in which he had so long toiled and suffered touched new sensibilities in the hearts of the people. During his visit in the United States, he married Miss Emily Chubbuck, of Hamilton, New York, with whom he embarked for Maulmain on the 11th July, 1846. The same ship also bore to the missions Rev. Messrs. Harris and Beecher and their wives, and Miss Lydia Lillybridge; Mr. and Mrs. Harris being appointed to the Karen department of the mission at Maulmain, and Mr. and Mrs. Beecher to Arracan, while Miss Lillybridge was to remain with Dr. and Mrs. Judson in the Burman department of the mission. They reached the port of their destination in the following December, and soon afterwards entered their several spheres of labor.

During the absence of Dr. Judson, Mrs. Mason and Mrs. Ingalls had been removed by death, Mr. Simons had returned to the United States and Mr. and Mrs. Osgood had withdrawn from the mission in consequence of ill health. The brutal and tyrannical Burman king Thara-wadi, who usurped the throne in 1837, had been overthrown, and a regency had been formed which it was hoped would prove less unfriendly to the labors of the missionaries. In this new state of affairs, Dr. Judson, a few weeks after his arrival, repaired to Rangoon in order to ascertain the disposition of the new government with respect to the mission. He continued to reside there for several months, but received neither encouragement nor prohibition from either the local or the imperial government. Few ventured to visit him for religious instruction, and though he was gradually gathering the scattered members of the Rangoon church, he at length learned that an order had been issued to watch the missionary's house, and apprehend any who might visit him to inquire about the new religion.* Dr. Judson at first thought of proceeding to Ava, again to solicit toleration from the imperial government, but in the limited resources of the treasury of the mission, he was compelled to abandon the attempt and soon afterwards returned to Maulmain, where he continued to reside and to work upon his Dictionary with but little interruption to the end of his life.

In August, 1847, Mr. Abbott left the United States on his return to Arracan. He went by the way of England, and hastening by the overland route to Calcutta, reached Sandoway early in December. By journeying thus rapidly he was able to fulfil an engagement which he had made with his native assistants, that if his life should be spared he would meet them in January, 1848, at Ong-kyoung, where he had given them his parting instructions three years before. He immediately announced his arrival among the scattered villages of the Karens, both in Arracan and across the mountains in Burmah Proper. The assistants came together at Ong-kyoung according to their appointment, early in January, and reported the condition of their several flocks and the labors in which they had been engaged; and most encouraging was the report which they made. Of the two ordained ministers, Tway-poh, who was at the head of the churches in Arracan, had baptized six hundred converts; and Myat-Kyan, who, though living in Arracan, had preached principally among the Karens of Burmah, had baptized five hundred and fifty. The period of the missionary's absence had been one of remarkable progress in the interests of the mission. Mr. Abbott had left twenty native assistants, who were preachers but not ordained to the ministry. Of them two had died, and one had been suspended by his associates, while sixteen others had been added to the number, and the thirty-three native preachers now reported not less than twelve hundred converts in their several districts, who were waiting to be baptized and received into the churches.

In the autumn of 1847, Rev. W. Moore and his wife, and in the following summer, Rev. Messrs. Van Meter, C. C. Moore, and Judson Benjamin, and their wives, were appointed missionaries to Burmah, and sailed for the scene of their future labors; one of them being designated to the Burmese department of the mission at Arracan, and the other three to the Karen missions at Maulmain, Sandoway, and Tavoy.

Early in 1849, the Burman and the Karen departments of the mission at Maulmain were separated from each other, and for the purpose of greater economy and efficiency were organized as separate missions, the Karen mission having already been established in a separate part of the city, which had received the name of Newton. In the same manner and at about the same time, the Karen department of the mission in Arracan was erected into a separate mission of which the principal seat was Sandoway. Thus organized in independent bodies, these missions greatly extended the sphere of their influence, and by a judicious division of their labors and endeavors, entered upon an era of enlarged prosperity and usefulness. From the report of the managers in 1850, just after the new organization of these missions, it appears that there were attached to the Maulmain Burman Mission, Rev. Messrs. Judson, Stevens, and Stilson, Mr. Ranney, a printer, and their wives, Rev. Mr. Simons, and Miss Lillybridge, a teacher, all of whom resided in Maulmain, while Rev. Messrs. Wade, Haswell, and Howard with their families, were members of the mission, but absent on account of ill-health. In addition to these there were thirteen native assistants, three of whom were stationed at Amherst. Attached to the Maulmain Karen Mission at this period, were Rev. Messrs. Binney, Harris, and W. Moore, with their wives, and Miss Vinton and Miss Wright, teachers, Rev. Mr. Vinton and his wife being absent in the United States. In addition to these were thirty-four native assistants, of whom five were ordained preachers, and three were teachers, at Maulmain and the numerous out-stations of the mission. Connected with the nine churches of these two missions were upwards of nineteen hundred members, of whom more than seventeen hundred were Karens. There were also at Maulmain, a theological school for Karen preachers, and a normal school for teachers, together with a number of other schools, both for the Karen and the Burman population. In the mission at Tavoy, of which Mergui had now become a station, were Rev. Messrs. Mason, Bennett, Cross, Benjamin, and Brayton, with their wives, Mr. Brayton residing at Mergui. This mission has been almost exclusively for the Karens, and around its two stations were fourteen out-stations at the Karen villages which are scattered over the jungle, where were also employed under the direction of the missionaries, nineteen native assistants of various orders. In its twenty-seven churches were also about eighteen hundred members. The Arracan Mission was now established at two stations, Akyab and Ramree, the former embracing Rev. Messrs. C. C. Moore and L. Ingalls; the latter Rev. Messrs. Knapp and Campbell, with their wives, who had been appointed but had not arrived at the station. Near Akyab was the single out-station of Cruda, and the number of native assistants attached to the mission was six. The Sandoway mission, which was designed for the Karens in its immediate vicinity, and also for those beyond the mountains in Burmah Proper, where the Gospel could not be preached, comprised at this time Rev. Messrs. Abbott, Beecher, and Van Meter, with their wives. It embraced one station and thirty-six out-stations, and in addition to its missionaries, gave employment to forty-four native preachers and assistants. The number of churches was thirty-six, and the whole number of church members about four thousand five hundred.

Of these several missions, that at Sandoway probably extended its labors over the widest sphere, for it was designed for the persecuted Karens who dwelt in the neighboring districts of Burmah Proper, and who, beneath the severe oppressions of a cruel government, evinced the most extraordinary readiness to receive the Gospel of Christ. Though each of the missions was to some extent supported by contributions gathered from its own churches, yet this was true of the Sandoway mission more fully than of any other. The efforts and sacrifices of these humble Christians to secure the blessings of the Gospel and to maintain its institutions in their villages, afford the noblest proof of the sincerity of their faith and the fervor of their piety. Several churches erected chapels at their own expense; others supported their native pastors, while all contributed in some way or other to the pecuniary maintenance of the mission. Mr. Abbott repeatedly attempted to obtain a permanent footing for the mission in Burmah Proper, where so many of its converts were found, but though he occasionally visited Bassein and the neighboring districts he was wholly unsuccessful in securing the toleration of the government or even a permission for permanent residence. He, however, was accustomed as frequently as practicable to meet the native pastors and preachers of these districts for the purpose of becoming familiar with their labors, and advising in their prosecution; and at these interviews he would often administer the rite of baptism to large numbers of converts whom the assistants brought to him for the purpose. At these and other similar meetings in all the missions, the missionaries were accustomed to impart instruction and give advice to the assistants and the converts, on all subjects which might require their attention, whether relating to the doctrines and duties of the Gospel, or their own interests and prosperity as a people.

Associated with the mission at Tavoy were the labors which were undertaken among the Salongs, a rude and oppressed people, about 10,000 in number, scattered among the islands on the coast; and with the mission in Arracan was connected a department for the Kemees, an interesting people, among the mountains of that province, whose character and condition, as has already been stated, have enlisted the sympathies of the missionaries.

The return of Dr. Judson to Burmah, and his settlement at Maulmain, after an attempt to establish himself at Rangoon, or at Ava, have already been mentioned. Here he continued to reside, constantly occupied with the preparation of the Burman and English Dictionary, to which the closing years of his life were principally devoted. He was excluded from the kingdom of Burmah; but at Maulmain, under the protection of the British government, and with many facilities for the prosecution of his work, he gave himself to the completion of a task, whose accomplishment he fondly hoped would confer immeasurable advantages on all future missionaries, and thus greatly promote the progress of the Gospel wherever the Burman language is spoken. The English-Burmese portion had already been completed and nearly printed; and the Burmese and English portion was well advanced when the venerable compiler was obliged to lay down the pen with which he was completing his noble work. In the autumn of 1849, his enfeebled constitution began to give signs of decay, and in a few weeks he was compelled to abandon his labors, and seek such means of recruiting his strength as the country and the climate would allow. He made a trip to Mergui, and repaired to Amherst for sea-bathing; but his strength continued to decline the more rapidly in consequence of an attack of fever, and his physicians pronounced a protracted voyage the only prescription with which they could associate any hope of benefit. In accordance with their directions, he took passage early in April, on board a French ship bound to the Isle of France. It was several days before the vessel was fairly at sea; but the ocean airs brought no invigoration to his worn and fevered frame. The pilot left the vessel on the 8th of April, and on the 12th of the same month Dr. Judson breathed his latest breath, and on the same day his remains were buried at sea. His life had been wholly devoted to the mission, which, in solitude and persecution, he had planted on the shores of Burmah; and the tidings of his death awakened a profound sense of bereavement and sorrow among its members. As the intelligence spread from land to land, it carried grief to Christian hearts in every part of the world; while in the country of his birth, and among the churches with which he was particularly connected, it called forth the sincerest demonstrations of respect for his memory, and of gratitude for the good he had wrought. Mrs. Judson, herself in declining health, and those of his children who were in Burmah, returned to the United States in the autumn of 1851, and retired to the home of her parents, at Hamilton, N. Y. Here she has employed the hours which could be spared from the care of her family, in enriching the literature of Christian missions with the productions of her own beautiful genius, and especially in contributing many a passage of touching reminiscence and life-like delineation to the memoirs of her departed husband—passages without which, in the absence of other materials, that admirable work must have been divested of many of its most attractive features. As we write these closing pages of this rapid sketch of the missions in Burmah, the beautiful and heroic life of Mrs. Judson has been brought to a peaceful close, in June, 1854, at her home in Hamilton. The works which she contributed to the literature of the age, are a fitting illustration of her rare genius, while the brief records of her missionary career will transmit to other ages the memorials of her piety, and the sentiments of duty, faith and love which ever dwelt in the depth of her woman's heart.

In October, 1849, there sailed from the United States, under appointment for the several missions in Burmah, Rev. Messrs. Harvey E. Knapp, Harvey E. Campbell, and their wives, and Miss Elizabeth T. Wright. In the course of the year 1850, they were followed by Rev. Eugenio Kincaid and Mrs. Kincaid, who had formerly been connected with the missions, and also by Dr. John Dawson, a physician, and Rev. Benjamin C. Thomas, and their wives; Mr. Thomas being appointed especially to Mergui, or the Tavoy mission, while Mr. Kincaid and Dr. Dawson were commissioned to repair, if possible, to Ava, or to some other leading place in the kingdom of Burmah, and there to commence a mission. They arrived at Maulmain early in 1851, and repaired to Rangoon in the following March, where, having established their families, they commenced their labors, designing, as soon as the rainy season ceased, to ascend the Irrawaddy to Ava. They soon found themselves jealously and closely watched by the Burman governor of Rangoon. They were forbidden to distribute books or to associate with the people, and those who visited them were punished with fines, scourging and imprisonment. At length, early in May, a message came from the king, that "the American teachers were to be treated with all possible favor," and an entire change was immediately wrought in the manner and bearing of the governor. Public worship, and the various operations of a mission were commenced. A medical dispensary was opened, and multitudes of Burmans and Karens, many of them from a great distance in the interior, both converts and inquirers, flocked to the residence of the missionaries. The scriptures were widely circulated; four Burmans and five Karens soon received the rite of Christian baptism, and the Christian converts of former years were gathered from their wide dispersion to the instructions of the missionaries and the ordinances of the Gospel.

But in the midst of these scenes of temporary encouragement which marked the summer and autumn of 1851, was preparing an event that was destined to alter the entire condition of the Burman people, and to prepare the way for the universal dissemination of the Gospel over a thickly peopled country, in which the missionaries had sought, in vain, for nearly forty years, to obtain a permanent footing. This event was the war between Burmah and Great Britain—a war which was wantonly provoked by the faithlessness of the Burman government and its reckless encroachments on the interests and rights of the British East India Company. Hostilities were commenced, in November, 1851, by the unexpected firing of the Burman stockades, on some British war steamers which were ascending the river. Negotiations were attempted, in order to settle difficulties which had been of long standing, but with no other effect than to delay a war which had now become inevitable. The relations of the two parties became daily more and more disturbed, and after several collisions between the forces, war was formally declared on February 15th, 1852. The missionaries, and other foreign residents at Rangoon, took refuge on board the English ships, in the preceding December, and soon afterward sailed to Maulmain, where they remained till Rangoon, Martaban, and Bassein had fallen before the advance of the British arms. So soon as hostilities ceased, they returned to what was formerly Rangoon, but they found the ancient city almost entirely destroyed, and a new city already rising from the ruins—laid out according to English ideas of order and regularity, and rapidly filling up with a population gathered from all parts of India. They immediately established themselves in a part of the town well suited to their purpose, in a large Kyoung or Burman monastery, and resumed their labors as missionaries among all classes of the heterogeneous population. Unusual success soon crowned their labors. British soldiers were converted to Christ; and Burmans and Karens, no longer deterred by the jealous tyranny of priests or rulers, eagerly embraced the Gospel. They were soon afterwards joined by other missionaries from Maulmain and Sandoway, who came to preach the Gospel in a region from which they had hitherto been excluded, but where they found multitudes, especially of Karens, already instructed in its doctrines and clinging to its hopes. Meanwhile British arms were everywhere triumphant, and on the 20th of December, 1852, the entire southern portion of the kingdom of Burmah, including the ancient province of Pegu, was incorporated with the territories of British India. This district embraces the whole of Burmah, lying between the Salwen river on the east, the Yoma mountains on the west, and the Bay of Bengal on the south, and extending north to the 19th parallel of north latitude, about fifty miles above the city of Prome. It embraces an area of about 45,000 square miles, and a population of 2,500,000: Burmans, Karens, Peguans, and the other races common in Burmah.

The portion of this territory around Martaban is annexed to the Amherst district, of which Maulmain is the capital, while the remaining part is divided for the purposes of civil government into five separate districts, each of which is placed under the charge of an Assistant-Commissioner, who is accountable to the Commissioner of the territory, and through him to the Governor-General of India. These districts are Pegu—which includes Rangoon, Toungoo, Henthada, Prome, and Bassein. Such is the region which, as the result of the late war, has been liberated forever from Burman oppression, and incorporated with the British possessions in the East. It embraces districts in which, in spite of intolerance and persecution, the Gospel has already won some of its most remarkable triumphs among the Karens, and it is now placed under the general rule of a liberal-minded and pious Commissioner,* who, during his long residence in the East, has proved himself the active and unfailing friend of Christian missions, and the moral improvement of the people.

In anticipation of this altered condition of the missions in Burmah, and the new fields which the progress of British power might open for their occupancy, the Executive Committee of the Board of Managers requested the missionaries in Burmah to assemble in convention in Maulmain in the spring of 1853, to consider what changes should be made in the organization and modes of prosecuting the missions. They also appointed Rev. Solomon Peck, D.D., the Senior Corresponding Secretary of the Board, and Rev. James N. Granger, Pastor of the First Baptist Church in Providence, R. I., as a deputation to visit these, and the other missions of the Board in Asia, clothed with full discretionary authority to decide questions which might require immediate decision, and to act for the Committee in all matters which could not be referred to the Committee for consideration. Receiving instructions according to the nature of the powers with which they were clothed, the members of the deputation embarked on their distant embassy. They met with the convention, which assembled at Maulmain, according to appointment, April 4th, 1853, and continued its sessions for six weeks, to the 17th of May. The convention was attended by all the missionaries in Burmah, except those who were detained by causes not within their control, and all the leading subjects connected with the organization and conduct of the missions were thoroughly scrutinized and discussed, and, at the same time, much information was obtained respecting the portions of the recently conquered provinces which were deemed favorable for missionary operations. The principal questions on which the deputation were called to act related to the following :

1. The selection of points at which new missions were to be established in the conquered territory, and the designation of missionaries to commence them. 2. The manner in which the missions should be conducted ; what should be embraced in their work, and by whom and in what proportions that work should be performed, together with the agency of the native preachers and pastors, and their relations to the missionaries. 3. The true uses of mission schools, and the proper limits to the operations of the mission press. In relation to all these subjects, certain general conclusions were furnished by the convention as the result of the experience of the missionaries ; and these conclusions, together with the general precepts and examples contained in the New Testament, touching the propagation of the Gospel, were made the basis of the action of the deputation. This action was also understood to be in accordance with the views of the missionaries themselves, and though involving many important changes and some personal sacrifices, it has by them been cheerfully adopted and carried into execution, to the larger extension and the increased efficiency and usefulness of the missions.

Of these changes, the plan of this sketch requires that we notice only those which relate to the reorganization of the missions in order to secure the diffusion of the Gospel with the greatest success through the territory recently annexed to British India. For the purpose of accomplishing this, several important modifications were made in the missions already existing, and five new missions were established or are contemplated : one in each of the several districts into which the territory has been divided ; and to carry these changes into effect, the missionaries in Burmah, instead of being stationed at five or six of the principal cities, are now widely scattered in nine or ten, and are brought in contact with a vastly larger proportion of the population of the country. Schools in some instances have been discontinued or their operations restricted ; and the printing establishments have been brought together in one, and that one at Maulmain, in order to liberate the missionaries from other cares, that they may give themselves more fully to preaching the Gospel to the heathen.

In that portion of the country which is still subject to the Burman king, no mission has been established, or is at present contemplated. The war with the British East India Company has wrought no change in his exclusive and despotic policy, and the teachers of Christianity are still shut out from all access to the people. Indeed, though the war has ceased, it can not be said that a permanent peace has been established, no treaty has been concluded, and no concessions have been made. The barbarian king has yielded up his territory only to the superior force of the civilized enemy, whose hostilities he had provoked, and the time cannot be distant, when the same necessity again recurring, will compel him to surrender the last vestige of independent jurisdiction, and to become a tributary of Great Britain. Meanwhile, the mission at Ava, which had been contemplated, and to which missionaries had been appointed, is, for the present, abandoned, and the new missions have been established only in those portions of Burmah which have been placed under British jurisdiction, and where the missionaries may prosecute their work in security beneath the protection of British power. These new missions are, 1, at Rangoon, in the district of Pegu ; 2, at Bassein, in the district of Bassein ; 3, at Shwaygyeen, in the district of Amherst ; 4, at Prome in the district of Prome ; 5, at Toungoo, in the district of Toungoo. A mission is also contemplated at Henthada, in the district of the same name, and ultimately at Tounghoop on the coast of Arracan, the terminus of the great road to Prome. The missions which have been established all lie within the valleys of the three great rivers, along which are scattered the most thickly-peopled cities and villages of both Burmans and Karens. Throughout these districts, the uninterrupted progress of British arms, and the quiet establishment of British rule, have been attended with results of great importance in their bearing on the interests of the missions and the progress of the Gospel. The reign of intolerance and persecution is ended. The despotism beneath which the people had groaned for ages has been broken up for ever, and has given place to a government of justice and right, and more than all, the religious system of the country has lost its hold on the minds of men, in part, no doubt, from its being identified with the defeated cause, while Christianity has assumed a higher authority, from its being the religion of the conquerors and rulers of the East. While it has been embraced, and is now professed by whole villages of Karens, it is also making its way in the most encouraging manner among the Burmans at each of the several stations where it is regularly preached, alike in the old and the new provinces of British Burmah. At some of these stations it is already planted in the faith and wrought into the daily lives of the people, so that if the missionaries were all withdrawn it would still be perpetuated to future generations, and at all of them it finds as inviting a field as is now presented in any part of the world. The prayers of the earliest missionaries have been answered and their fondest hopes have been fully realized.

During the year 1852, Rev. Messrs. M. H. Bixby and J. L. Douglas, both of whom had been pastors of churches in this country, and Rev. Messrs. C. Hibbard, D. Whitaker, J. R. Nisbet, T. Allen and A. T. Rose, were appointed missionaries in Burmah, and soon afterwards repaired to their several stations; and during the year 1853, Rev. A. R. Crawley was also added to the number. The missionaries of the American Baptist Missionary Union who are stationed in the several provinces of Burmah, are thirty-one; several of whom are now on temporary visits to the United States. With these are associated about the same number of female assistants and one hundred and forty-five native assistants, of whom some fifteen or twenty are ordained preachers. These missionaries and their assistants, according to the latest report of the Managers of the Missionary Union, are distributed among the following missions, which are now in operation in the several districts of Burmah, viz. :

I. Maulmain Burman Mission.—It comprises Rev. Messrs. Haswell, Howard, Stillson, Bixby and Mr. Ranney a printer, with their wives and five native preachers and assistants. The Burman church at Maulmain numbers 138 members and that at Amherst, which is also included in this mission, numbers 28 members. At Maulmain the printing operations both in the Burman and Karen languages for all the Burman missions are at present concentrated. This mission has (1854) 2 stations, 5 missionaries, 5 female assistants, 5 native preachers and assistants, 3 churches, 170 members, 6 day-schools, 100 pupils.

II. Maulmain Karen Mission.—This is established in a distinct portion of the city, which among the missionaries is styled, Newton. It comprises Rev. Messrs. Wade, Bennett, Hibbard, W. Moore and Whitaker with their wives and nineteen native assistants. It is the seat of a theological school for training native preachers and of a normal school for the education of teachers. Around Maulmain, which is the central station, are fifteen out-stations, and the entire mission embraces fourteen churches, numbering about 900 members. Its operations are designed for the Karen race in the district of Amherst, which includes the adjoining and newly organized province of Martaban, whose seat of government is also at Maulmain. This mission has (1854) 1 station, 15 out-stations, 5 missionaries, 6 female assistants, 19 native preachers and assistants, 14 churches 869 members, 2 boarding schools, 44 pupils, 3 day schools, 40 pupils—total 5 schools, 84 pupils.

III. Tavoy Mission.—This is a mission both for Burmans and Karens, though its operations have hitherto been principally among the latter. It embraces Rev. Messrs. Cross, Thomas, Benjamin, and Allen, with their wives, and two Burman and twenty Karen native assistants. The operations of the mission are designed to comprise the provinces both of Tavoy and Mergui; though at present the missionaries all reside at Tavoy.

In 1854, 1 station, 20 out-stations, 4 missionaries, 4 female assistants, 22 native preachers and assistants, 22 churches, 1,046 members, 2 boarding-schools, 96 pupils, 15 day schools, 300 pupils; total, 17 schools, 396 pupils.

IV. Arracan Mission.—This mission, both Burman and Karen, is designed to embrace the whole province of Arracan. It has now two stations, Akyab and Sandoway, with out-stations at Cheduba and Ramree, Kyauk-Phyoo having been abandoned as a station by the advice of the deputation in 1853. At Akyab the missionaries are stationed. They are Rev. Messrs. C. C. Moore and Mrs. Moore, Rev. A. T. Rose, and Mrs. B. H. Knapp, Mrs. C. C. Campbell; Mr. Knapp having died in 1853, and with them are associated eight native assistants.

In 1854, 2 stations, 2 out-stations, 2 missionaries, 3 female assistants, 8 native preachers and assistants, 1 church, 60 members, 1 day-school, 15 pupils.

V. Bassein Mission.—This is in the new territory, and embraces many of the churches and Christian villages in Burmah, formerly connected with the mission at Sandoway in Arracan. It is designed hereafter to be both Karen and Burman, though the Gospel has thus far been embraced principally by the Karens of the Bassein district. The mission embraces in the Karen department, Rev. J. S. Beecher, and Rev. J. R. Nisbet, Rev. H. L. Van Meter, and Mrs. Van Meter, Mrs. Beecher having died in March, 1854, while on a voyage to the United States; in the Burman department, Rev. J. L. Douglass and Mrs. Douglass. Rev. E. L. Abbott is also attached to this mission, but he is now in the United States. Bassein is on a river of the same name, one of the outlets of the Irrawaddy, about 60 miles from its mouth; and around this principal station are fifty out-stations, among which are scattered fifty-six native preachers and assistants. The region is filled with Karen converts, who, under the Burman despotism, were obliged to cross the Yoma mountains to Sandoway, to receive instructions and be baptized by the missionary, and these churches are now very numerous. The Burmans, since the Gospel has had access to them, are evincing a most encouraging interest in its truths.

In 1854, 1 station, 50 out-stations, 5 missionaries, 3 female assistants, 56 native preachers and assistants, 50 churches, 5,000 members, 1 boarding-school, 80 pupils, 20 day-schools, 280 pupils—total, 21 schools, 360 pupils.

VI. Rangoon Mission.—This mission, like the others which have been mentioned, has both a Burman and a Karen department, and though established where the original mission in Burmah was first planted, is yet, in its present organization, to be regarded as a new mission. In the Burman department it embraces Rev. Messrs. Stevens, Ingalls, Dawson, and Crawley, with their wives, and six native preachers and assistants; and in the Karen department Rev. J. H. Vinton, Mrs. Vinton and Miss Vinton, with twenty-nine native preachers and assistants. The Karen department of the mission is established at Kemmendine, a town about three miles north-west of Rangoon. There are two Burman churches in the mission, one at Rangoon, and one at Kambet, an out-station in the vicinity, and they together number 106 members. The Karen churches are twenty-three in number, most of them having been formed by missionaries from Maulmain, in the occasional visits which they made during the period in which the country was closed to the Gospel by the despotism of the government. They contain 1476 members.

In 1854, 2 stations, 32 outstations, 5 missionaries, 6 female assistants, 29 native preachers and assistants, 25 churches, 1573 members, 1 boarding-school, 180 pupils.

VII. Prome Mission.—This is a new mission, exclusively Burman, established near the city of Prome, on the Irrawaddy, the centre of the district of the same name, the most northerly of the districts comprised in the territory recently annexed. The mission is established at Shwaydoug, a chief seat of Burman education, eight miles distant from Prome. It was commenced in January, 1854, according to the recommendation of the recent deputation, by Rev. Messrs. Kincaid and Simons, who about that time removed thither with their families and native assistants. As in almost all the large towns of Burmah, there were residing there several Christian converts, who welcomed the missionaries with the utmost eagerness. As the kingdom of Burmah is still closed to the labors of the missionaries, the design of establishing a mission at Ava, is for the present abandoned, and Messrs. Kincaid and Dawson, who were appointed for that purpose, have been assigned—the former to the Prome and the latter to the Rangoon mission. The mission at Prome or Shwaydoug has been commenced with two missionaries, and two female assistants, (Messrs. Kincaid and Simons, and their wives) and two native assistants. It has one station and two out-stations.

In 1854, 1 station, 2 out-stations, 2 missionaries, 2 female assistants, 2 native preachers and assistants; no church has yet been formed, and no schools have been established.

VIII. Shwaygyen Mission.—This is both a Burman and a Karen mission, established in 1853, at Shwaygyen, a large town at the junction of the Shwaygyen and the Sitang rivers, about 100 miles northward from Rangoon. It is one of the chief places in Martaban which now is in the district of Amherst. The mission has been commenced by Rev. Messrs. Harris and Brayton, both of whom are missionaries for the Karens, whose villages are exceedingly numerous and populous in the region. They have with them two native assistants, and the auspices of the mission are most encouraging.

In 1854, 1 station, 2 missionaries, 1 female assistant, 2 native preachers, 1 church, 11 members; no schools have yet been established.

IX. Toungoo Mission.—Toungoo is a large walled city, the chief town of the district of the same name, on the Sitang river, about one hundred miles above Shwaygyen. It is one of the places fixed on by the deputation as the seat of a new mission in the conquered territory. The mission was commenced by Rev. Dr. Mason, who, with two or three assistants, reached the city in October, 1853. It is the centre of a large population of Burmans, Shyans and Karens, and the mission is designed for all these races. The Karens of the region regarded the arrival of a missionary,—bringing his sacred books printed in their own language, as a fulfilment of the ancient prophetic traditions of their race, and evinced even more than their wonted readiness to hear and believe the Gospel. A little church was soon organized, and the native assistants appointed to their respective labors, when Dr. Mason, whose health was already greatly impaired, was obliged to leave the mission for a time and return to the United States. The care of the mission has been committed to Tan Quila, an experienced Karen preacher from Tavoy. He has with him one Burmese assistant.

In 1854, 1 station, 3 out-stations, 1 missionary, 1 female assistant, 2 native preachers and assistants, 1 church, 7 members, 1 boarding-school, 7 pupils, 3 day-schools, 36 pupils; total, 4 schools and 43 pupils.

X. Henthada Mission.—Henthada is the capital of the district of the same name, and is situated on the Irrawaddy, at the point where that stream branches into the Bamein and Rangoon rivers. The district embraces the very fertile and populous delta lying between these rivers. A mission has been appointed for Henthada, but no missionaries have yet actually arrived to establish it.—PACIF. W. GARNETT.

BURNSHILL: A station of the Free Church of Scotland in South Africa, about 12 miles east of Lovedale.

BUSHIMEN: A nomadic race of Hotiantots in South Africa, who live a wandering life, remote from towns, in a condition of extreme degradation. They have, says Mr. Moffat, neither house nor shed, neither flocks nor herds. Their most delightful home is afar off in the desert, the unfrequented mountain pass, or the secluded recesses of a cave or ravine. They remove from place to place, as convenience or necessity requires. The man takes his spear, and suspends his bow and quiver on his shoulder; while the woman frequently, in addition to the burden of a helpless infant, carries a mat, an earthen pot, a number of ostrich egg-shells, and a few ragged skins, bundled on her head or shoulders. Hunger compels them to feed on everything edible. Ixias, wild garlic, the core of aloes, gum of acacias, and several other plants and berries, some of which are extremely unwholesome, constitute their fruits of the field; while almost every kind of living creature is eagerly devoured, lizards, locusts and grasshoppers not excepted. The poisonous, as well as innoxious serpents, they roast and eat, extracting first the venom of the former, with which they poison the points of their arrows. Their dwellings are hardly fit abodes for the beasts of the field. In a bushy country, they will form a hollow in a central position, and bring the branches together overhead. Here the man and his wife, with perhaps a child or two, lie huddled in a heap, on a little grass, in a hollow spot not larger than an ostrich's nest. Where bushes are scarce, they form a hollow under the edge of a rock, covering it partially with reeds or grass, and they are often found in fissures and caves of the mountains. In these places, they lie close together, like pigs in a sty. They are extremely lazy, so that nothing will rouse them to action but excessive hunger. They are total strangers to domestic happiness. The men have several wives, but conjugal affection is little known. They take no great care of their children, and never correct them, except in a fit of rage, when they almost kill them with severity. In a quarrel between father and mother, or between the several wives of a husband, the defeated party wreaks vengeance on the child of the conqueror, which, in general, loses its life. Bushmen will kill their children without remorse, when they are ill-shaped, when in want of food, when the father of a child has forsaken its mother, or when obliged to flee from pursuers. They will even throw them to the hungry lion, which stands roaring before their cavern, refusing to depart till some peace-offering is made to him. In general, the children cease to be the objects of a mother's care, as soon as they are able to crawl about the field. In some few instances, however, we meet with a spark of natural affection, which places them on a level with the brute creation.

The Bushman knows no God, no eternity, yet dreads death. He worships at no shrine—has no religion. We can scarcely conceive of human beings descending lower in the scale of ignorance and vice. Yet they can be kind and grateful, and faithful to their charge. And it is their habitual practice, when they receive food, to share it with their friends, reserving the smallest portion for themselves; and the hungry mother will give food to her emaciated children without tasting it herself. (For attempts to Christianize the Bushmen, see South Africa).—Moffat's Southern Africa, pp. 16–21; 46–50.

BUSSORAH: A great city to the south-east of Bagdad, 7 miles in circumference, a part of which is laid out in gardens, intersected with canals. Pop. 60,000; Arabs, Turks, Jews, Hindoos and Persians. A station of the London Jews' Society.

BUTTERWORTH: A station of the Wesleyans in Kaffraria, on the Buffalo river, S. A.

CABALIST: A Jewish doctor, who professes the study of the Cabala, or the mysteries of Jewish traditions.

CAIRO: The capital city of Egypt, the residence of the viceroy, and the seat of government, near the right bank of the Nile, and five miles from the origin of its delta. Population, including the suburbs of Boulac and Old Cairo, about 250,000, comprising about 125,000 Mohammedans, 60,000 Copts, 3,000 to 4,000 Jews, and numerous foreigners. Climate, healthy and little variable. The Church Missionary Society have here a mission to the Copts. See Egypt.

CALCUTTA: The chief of the British Presidencies in India—the seat of the first Protestant Bishop's See, the diocese extending over all the territories of the company. Population, as estimated in 1849, 250,000 within the "ditch," and 500,000 in the immediate suburbs. Within a circumference of twenty miles, the population is generally supposed to be two millions. The city contains a mixed population of Chinese, English, Portuguese, French, Armenians, Jews, Monghols, Parsees, Arabs, &c., the great mass consisting of Hindoos and Mohammedans. The Hindoos alone number about 200,000. Calcutta is the seat of missionary operations for various societies.

CALEDON: Station of the London Missionary Society in South Africa, 120 miles east of Cape Town, near a branch of the Cradock river, Caledon district.

CALIF, CALIPH, or KALIF: A representative of Mohammed, bearing the same relation to him that the Pope pretends to bear to St. Peter.

CALOYERS or CALOGERI: Monks of the Greek Church, of three orders.

CALPENTYN: A peninsula, extending about 60 miles along the west coast of Ceylon, a station of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel.

CALTURA: A station of the Wesleyan

Missionary Society, in Ceylon, 26 miles from Colombo.

CALICUT: A town in the province of Malabar, India, 103 miles south west of Seringapatam. In 1800, it contained 5,000 houses. The inhabitants are chiefly Mapillas, who are of Arabian extraction. It is a station of the German Missionary Society.

CALMONT: Station of the Church Missionary Society, in the River District, Sierra Leone, to the S. E. of Freetown.

CAMEROONS: A region of country bordering on the river and mountains of that name, in Upper Guinea, Africa, occupied by the Baptist Missionary Society.

CANADA: This extensive country, lying on the northern border of the States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, New York and Ohio, and the eastern border of Michigan, was discovered by the French navigator, Jacques Cartier, in the middle of the sixteenth century, but was not entered upon as a place of European settlement, until the beginning of the seventeenth. At about the same period the Pilgrim Fathers of New England landed there, with an open and loved Bible, an evangelical faith, and a manly attachment to freedom, both civil and religious,—and the French adventurers landed at Stadacona (Quebec) and at Hochelaga, (Montreal), accompanied by ecclesiastics, to take possession of the land in the name of the French monarch and of the Papacy. Both parties brought with them as a most cherished object, their religion, designing to stamp the country which they respectively came to occupy, with that great element of a people's greatness. They founded their respective Colonies on a religious basis, and amid acts of homage to God, they set up their banners. Yet was there a mighty difference between these two events,—a difference lying mainly in the character of the religion they brought with them. The founders of New England were Protestants—the founders of Canada were Romanists. The former were enlightened and free,—the latter were superstitious and spiritually enslaved. And although the Protestants landed upon barren rocks, and the Romanists in the midst of fertile valleys, the respective history of the lands they came to people, proclaims trumpet-tongued, the superiority of a free Bible Christianity, over superstition and priestism, in moulding the character and influencing the destinies of a nation.

The first missions to Canada were those of Rome, which were immediately and munificently endowed by the French monarch. The Jesuits were early in the field. They founded a college at Quebec and stretched their dependent missions to the small settlements on the river. They established, moreover, a chain of posts, westward, many of which belong rather to the history of the United States than to that of Canada. In the year 1641, they erected their first church in the city of Montreal, which with accustomed mariolatry, they dedicated to the Virgin. It would not comport with the design of this work to narrate the conflicts which occurred between the several orders of ecclesiastics for the possession of this fair and promising field of missions. Suffice it to state, that at length the Jesuits obtained the preëminence at Quebec and at St. Francis, while the St. Sulpicians had possession of Montreal. There were also orders of friars and nuns who formed an important part of the ecclesiastical machinery of the country. Ample endowments were secured to all these parties,—which the progress of events and the development of the country commercially and otherwise, by a different race and Protestant in religion, have rendered of vast value. The Jesuits became the seigneurs of Quebec. By gift and purchase they acquired lands in various places between that city and Montreal; so that the estates which bear their name, have now a money value of not far from one million of pounds currency, or four millions of dollars. At the cession of the country to Great Britain, this Order was declared illegal, and their estates were confiscated to the Crown on the death of the last of them. They are now in the hands of the colonial government, administered in an unprofitable manner, and their avails, which it is presumed might be easily doubled in amount, are mainly assigned to the support of Roman Catholic schools and colleges.

The Seminary of St. Sulpice received the seigniorship of the city and island of Montreal, the seigniorship of the Lake of the Two Mountains, and some other property from which it is estimated they derive an income of at least one hundred and twenty thousand per annum. They have retained this property under the British government, and have been incorporated by the local Legislature, for the purpose of holding it as an endowment for their churches, missions to the Indians, and schools. But as they are never called effectually to account for their use of the money they receive, it can be, without fear of complaint, assigned to any object that would bid fair to advance the interests of the Church of Rome on this continent.

The ancient nunneries of Quebec, Three Rivers, and Montreal, were also richly endowed. The writer has not the means at hand of ascertaining the wealth of those at Quebec and Three Rivers, but the two in Montreal have large and increasing revenues. Some of their most valuable estates have been placed in enterprising hands at long leases, which now yield to their holders a large return, and will ultimately give to the revered sisterhood a vast accessional income. It is to be understood that these acquisitions by gift and purchase were made by the corporate bodies indicated, during the French colonial history of Canada. At that period the country west of Montreal, afterwards made a distinct province under the name of Upper Canada, and subsequently reunited with its eastern sister bearing the name of Canada West, was not inhabited except by tribes of Indians and wandering traders in furs.

Canada was ceded to Great Britain in 1763: the conquerors dealing with the people in the most lenient and liberal manner—confirming their laws, language and religion, their tithes to the clergy, and their ecclesiastical endowments. But speedily a Protestant and Anglo-Saxon element was introduced, which has steadily increased until it is now, in respect of the whole of Canada, the predominant element. At the above date the population of the country did not exceed 70,000. In 1783, it had increased in Lower Canada to about 112,000, but at this time Upper Canada had about 10,000 inhabitants, of whom the dwellers at the numerous frontier forts and the garrisons constituted by far the greater part. After this period, the number of settlers was augmented by a great accession of United Empire loyalists and disbanded soldiers, and by immigrants from the United States and from Great Britain, so that in the year 1814, the inhabitants of Upper Canada had increased to 95,000, and in 1824 to 152,000; while at the latter date, Lower Canada contained a population of 450,000. United Canada now contains a population of two millions, of whom not more than 700,000 are the descendants of the original French settlers; moreover, Canada West now slightly exceeds the Eastern section of the province in population,—a circumstance which must necessarily become more prominent in the future history of the country, seeing that there is a constant tide of immigration into the country, no part of which comes from France.

Whenever the number of Protestants became such as to invite the attention of their co-religionists in England, the venerable Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, sent out a few Episcopalian ministers and sustained them; there came also on to the field a few Scottish Presbyterian ministers, and from the United States, Episcopal Methodist missionaries. Later, namely, in 1829, the American Home Missionary Society had several Congregational and Presbyterian missionaries introduced to the country, and continued for about ten years to do something for Canada. The Wesleyan Methodists of England, sent out several missionaries earlier than the above date, and assisted not only in their support, but also in training promising young men for their itinerant ministry. In 1836, the Congregationalists of England entered the Canadian field, and have had ever since a growing mission in the country. The United Presbyterian Church of Scotland, and later the Free Church of Scotland, have done good missionary service in the land. These hints will suffice to show that up to this hour Canada is missionary ground, and that all the leading Protestant denominations have entered upon its cultivation. There are now in the cities numerous self-sustaining churches, but by far the largest portion of those in the rural districts are partly dependent on missionary funds for the support of their pastors. It must be obvious that in estimating the religious condition of Canada as represented by the number of churches, ministers, and other Christian agencies found within its precincts, it will be needful to define the stand-point from which the character of the several religious bodies are viewed. It must, alas! be acknowledged by all observing disciples of Christ, that there exist throughout Christendom many organizations bearing the name of churches, which have little in them of the spirit and character of our Divine Master. There are individuals in them all probably more or less numerous, who love the truth as it is in Jesus, but the character of the whole body is the reverse of evangelical. This definition need not be given in respect to the Church of Rome, as her character for Christian illumination and influence will be readily estimated by the readers of this work. They will find her described 2 Thess. ii. 3—12. But in relation to the other bodies to be noted, it may be well to say that their measure of evangelical influence is estimated from a stand-point such as that occupied by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, by its Secretaries, Committee, and principal supporters. Viewing the Episcopalian Church, called "the United Church of England and Ireland," from that point, it cannot, as exhibited in Canada, be termed as a whole, or even mainly evangelical. Its communion is usually without restriction as to the piety or want of piety of its members. Its clergy, with some bright and delightful exceptions, are, so far as can be judged, ignorant of saving truth; and as a consequence, its ministry is not effective in the conversion of sinners. There are in each of the three Dioceses of Canada bright exceptions to this description: men of God who love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity, and seek by all means in their power to promote the advancement of our Lord's Kingdom. There are also laymen of remarkable excellence connected with this church whose influence is most decided in the cause of evangelical religion. But the writer has no doubt that these excellent men would endorse as true, the general representation given above. It should be borne in mind, throughout, however, that the regular services of the Church, bring before the minds of the people a large portion of Scripture, and consequently of saving truth. These few men hope much from this.

Before proceeding with an estimate of other bodies, some statistical facts regarding the foregoing, may be placed on record. The Roman Catholic Church in Canada is divided into seven dioceses, namely: Quebec, Three Rivers, Montreal, and St. Hyacinthe, in Eastern Canada, and Bytown, Kingston, and Toronto, in Western Canada. That of Quebec contains 111 parishes, exclusive of those of the city. There are an archbishop, a coadjutor bishop, and 184 clergy, including chaplains of nunneries, officers of colleges, &c. That of Three Rivers contains, including the town, 38 parishes. It has a bishop and a body of clergy in all the offices numbering 51. That of Montreal contains 108 parishes. It has a bishop and a coadjutor, and including the ecclesiastics of the Seminary of St. Sulpice, the professors in colleges, (the Jesuits among them) and other clerical officials, the body of clergy numbers 209. This does not include brotherhoods and sisterhoods in convents. That of St. Hyacinthe contains 36 parishes, but some of these are rather stations amid Protestant communities. It has a bishop and 55 clergymen.

Western Canada being Protestant ground, there are no Roman Catholic parishes, but there are three bishops and 112 priests laboring there, chiefly among the Irish Roman Catholic settlers. The entire people to whom these bishops and clergy minister, nearly as much need the circulation of the Bible among them, and the mission of evangelical agencies, as heathendom itself.

The Church of England in Canada, has three dioceses, namely, Quebec, Montreal, and Toronto; the latter more extensive than the two former put together. There are three bishops, and including arch-deacons, and other officials gathered around the three bishops, there are of clergy in the diocese of Quebec, 42, in that of Montreal, 53, and 4 retired missionaries; and in that of Toronto, 148. It is estimated that in the diocese of Montreal there are about 30,000 nominal adherents, but the number of communicants is only about 3,000. Of the other dioceses the writer has not the particulars on these points.

The Presbyterians in Canada are divided into three principal sections, namely: the Synod which retains its connection with the Established Church of Scotland—the Synod which without formal ecclesiastical connection, yet represents the Free Church of Scotland—and the Synod of the United Presbyterian Church, a branch of that Church in Scotland, but without formal ecclesiastical connection with it. The first of these is very similar in the character of its pastorate and its membership to the Established Church of Scotland. The discourses of the pulpit are sound and evangelical, but not usually pointed. The clergy are well educated and respectable. The membership contains many of God's saints, but like that of all established churches, it is mixed in its character. The second of these bodies possesses a large amount of energy; it is one of the youngest of the denominations in Canada, but it has already done an extensive and good work. Coming out from the churches connected with the establishment, its pastorate and membership will be without difficulty estimated by all who are aware of the religious history of Scotland during the last ten years. The third of these bodies, though the smallest, is highly respectable as to character and influence. They are eminently sound in the faith, and preach the Word of the Lord with boldness. There are seventy-three ministers and three retired, in connection with the first mentioned sections of Presbyterianism, and forty-three vacant charges are reported; but it is to be presumed that some of these are little more than nominal. The full statistics of this body are not in the hands of the writer.

The following facts relating to the second of these three sections of Presbyterianism are given in the words of a thoroughly furnished officer of Synod, and have relation to the present year, (June, 1854.) "I may mention generally, that ten years ago, when our Church was organized, there were twenty-five ministers; now we have on our roll 92 names of ordained ministers, embraced in eight Presbyteries, seven in Canada West, and one in in Canada East. During the past year, nearly £12,000 ($48,000), has been raised within the church for the support of our Theological Institution; about £430 ($1,720) for the French Canadian Missionary Society and nearly £400 ($1,600), for foreign missions. The church also supports a missionary in the Buxton settlement, among the colored population. In our various presbyteries there are at least 50 vacant congregations and mission stations, which (the latter) are multiplying every year. Knox's College is attended by about 40 students, and has been the means of sending forth upwards of 30 of the ministers now on the roll of the Synod."

The third section of Presbyterians report, in 1853, forty-nine ordained ministers and three probationers; but the names of 73 congregations appear upon the tables, of which eighteen are vacant. The "average attendance" throughout the church amounts to 12,845, showing an increase of 2,287 upon the returns of the previous year. The total income has been £6,425 ($24,500); of which $16,000 were expended on stipend and $8,000 on 'Church property.' For missions, including Theological Fund Chair, the church raised $2,200. Compared with previous returns, increase is observable in most of these items.

Of the remaining Christian organizations in Canada, it is not needful to do more than to record statistics, inasmuch as their character in respect to the pastorate and membership is similar to that of the bodies of the same name in the United States.

The Methodist body is divided into four sections, as follows:

The Wesleyan Methodist Church in Canada raises about $21,000 for domestic and Indian missions, of which it has 81 in number, supplied by 91 ministers. The total ministerial force of this body, including the above mentioned missionaries, is 216. The sister church in Eastern Canada, numbers 20 ministers. The congregations raised last year $2,800 for missions, but more than this amount was expended on the Canadian stations. In future, the East and West will be united in one organization.

The Methodist New Connection Church has fifty-two ministers. The Methodist Episcopal Church has 91 ministers, including the supernumeraries, but excluding those who are superannuated. The Primitive Methodist Church numbers thirty-two ministers.

The remaining denominations of any importance are the Congregational and the Baptist.

Eighteen years since there were only nine Congregational churches in the country; there are now sixty-two, having 123 principal stations. The number of ministers is fifty-nine, having about 10,000 hearers, and a membership of 2,750. There are 60 Sabbath Schools with nearly 400 teachers and 3000 pupils. This body contributed for the support of the pastorate and of worship during the year just closed, £4,690, or $18,760; for debt on places of worship, building and repairs, $10,226; for missions, $3,600; Theological Institute, $900; other objects $1,270.

Concerning the Baptist churches the writer has no access to statistics, beyond the number of ministers, which is 131.

There are two missions of importance, and two others that are in a state of formation for the evangelization of the French Canadian people. The French Canadian Missionary Society expended last year about $10,000 on this work. It is catholic, i. e., not denominational. The Grand Ligne Mission, which is Baptist, spent nearly as much. The other two are in the hands of the Church of England and the Church of Scotland. They are small and unimportant. A valuable impression has been made on the mind of the French Canadian people. Canada has this year resolved to enter into the foreign missionary work. No missionary has yet been sent forth however.—REV. HENRY WILKES, D. D., of Montreal.

CANDY: See Kandy.

CANANORE: A maritime town in the province of Malabar, India, situated at the bottom of a small bay, 45 miles N. W. of Calicut, and 66 S. S. E. of Mangalore, containing 11,000 houses: a station of the Basle Missionary Society.

CANTON: The capital of Kwangtung, China, situated on the north bank of Pearl river, in lat. 23° 7' N. and 113° 14' E. long.

CANNIBALS: Man-eaters; those who feed on human flesh. It seems incredible that men can be reduced so far below the brutes as to devour one another, as the most ferocious wild beasts rarely prey upon their own species. Yet, in all ages, as far back as the records of history can be traced, men have been found so far lost to the instincts of nature as to devour the flesh of their fellow-creatures. Herodotus, Mela, Strabo, and Pliny, speak of such, and describe the particular regions in which they dwelt. Herodotus describes a nation, apparently in India, who regularly killed and ate the more aged among themselves. The ancient Scythians were Cannibals; and Herodotus speaks of a distinct tribe adjoining them, who led a rural life, obeyed no laws, and acknowledged no authority, who fed on human flesh. Jerome states that, when he was in Gaul, he had seen the Atticotti, a British tribe, feeding on human flesh. At a late period, traces of the same barbarous custom are found in Scotland. During a war with England, in 1138, the men of Galloway not only slaughtered the innocent, without distinction of age or sex; but they cut out the bowels, devoured the flesh, and drank the blood of their victims. The inhabitants of the British Isles are supposed, by many, to have sprung from the ancient Scythians, who drank the blood of their enemies, and made drinking cups of their skulls. There was a certain ceremony at which none could drink, who had not killed an enemy; and it at length became connected with religious rites, as well as being a token of conquest. The early European navigators, from the time of Columbus, have reported the existence of Cannibalism among the aborigines of America. But the practice does not seem to have been common among the North American Indians; and when practiced, it appears to have been upon enemies taken in war, and connected with superstitious observances. Cannibalism was prevalent in the South Sea Islands, and probably on the Pacific shores of South America, as well as in New Zealand and New Caledonia, from the earliest discoveries; and the horrid custom still prevails among the unevangelized tribes. M. de Fresne, a cotemporary of Capt. Cooke, with seventeen of his companions, were slaughtered and eaten in New Zealand.

A few years ago, a native teacher, while traveling in New Caledonia, in the district of Eugene, witnessed a horrible transaction, which shows how the chiefs are trained up to the most ferocious habits. A feast was held, and the people of the chief brought him food. The son of the chief, a lad of about six years, observing among them a very corpulent man, asked his father for him. The father complied with his request, and ordered the man to remain after the rest went away. The chief then asked his son what should be done with the man, and the boy replied, "Let him be cut in pieces alive!" One of the chief's attendants then cut off one arm, then the other, and one leg after the other, till only the head and trunk remained; yet the man lived till his head was severed from his body. The teacher was informed that this was a privilege only granted to the son of the chief during his minority; and that, as often as the tenants bring him food, and the son desires any one among them, his wish is granted, and the victim is either killed for food, or cut up alive.

So late as 1809, the captain and crew of an English vessel, who had visited New Zealand for the purchase of timber, were treacherously slaughtered, and their bodies devoured. The natives of New Caledonia also have been seen greedily devouring human flesh. Commander Wilkes, of the U. S. Exploring Expedition, says, there can be no question that Cannibalism is practiced in the Feejee Islands, "for the mere pleasure of eating human flesh as food!" "Their fondness for it will be understood from the custom they have of sending portions of it to their friends at a distance, as an acceptable present; and the gift is eaten, even if decomposition have begun before it is received. So highly do they esteem this food, that the greatest praise they can bestow on a delicacy is, to say that it is as tender as a dead man! Even their sacrifices are made more frequent, in order to indulge their taste for this horrid food. The bodies of enemies slain in battle are always eaten. But war does not furnish enough to satisfy their desires. "They embrace opportunities to seize victims wherever they can find them. They will even banquet on the flesh of their friends; and in times of scarcity, families will make an exchange of children for this horrid purpose." "The flesh of women is preferred to that of men;" but the women are not allowed to eat of it openly, though it is said the wives of the chiefs do partake of it privately. The common people are forbidden to eat of it, unless there is plenty; but they are allowed to pick the bones. In 1834, the mate and several of the crew of an American vessel were decoyed on shore by Vendovi, Chief of Reeva, with the pretence that he was sick and wanted medicine, when they were treacherously massacred and eaten.

Dr. Spry, a gentleman connected with the Bengal medical staff, gives the following account of a Cannibal tribe in Chittagong, in the eastern portion of the province of Bengal, the particulars of which he had from Major Gardner. The Kookies, as these brutal wretches are called, are corpulent, low in stature, with set features, and muscular limbs. They speak a dialect peculiar to themselves, and build their villages on the boughs of the forest trees. They appear to have no settled habitation, but wander in the wilderness in herds. When they have selected a site, the whole community set to work to collect bamboos and branches of trees, which are afterwards fashioned into platforms, and placed across the lofty boughs of the different trees. On this foundation, the rude grass superstructure is raised, which forms the hut. When completed, the women and children are taken into their aerial abodes, and then the men lop off all the lower branches of the trees, and make a rough ladder of bamboos, on which they ascend, and take it up after them. Though such a mode of life may seem incredible, yet Mr. Moffat gives an account of an inhabited tree, which he found in Africa.

The Kookies openly boast of their feats of Cannibalism, showing with the strongest expressions of satisfaction, the bones of their fellow-creatures, who have fallen a prey to their horrible appetites. These people, strange as it may appear, live within one hundred and fifty miles of Calcutta, the metropolis and seat of government of British India, secluded in the woods and jungles of the savage portions of Bengal. The same writer also states that the Goonds or Ghonds, who inhabit the hill forests of Nagpore, are Cannibals, but that the latter partake of human flesh only occasionally, as a religious custom, while the former banquet with delight on the horrid repast.

The Edinburgh Encyclopedia remarks, that "It is uniformly attested by persons in opposite parts of the globe, under various climates, in different circumstances, that an uncommon degree of ferocity is speedily generated by feeding on human flesh." And it is by no means improbable that the origin of the practice is to be found in the thirst for blood engendered by savage warfare. It is, however, one of the terrible fruits of heathenism, the remedy for which is alone to be found in the elevating and genial influence of Christianity.—Edinburgh Encyclopedia; London Miss. Mag. for Nov., 1849, p. 162; U. S. Exploring Expedition, Vol. III, p. 97; Spry's Modern India.

CAPE HAYTIEN: A seaport town of the Island of Hayti, on its north coast, 90 m. N.

of Port-au-Prince. Population 12,000 to 16,000. A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society.

CAPE COAST TOWN: a station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society on the Gold Coast.

CAPE FLATS: A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society in Little Namaqualand, South Africa.

CANON: In ecclesiastical affairs, a law or rule of doctrine or discipline, enacted by a council and confirmed by the sovereign; a decision in matters of religion, or a regulation of policy or discipline, by a general or provincial council.

CAPUCHINS: Monks of the order of St. Francis, who cover their heads with a stuff-cap or cowl. They are clothed in brown or gray, go barefoot, and never shave their faces.

CAPE COLONY: A colony in South Africa, belonging to Great Britain. It takes its name from the Cape of Good Hope, and extends from thence to the Orange River in the north, and to the Fugela river in the east. A large proportion of the territory included within their limits is either unoccupied, or, excepting the missionary stations, entirely in the hands of the natives. Apart from the shores, the country consists of high lands, forming parallel mountain ridges, with elevated plains or terraces of varying extent between. The climate is exceedingly fine and salubrious.

The Cape was discovered by Diaz, the Portuguese navigator, in 1486. The Dutch colonists began to settle here in 1600. In 1620, two English commanders took possession of the Cape, in the name of Great Britain; but no settlement was then made by the English. In 1650, the Dutch government sent out one hundred men and as many women from the houses of industry at Amsterdam to people the Colony; and, according to some authorities, it was made a penal settlement. In 1652, the Dutch East India Company took possession, and appointed John Van Riebeck Governor, with instructions to extend Christianity among the natives. In 1795, the Cape was captured by the British, and Lord Macartney was appointed Governor. At the peace of Amiens, in 1800, it was restored to the Dutch, but in 1806, it was again taken by the English, to whom it was finally ceded in 1815. The European inhabitants are of English, Dutch, and German origin. In the Pearl district, there are about 4,000 French Protestants, whose ancestors emigrated from France about 1700, in consequence of the revocation of the edict of Nantz. The Dutch occupy the interior, and are mostly farmers. The English reside chiefly in the Albany district.

The Orange River sovereignty, added to the British territories in 1849, extends north of the Orange River as far as the Ky Gariep or Vaal River. Natal, or Victoria, a district on the east coast, and separated from Cape Colony by Kaffraria, is a recently formed British settlement, containing an area of 18,000 square miles. It is highly favored in those respects in which the Cape is most deficient, having abundance of wood and water, with coal and various metallic ores, a fine alluvial soil, and a climate adapted to the production of cotton, silk, and indigo.

CAPE PALMAS: The seat of the Colony of the Maryland Colonization Society, in Liberia, West Africa, and a station of the American Episcopal Missionary Society. Its situation is high and prominent, and is visited every hour with a cool refreshing breeze from the sea. It projects into the sea about one hundred rods, forming the turning point from the windward to the leeward coasts.—The bar and landing are said to be the best in all Western Africa.

CAPE TOWN: Station of the London Missionary Society in South Africa, being the capital of the Cape Colony. The missionary stationed here, preaches in the "Union Chapel," and is the General Agent and Superintendent of the Society's Missions in South Africa. This post was for many years filled by the venerable Dr. Philip. It is now occupied by Rev. William Thompson, formerly one of the Society's missionaries in India. Mr. Thompson, on his return to England, touched at Cape Town, while Rev. Mr. Freeman, Secretary of the Society, was on a visit there. Mr. T. preached at the Union Chapel, and was invited to the pastorate; and subsequently receiving an appointment from the Directors, as their agent, he thought it his duty to accept, and entered upon his duties in the summer of 1850.

CARAVAN: A company of travelers, pilgrims, or merchants, marching or proceeding in a body over the deserts of Arabia, or other regions infested with robbers.

CARAVANSARY: A place appointed for receiving and lodging caravans; a kind of inn, where the caravans rest at night, being a large square building, with a spacious court in the middle.

CARMELITES: An order of mendicant friars, named from Mount Carmel. They have four tribes, and thirty-eight provinces, besides the congregation in Mantua, in which are fifty-four monasteries, under a vicar-general, and the congregations of barefooted Carmelites in Italy and Spain. They wear a scapulary, or small woolen habit, of a brown color, thrown over the shoulders.

CARNIVAL: The feast or season of rejoicing, before Lent, observed in Catholic countries, with great solemnity, by feasts, balls, operas, concerts, &c.

CARTHUSIAN: An order of monks, so called from Chartreuse, the place of their institution. They are remarkable for their austerity. They cannot go out of their cells, except to church, nor speak to any person without leave.

CARMEL: Station of the French Protestants in South Africa, between Bethulia and Beersheba, established in 1846, as an Institution for training native teachers. 2 missionaries, 40 communicants.

CASTE: See Brahminism.

CATTARAUGUS: A station of the American Board among the Cattaraugus Indians, in the State of New York.

CATHOLIC: Universal or general. Originally applied to the Christian Church in general, but now improperly appropriated by the Church of Rome.

CAUNPOOR, or CAWNPORE: A town in the province of Allahabad, India; capital of a district of the same name, on the west side of the Ganges, 45 miles south-west of Lucknow. A station of the Gospel Propagation Society.

CAVALLA: A station of the American Episcopal Board in West Africa, 13 miles from Cape Palmas.

CEDAR HILL: A station of the Moravians in Antigua, West Indies, where is an institution for the training of teachers.

CELESTINS: A religious order so named from Pope Celestin. They have 39 convents in Italy, and 21 in France. Their habit is a white gown, a capuche, and a black scapulary.

CENOBITE: One of a religious order, who lives in a convent or community; in opposition to an anchoret or hermit, who lives alone.

CEYLON: The island of Ceylon lies chiefly between the 6th and 10th degrees of north latitude, and the 80th and 82d east longitude, and has the bay of Bengal on the N. and E., the Indian ocean on the S. and S. W., and is separated from Hindoostan on the N. W. by the gulf of Manaar. Its length is about 300 miles N. to S., and its breadth varies from 40 to 100 miles. In form it resembles the section of a pear cut lengthwise through the middle. The coasts on the N. and N. W. are low and flat, but on the S. and E. they are bold and rocky, affording some of the best harbors in the world. The interior of the island consists of three distinct natural divisions: the low country, the hills, and the mountains. The mountains of the central and northern regions rise from 1000 to 4000 feet above the sea, and are clothed to the summits with magnificent forests. The rivers and lakes are numerous, but only a few of the former are navigable, and of the latter only those along the eastern coast can be used for purposes of traffic. Ceylon is rich in minerals, but they have not been made of much commercial importance. Its soil is generally a mixture of sand and clay, but in the cinnamon region, near Colombo, it consists of pure quartz, and is perfectly white. Being situated so near the equator, the days and nights are nearly of equal length throughout the year, and the temperature during the day varies but little. The seasons, however, are more regulated by the monsoons than by the course of the sun, and the hottest part of the year is from January to April. The climate is salubrious, except in the low and less cultivated regions; the principal diseases being those of the liver and intestines. Measles and whooping cough occur only in a mild form, and consumption of the lungs is wholly unknown. The small-pox, which was once so fatal, is almost entirely checked by vaccination.

The vegetable productions of the island are numerous and valuable, and consist of cinnamon, cocoa-nut, palm, bread-fruit, coffee, indigo, areca, betel-nut, tobacco, ebony, gamboge, gum-lac, &c. The most important of these is the cinnamon, which grows only in Ceylon and Cochin China. In its wild state it grows from twenty to thirty feet high, and the cinnamon forests present a very beautiful appearance. This spice constitutes the great wealth of Ceylon, and together with the other productions named, has rendered the island of vast importance to the commercial world.

The principal animals found here are the elephant, bear, leopard, hyena, jackal, elk, deer, gazelle, buffalo, horse, ox, wild hog, monkey, racoon, porcupine, squirrel, &c. Peacocks, pheasants, snipes, pigeons, and a great variety of other birds, with almost every species of domestic poultry, are found in great abundance; and serpents, alligators, and reptiles of all sorts, are numerous.

Population.—The native population of Ceylon consists of four classes: first, the Ceylonese or Singalese, occupying the Kandian territories and the coasts; second, the Moors, who are found in all parts of the island; third, the Veddahs, who live in the mountains and unexplored regions; and fourth, the Hindoos, who occupy chiefly the N. and E. coasts. Besides these there are also in the island some Portuguese, Dutch, and English colonists; and an intermixture of these with each other, and with the native races, forms still another class. The total population, according to the latest estimates, is 1,368,838. The Singalese believe themselves to have been the original inhabitants; and they have a tradition that their island was the ancient paradise, from which Adam was expelled, after which a company of Chinese adventurers accidentally landed upon their coasts. No importance is attached to this tradition, however. There is no very authentic information respecting Ceylon previous to its discovery by the Portuguese, in 1505. They subsequently became masters of the island, and from them it was conquered by the Dutch, in 1656, just a century and a half after the arrival of the Portuguese. In 1796, Colombo surrendered to the English, who took possession of Kandy also in 1815.

Government.—The government of Ceylon is vested in the hands of a British Governor, who is assisted by three classes of officers, and any person of requisite qualifications may fill the highest offices, whether he be a European or a native, and without reference to his religion. A knowledge of the English language, however, is indispensable. For the administration of justice the island is divided into three districts, and these are divided into smaller ones, each with a court, judge and assessors, while a Supreme Court, and the only court of appeal, is established at Colombo. Trial by jury is secured to all the people.

Language, Arts, &c.—The language of the Singalese resembles the Burman in its construction, though the natives think the Arabic is their original language. They appear to have had scarcely any literature beyond some pretended skill in astrology. Their agriculture is in a very rude state, and in the arts they have displayed little skill beyond the construction of immense tanks, in which water was collected during the rains, for the irrigation of their rice lands. These are now mostly in ruins.

Religion.—Brahminism and Bûdhism have been, from time immemorial, the prevailing systems of religion among the natives of Ceylon. Brahm is regarded by that sect as the universal and self-existent intelligence, from whom proceeded the Hindoo Triad, Brahma the Creator, Vishnu the preserver, and Siva the Destroyer. Vishnu and Siva are the principal objects of worship. Brahminism, now generally denominated Hindooism, proclaims an active resistance to every other form of religion, is despotic and persecuting in its spirit, and derives much of its authority and power from its mysterious antiquity, the profound and inscrutable teachings of its sacred books, and the boundless extent and dimensions of the system is such as to give it a dim and appalling aspect in the minds of its votaries. Caste is one of its immutable laws and is enforced with great rigor.

Bûdhism is of an opposite character, being tolerant and liberal towards other systems, and strangely indifferent to its own. Brahminism is a science confided only to an initiated priesthood, and its Vedas and Shasters are kept with jealousy from the eyes of the people. Bûdhism, on the contrary, rejoices in its universality, and opens its sacred pages to the perusal of all. The priests of Brahm invest themselves with mystery and oracles of authority, while those of Bûdh claim only to be teachers of ethics—the clergy of reason. Caste, although to some extent practiced by the Bûdhists is discarded in their sacred books. It may be said, therefore, that Bûdhism is more a school of philosophy than a form of religion,—more an appeal to reason, than an attempt to operate upon the imagination and the conscience through the medium of imposing rites. But while the latter is free from the fanatical intolerance and revolting rites of the Brahminical faith, and vastly superior to it in the purity of its code of morals, it yet exerts no elevating or transforming power, but has admitted of constant deterioration and corruption. See Bûdhism and Brahminism.

MISSIONS.

Portuguese Missions.—Immediately after taking possession of Colombo, in 1505, the Portuguese erected the adjoining districts into a bishopric, and Christianity, in the form of Romanism, was proclaimed; but it was not publicly taught till 1544, when St. Francis Xavier first preached to the Tamils of the North. From this time the Portuguese pursued their schemes of ecclesiastical supremacy, till the whole peninsula of Jaffna was brought under the authority of the church, a college of Jesuits erected, convents established, and almost the entire population of this province led to abjure their ancient faith and submit to baptism. The means by which this surprising change was effected were, authority, appeals to the hope of gain, and the pomp and pageantry so congenial to the Roman Catholic religion. Some attempts were made by the priests to extend the Romish religion into the interior of the island, but this was not until near the close of the Portuguese rule, and their labors were interrupted by the approach of a hostile power.

Dutch Missions.—The Dutch established themselves at Colombo in 1656, and at Jaffna in 1658, and having driven the Portuguese from every fortress on the coast, they succeeded by right of conquest, to the whole of their possessions in Ceylon. They immediately directed their power against the Roman Catholic clergy, summarily transporting large numbers of them to the continent of India, and offering every indignity to the images in the Catholic chapels. This hostility to the church of Rome continued to inspire the policy of the Dutch, and their resistance of its priesthood was even more emphatic and determined than their opposition to the Brahmins and the Bûdhists. Their success among the natives was outwardly great. Within five years after their arrival in the island, 12,387 children had been baptized, 18,000 pupils were under instruction in the schools, and 65,000 converts to Christianity were reckoned in the kingdom of Jaffnapatam. At the close of the Dutch rule in Ceylon, the number of professors of Christianity was estimated as high as 420,000; but the Dutch themselves regarded a large proportion of these as merely nominal believers, and it is a remarkable fact, that notwithstanding the hundreds of thousands of conversions and baptisms ascribed to the labors of the Dutch Presbyterians, their religion and discipline are now almost unknown in the island of Ceylon. This failure has been ascribed to the superficial manner in which the Dutch ministers developed and inculcated the doctrines of Christianity; their inability to preach in the vernacular tongues of the island, and their employment of interpreters; the very limited amount of instruction given in the schools; and especially the system of political bribery adopted by the Dutch to encourage conversions; and the hasty and indiscriminate manner in which all outward appearances were welcomed as evidences of conversion to Christianity. Thus the clergy of the church of Holland at the close of their ministrations in Ceylon, left behind a superstructure of Christianity prodigious in its outward dimensions, but so internally unsound as to be distrusted even by those who had erected it, and so unsubstantial that it has long since disappeared almost from the memory of the natives of the island.

LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—In 1804, this Society entered upon a mission in Ceylon, and Rev. Messrs. Vos, Ehrhardt, Palm, and Read were employed as missionaries for several years. Their labors were confined chiefly to Jaffna, Matura, Galle, and Colombo, and were attended with many good results. They made considerable progress in the acquisition of the native language and established some schools, especially at Colombo. But the opposition was formidable, and the government not always favorable to their operations, and after several years of self-denying effort, the mission was abandoned.

ENGLISH BAPTIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—The English Baptists commenced a mission in Ceylon in 1812, in the person of Mr. Chater, whose efforts to Christianize the Singalese, or Buddhists, and to systematize the study of their language, have made his name memorable. He died in 1829, and was succeeded by Mr. Daniel, who labored in that field fifteen years, preaching and establishing congregations and schools in Colombo and the adjacent villages. In the midst of his usefulness, the health of his children failed, and on his passage to England for their health, his wife died. Thus bereaved, he returned to Ceylon, and spent two years in incessant wandering and labors in the maritime provinces and forests to the east of Colombo. He then resumed his educational labors in Colombo, giving attention also to preaching and the press, and died in 1844, leaving a name honored and endeared among the Singalese. He was succeeded by Mr. Dawson and Mr. Davis, the former of whom died two or three years since, and was succeeded by Mr. Allen. Their labors extend to 131 villages of the Singalese, in which they maintain 31 schools, with an average attendance of 830 pupils. They have also 483 enrolled as church members, the greater portion of whom are an honor to their profession. It was the testimony of Sir J. Emerson Tennent, in 1850, after having visited this section of the island, that the Singalese who had received their instruction at the hands of the missionaries, were filling places of honor and emolument in the public service, and engaged in private professions, and that many who had made no open profession of Christianity, respected it and inspired a veneration for it in the minds of the heathen around them.

TABULAR VIEW FOR 1854.

AMERICAN BOARD.—The first missionaries of the American Board to the East, were commissioned Feb. 7, 1812. Their names were Rev. Messrs. Adoniram Judson, Samuel Nott, Samuel Newell, Gordon Hall and Luther Rice. This company, with the wives of four of them, soon embarked for Calcutta, without definite instructions as to their fields of labor. They reached the place of their destination in safety, but were greatly embarrassed by government opposition and other causes, the particulars of which may be found in connection with the Bombay mission. Of this missionary band, Mr. Newell was the only one who spent any time at Ceylon, he having first visited the Isle of France, where his wife sickened and died. He commenced no mission at the island, but remained there long enough to acquire information of great importance to the American Board, and which had much to do in determining its future action. In a letter, dated Colombo, Dec. 20, 1813, Mr. Newell offered among other reasons for establishing a mission in Ceylon, the fact that the government (English) was friendly to missions; that the population of the island was from one to two millions; that there were great facilities for evangelizing the people, such as that there were but two languages spoken in the island,—that on learning these a missionary could preach to three millions of people; that the natives could read and write; that the whole Bible had been translated into Tamil, the language spoken in the north of the island, and the New Testament into Singalese, which was spoken in the interior and south; that there were 200,000 native Christians, so called, but who were totally ignorant of Christianity; that at least 100 schools were in operation, and that the mission would be perfectly secure under the British government. He also urged the fact that there were but two missionaries in the whole island, Mr. Ehrhardt, a German from the London society, and Mr. Chater, from the Baptist Society, and that neither of these could speak to the people in their native tongue; and the further consideration that the Tamil language was spoken by seven or eight millions on the continent, between which and the island intercourse was almost as easy and frequent as if they were contiguous.

These considerations, with others, led the Board to decide upon Ceylon as a field of missionary labor; and in 1815, five missionaries, viz.: Rev. Messrs. Meigs, Richards, Warren, Bardwell and Poor, embarked in the Dryad for Columbo, at which place they arrived March 22, 1816. After spending six months at Columbo, it was determined that Mr. Bardwell should go to Bombay, and that Messrs. Richards and Meigs should establish themselves at Batticotta, and Messrs. Warren and Poor at Tillipally, both of these stations being in the province of Jaffna. In a joint letter, dated Jaffnapatam, Oct. 9, 1816, these brethren communicate information of importance, and which may be referred to as showing the condition of the island at the period of commencing the mission of the American Board in that field.

Tillipally, they say, is situated about ten miles north, and Batticotta about six miles north-west of Jaffnapatam. At each of these places they found a salubrious climate; glebes and buildings, the property of the English government; churches and mansion houses, built of coral stone, by the Portuguese, and capable of being repaired for use, the churches being large enough for both public worship and schools. In the province of Jaffna there were some relics of the Roman Catholic religion, introduced by the Portuguese; some traces of religious knowledge, afterwards communicated by the Dutch; and some decaying fruits of the labors of later missionaries; and yet the great mass of the people were pagans. In the northern portion of the island, however, the missionaries found the people generally, and even the Brahmins, less devotedly attached to their idolatrous rites, feebler in their prejudices against Christianity, and more easily accessible, than in almost any other part of the pagan world. They spoke also of an almost total destitution of Bibles and school books. Copies of the Tamil Bible, a translation by the Dutch missionaries, were extremely scarce, and an English Bible was rarely to be met with, though many of the people could speak and read English. The missionaries therefore suggested to the Board the importance of at once establishing a printing press at Jaffna, with hands and means of putting it into vigorous operation, as the only method of meeting the demand for books.

In accordance with a previous arrangement, Messrs. Warren and Poor took up their residence at Tillipally, in October after their arrival, and immediately commenced preaching, through an interpreter, both at that place and at Mallagum, two miles distant. Mr. Poor at once entered upon the study of the Tamil language, and in one year he was able to preach to the people in their native tongue. From this time his hearers increased, and more marked impressions were produced. Simultaneously with this effort a school was established at Tillipally, for the instruction of children in both Tamil and English, and soon another was commenced at Mallagum, and others at Milette, and at Oodooville. Messrs. Richards and Meigs were prosecuting similar labors at Batticotta.

About the time that these brethren entered upon their respective fields, an event of much importance occurred, viz., the abolition of slavery in the island. This measure, effected chiefly by the instrumentality of Sir Alexander Johnstone, liberated a large number of slaves, and placed multitudes of children in a most interesting relation to the missions.

After sixteen months of successful labor, Messrs. Warren and Richards were taken off from their work by severe illness, and finding every expedient for their recovery unavailing, they embarked, April, 1818, for the Cape of Good Hope. Mr. Warren died at Cape Town in the following August, and Mr. Richards took passage for Madras. Mr. Poor was thus left alone at Tillipally, and Mr. Meigs at Batticotta, subjected to a severe disappointment and to augmented labors. Relief, however, was not far distant.

In November, 1818, Rev. Messrs. Miron Winslow, Levi Spaulding, and Henry Woodward, were ordained as missionaries to Ceylon, and to these was added John Scudder, M.D., a young physician of promise, and of devoted piety. On the 8th of June, 1819, these three missionaries and the physician, with their wives, embarked at Boston on board the Indus, and in the following February they were all at Tillipally, Dr. and Mrs. Scudder having buried their only child at Calcutta.

A little more than three years had now elapsed since the arrival of the first missionaries of the American Board in Ceylon, during which time fifteen schools had been established, nine in connection with Tillipally, and six with Batticotta, and the whole number of pupils was seven hundred. Besides these, there was a boarding-school, composed of youths under the special care of the missionaries, supported by contributions in America, and bearing the names suggested by the donors. Special tokens of the Divine presence began, at this period, to be enjoyed by the mission.

The Board had already forwarded a printing-press to Ceylon, and in August, 1820, Mr. James Garrett was sent out to superintend its operations. Unfortunately, Governor Brownrigg, a zealous friend of the mission, was absent, and the Lieutenant-Governor, Sir Edward Barnes, gave notice through his secretary, that the government would not allow any increase of American missionaries in Ceylon, and that

Mr. Garrett could not be permitted to remain on the island. Memorials to the Lieutenant-Governor were unavailing, and Mr. Garrett embarked for Bombay.

Soon after the arrival of the reinforcement, Messrs. Winslow and Spaulding commenced their labors at Oodooville. Dr. Scudder took up his residence at Panditeripo, and Mr. Woodward joined Mr. Poor at Tillipally. In 1821, five years from the commencement of the mission, five stations were occupied, and the missionaries, besides the labor of preaching and visiting, were superintending 24 schools, containing 1,150 children, and educating eighty-seven heathen children in their own families. Nine young men had given evidence of true conversion, and had been gathered into the church, and three of them had been licensed to preach the Gospel.

Mrs. Poor, the wife of Rev. Daniel Poor, died on the 7th of May, 1821, after a short illness, and Rev. Mr. Richards, who had long since been compelled to relinquish his labors, died in August of the same year, at Tillipally.

In 1822, the missionaries drew up a prospectus of a college or high school for Tamil and other youth, setting forth with great particularity its plan and course of study, its objects, and its contemplated benefits. Some of the more prominent of these were, the inculcation of true science in connection with Christianity, a higher standard of education among the people, the raising up of native preachers, translators, teachers, &c., and the influence of such an institution on the primary schools. This subject was laid before the Board in an elaborate and urgent form, and the proposed college, or higher seminary, was subsequently established.

The scenes and events of 1824 were of very marked and peculiar interest to this mission. In January of that year, indications of unusual seriousness were observed at Tillipally, and in a little time, proofs of the presence of the Holy Spirit appeared at all the other stations. A revival of religion, of undoubted genuineness and great power, had commenced, and, within a few months, changes of a most surprising and affecting character were witnessed. At Panditeripo, Dr. Scudder's station, the religious interest increased till, on the 12th of February, the convictions of sin and of the need of salvation, became as deep and earnest as ever marked a revival in a Christian land. The boys of the school were so deeply impressed, that, on retiring to their rooms in the evening, they could not sleep. Between 30 and 40 of them went out into the garden, where they were heard in supplication, weeping and asking, "What shall I do to be saved?" and "Lord, send thy Spirit." Of this company more than 20 soon gave evidence of a saving change. Similar scenes were witnessed in all the boarding-schools, and, as a result, fifty-six native converts were admitted to the church. Most of them continued to give evidence of true conversion.

The contemplated high school at Batticotta having been established, a class of the best scholars was received into it from the school at Tillipally, making room for others at the latter place, and more than one hundred applied for admission at a single examination—a great change from the time when the missionaries could not persuade nor hire a single child to live on their premises. During the year 1826 several seasons of special religious interest were enjoyed by the mission, attended with the same results, though not as extensive, as during the first revival.

These wonderful changes were wrought by no such means as were employed by the Portuguese and Dutch missions. A totally different policy had been pursued. The missionaries simply preached, prayed, conversed, and distributed Bibles and tracts among the adults, and established schools among the children, till more than 2000 had been taught the rudiments of learning and the simple truths of Christianity. This, without external pomp or force, or the enticing words of man's wisdom, became the wisdom and the power of God among a people who, just before, were involved in the ignorance, degradation and idolatry of paganism. It was a demonstration of the fact,—too little understood by many at that day,—that the regeneration of the heathen was to be effected, not by might nor by power, but by the Spirit of the Lord.

In reviewing their work in August, 1827, after eleven years of toil, the missionaries were enabled to speak of large accessions to the church; the abandonment of idolatry by many of the natives who had not embraced Christianity; a general spirit of inquiry among the people; a press in operation, and a better supply of the Scriptures, which were read with avidity; more than 80 schools in successful operation; and about 30 native assistants in various departments of the work. One year later, August, 1828, the missionaries say, "The attachment of the people to their gods is decreasing, and there is a great stir among the Roman Catholics, in consequence of a tract recently addressed to their priests, who had commanded the people to burn our books." In April, 1829, they allude with special interest to the qualification of a number of pious youths to make known the Gospel, an increasing spirit of inquiry among the natives, and the distrust they were beginning to feel in their systems of geography, astronomy and philosophy, long held by them to be divine. Particularly had the confidence of learned natives in their systems been shaken, by a serious error in their calculations of an eclipse, which was pointed out to them by the missionaries, and proved by the event. The circumstance did much to destroy the authority of their sacred books. In October, 1830, the mission was favored with another season of awakening, during which many were converted, and the church and the missionaries were quickened and encouraged.

In March, 1831, a disastrous fire occurred, in which the house, church, study, and large school bungalow at Manepy were destroyed, together with the furniture, library, clothing, &c., of Mr. and Mrs. Woodward. In this calamity many of the natives rejoiced, believing it to be an evidence that the anger of the gods rested upon the missionary. On the 21st of the same month 34 persons were received to the church at Oodooville. On the 24th of July of this year, Mr. and Mrs. Meigs were called to bury an amiable and beloved daughter, Harriet, aged 11 years. She had dedicated herself to the Saviour ten months before, and had given decided evidence of piety. At the close of this year it was said, in regard to the female boarding school at Oodooville, that none had been long members of it without becoming hopeful subjects of converting grace, and that none had dishonored their profession. All who had left the school were married to Christian husbands, and were training up families in a Christian manner. During this year, also, twenty-eight from the seminary at Batticotta, were added to the church.

On the 15th of January, 1832, thirteen natives from Tillipally and Oodooville, were added to the church, and on the 4th of March, ten more were received. At this period the missionaries commenced the plan of sending out the most intelligent and pious young men of the seminary, to visit the people regularly from house to house, carrying tracts, and a circular letter from the missionaries to the people. The result was highly favorable. At the close of this year a theological class was formed in the seminary at Batticotta, consisting of about thirty students, who had completed their course in the seminary. This was viewed by the missionaries as a most important step; for they considered, that while European and American missionaries must be pioneers in this work, it could not be carried on and completed without the aid of a native ministry.

In January, 1833, the mission was afflicted by the sudden death of Mrs. Winslow. She departed in great joy and triumph, and her memoir, as well as that of Mrs. Newell, will live to quicken the zeal of the church and stimulate the hopes and labors of other missionaries, till the heathen are all converted to God. On the 24th of this month, at the quarterly church meeting at Oodooville, twelve new members were admitted, one of them a daughter of Mr. Spaulding. In July of this year, a reinforcement, consisting of Rev. Messrs. Todd, Hutchins, Hoisington, and Apthorp, and Dr. Nathan Ward, embarked at Boston, taking with them a printing press. In June, Mr. Winslow baptized the interpreter of the court of Mallagum, a man of sterling character and of high respectability among the natives. He had embraced Christianity amid much opposition. During this month several buildings belonging to the mission at Tillipally were destroyed by fire, and in the following August the church was set on fire, and nearly all the Tamil books and tracts were destroyed.

On the 28th of October the missionaries who embarked at Boston in July, arrived in Ceylon. Dr. Ward being now on the ground, Dr. Scudder commenced a new station at Chavagachery, a parish containing a numerous population. Mr. Winslow, after the death of his wife, embarked for America, taking with him his three children, and seven belonging to other families in the mission.

Near the close of the year 1834, the mission experienced another signal visitation of mercy. Two of the most pleasing features attending this work, say the missionaries, were its quickness and depth. Conversion almost immediately followed conviction, and the depth of feeling was manifested by uninterrupted prayer and praise, in their general meetings, social circles, and private rooms. This revival was carried on in connection with protracted meetings, at nearly all the stations. At the quarterly communion of the seven local churches of the mission, in March, 1835, forty-seven natives, male and female, were publicly received into the church, and a daughter of Mr. Meigs was received at the same time. In the latter part of the year 1835, the seminary at Batticotta was again visited with the influences of the Holy Spirit; and in September, 1836, the female seminary at Oodooville received a like visitation.

In May, 1837, there was another revival in the seminary at Batticotta. During this year there were 49 admissions to the church, and 24 excommunications, many of them for marrying heathen wives. The mission this year experienced a most painful reverse, in being obliged, through a deficiency of the funds of the Board, to dismiss 45 students from the seminary at Batticotta, and 8 from the female seminary at Oodooville. They were compelled also, from the same cause, to relinquish nearly all the village schools, to curtail their printing operations, and to reduce their own expenses below the demands of health and comfort. By the dispersion of the schools, the Sabbath congregations were nearly broken up, and in every direction efficient missionary labor was made nearly impossible. "We could have wished," say the missionaries, "that Christians in America could have turned aside for a day, from buying, and selling, and getting gain, to see these 45 boys, as they left the seminary to go back to their heathen homes." It was to the mission, a sudden, unforeseen blow, coming, as they said, like a thunderbolt, and breaking up plans and operations whose success, under God, depended very much upon their permanency. In the aggregate, not less than 171 schools were disbanded, and the number of pupils dismissed exceeded 5000. One of the older missionaries, in dismissing the schools from his station, says, in fit and most affecting language, "I told them the reason, exhorted them to read the Bible, and not to enter into temptation, to keep the Sabbath holy,—prayed with them, commending them to the Friend of little children, and then sent them away—from me, from the Bible class, from the Sabbath-school, from the house of prayer,—to feed on the mountains of heathenism, with the idols under the green trees; a prey to the roaring lion, to evil demons, and to a people more ignorant than they, even to their blind, deluded and deluding guides,—and when I looked after them as they went out, my heart failed me. O what an offering to Swamy!—five thousand children!" These events, on becoming known, moved the deepest sympathies of the Board and of the churches, and with the least possible delay the Prudential Committee removed the restrictions which they had imposed, not willingly, but because they could not disburse what was not in their treasury. The receipts of the Board had been cut short by the extreme pecuniary pressure which, at that time, prevailed in this country.

This information from the Committee, relieving the mission of its embarrassments, was received in November 1838, upon which joyful occasion a day of special thanksgiving was kept. Though the injury could not be repaired at once, schools enough were soon resumed to give a degree of efficiency to the system. At this date four presses were in operation, giving employment to 70 natives, and issuing a much larger amount of missionary and other publications, than any other establishment of the kind in Southern India.

Thirty-seven native converts were received to the church in 1839. The number in the female seminary at Oodoville at this date was 95—within five of the number in 1837, before the calamity above referred to. A view of the domestic habits of the pupils of this school is thus given: "When they take their food they sit in rows, facing each other, each with a brass plate or dish to receive her portion of rice and curry, or congee. When all are served, one implores a blessing on the food, after which they begin to eat. They eat with the hand, if it be rice, or with a leaf instead of a spoon if it be congee. Their dress is of white cotton cloth, consisting of a short loose jacket, and a cloth varying in length from two to five yards, according to their size, wrapped about them and flowing down to their feet. Both in food and dress it is thought best for them to follow the usages of native society. The girls of the school, of whatever caste or family, all eat together without complaint."

In the year 1840 there were 9,520,000 pages of Scripture, and 1,788,000 pages of tracts printed, making a total of more than eleven millions of pages. A very full and elaborate report was made by the mission this year, on the importance of giving instruction through the English language. They represent the native language as so much a part and parcel of heathenism, so deficient in scientific and theological terms, and so unwieldy, that it cannot be made the vehicle of correct ideas, and especially not of doctrinal truths and the sentiments of a pure Christian morality.

Two important regulations were adopted in 1841. The first was, that the pupils then belonging to the seminary at Batticotta should be required in future to furnish their own clothing; and the second was, that every youth, on entering the seminary, should be required to give security for the payment of his board during the whole seminary course. These measures were well received by the community, and a new class was admitted on this plan. In 1842 a small paper was published in Tamil, with about 700 subscribers, its columns being open to communications from native Christians, and from heathens. In a report to the Board this year, mention is made of the temporal advantages which the natives derived from Christianity: "When I arrived in Jaffna twenty-six years ago," says Mr. Meigs, "there were but five bullock carts in the whole district; now there are more than 500. The temporal condition of the people has also greatly improved during that period, in many other ways. They have more learning, more wealth, more enterprise, and fewer taxes."

From the very outset, the missionaries had taken special care not to admit any to baptism and to the church who did not give evidence of having been regenerated by the Spirit of God, and who were not thus prepared for the trials they must meet with on leaving the seminaries. Never were instructions more faithful and searching, and yet heathenism could not be at once and entirely eradicated from the hearts of the natives, and painful defections were often witnessed. The most disheartening instance of the kind that ever occurred in connection with this mission was in the spring of 1843, when it was discovered that a system of deception, lying, and other gross forms of corruption, had crept into the Batticotta seminary. A thorough investigation was made, and 61 scholars, including the whole of the select class, were immediately expelled from the school. Several of the native teachers were at the same time dismissed, and those that remained were divested of much of their responsibility, the missionaries themselves assuming their duties. Trying as such a process was, there was no alternative, and the result showed its wisdom. It illustrated to the people of the whole district the high requisitions of the Bible, the purity and sacredness of the church, and the utter repugnance of Christianity to the vices of heathenism. It inspired confidence in the missionaries also, as being unselfish, and concerned for nothing but the morals and welfare of the youth under their care. Accordingly but a few weeks had elapsed before heathen parents were beseeching the missionaries to take their sons back into the school, promising to watch over them, pay for their books, &c. One year later the seminary at Batticotta was found in a more flourishing condition than ever before, the qualifications for admission having been raised, and the pupils paying more largely and freely for tuition, board, and books.

In 1845 heathenism began to develop itself in new forms of opposition. So far had the mission progressed, so high were the demands of Christianity, and so steady and resistless was its pressure upon the surrounding idolatry, that the missionaries were led to remark, "We are now made to feel that we have come into closer contact than ever with the benighted and benumbed mind and iron-hearted soul of Hindooism; and that nothing but the sword of the Spirit, wielded by God himself, can cause one of the enemy to fall before us."

In November, 1846, Mr. Spaulding, who had been spending a little season in his native country, sailed from Boston, with his wife, to rejoin the mission at Ceylon. He was accompanied by Rev. William Scudder, a son of Dr. Scudder, and by Rev. E. P. Hastings.

At no period was the importance of schools and a high standard of education in connection with the mission, more manifest, than in 1847, when it was remarked by the missionaries that the Brahmins, the highest caste, who had uniformly refused the education proffered them, were sinking in influence, while the lower, but better educated classes, were rising above them and filling the places of office and trust under the government. Brahminical influence had ever been one of the strongest holds of heathenism in the northern portion of Ceylon, and it was thus coming into disgrace and losing its power. It was in this year that Sir J. Emerson Tennent, the British Colonial Secretary in Ceylon, published his testimony respecting the mission. In a letter to one of the secretaries of the Board, he says: "Having at length visited in person all your stations, however unusual a spontaneous communication of this kind may be, I cannot resist the impulse to convey to you my strong sense of the sustained exertions of your missionaries, and of their unexampled success in this colony. Much as I had heard of their usefulness and its results, I was not prepared to witness such evidences of it as I have seen; not in their school rooms only, or in the attainments and conduct of their pupils, but in the aspect of the whole community, amongst whom they have been toiling, and the obvious effect which their care and instructions have been producing on the industrial, social, and moral character of the surrounding population. The whole appearance of this district bespeaks the efficacy of your system. Its domestic character is changing, and its social aspect presents a contrast to any other portion of Ceylon, as distinct and remarkable as it is delightful and encouraging. Civilization and secular knowledge are rapidly opening the eyes of the heathen community to a conviction of the superiority of the external characteristics of Christianity, and thereby creating a wish to know something of the inward principles which lead to an outward development so attractive."

In 1849, the Governor of Ceylon visited the mission stations, and on his return to Colombo he published a notice of his observations, in which he said, "His excellency cannot omit to dwell with peculiar satisfaction on the pleasure afforded him by his personal inspection of the great educational establishments, which are the distinguishing characteristics of the northern province. To those noble volunteers in the cause of Christianity and education, the gentlemen of the American mission, who by their generous self-devotion in a foreign and distant land, have produced so marked an improvement in the scene of their labors, his excellency feels that he should pay a special tribute of grateful acknowledgement. He is glad to hail, in this dedication of American enterprise and American charity to the work of civilizing and enlightening a distant dependency of the British crown, one more tie of kindred with the great nation that sends them forth—one more pledge that between the Old and the New England, there can henceforth be only a generous rivalry in the cause of knowledge and truth."

In 1849, a new version of the whole Bible into Tamil was completed, with great labor and care, by committees, both in Jaffna and Madras, and beautifully printed in one royal octavo volume. Of this translation Mr. Meigs says, "I find it very exactly conformed to the Hebrew, as well as to our English version, while it is also pure and idiomatic Tamil. It will, I have no doubt, prove a great blessing to the whole Tamil people, and many thousands will bless God for the labors of those who have prepared it."

A summary of the mission of the American Board in Ceylon, from its commencement to the close of 1852, a period of thirty-six years, presents very important and gratifying results.

Missionaries and Helpers.—The whole number of persons who have been connected with the mission, is 60; 28 males and 32 females. Of these 18 have died, and an equal number have been obliged, for various reasons, to relinquish the missionary work. Eleven left after a service of from 9 to 17 years; 10 have been in the field from 16 to 36 years. Of 85 children born to these missionary families in Ceylon, only 12 have died in the island, and but three or four after leaving for America.

tensively in Ceylon. Temperance societies have been formed, lectures delivered, and pledges of total abstinence signed by a large number of the people. It is easy to gather from 500 to 1000 people to hear addresses on this subject. On one of these occasions, in 1852, 200 signed the pledge. These meetings are conducted in a strictly religious manner, being opened and closed with prayer; and in connection with the addresses, much instruction is given in regard to other prevailing vices. The people learn, by this very means, that the missionaries are their best friends, and are thus led in great numbers to hear the Gospel preached. It should be added that the temperance movement originated chiefly with the young men educated at the Batticotta seminary, and is carried on by them, with the coöperation of the missionaries.

Native Contributions.—For several years there has been a "Native Evangelical Society" in Jaffna, designed to call into activity the Christian benevolence of the native converts. Some of them manifest a very strong desire to spread the knowledge of Christ. This society, besides contributing frequently to the funds of the American Board, supports a catechist at Varany, and has also the entire care of the Island of Delft, sustaining there a Christian family and a large school. This island is within the field of the Ceylon mission, and contains an ignorant and degraded population of about three thousand.

Present state of Heathenism and prospects of the Mission.—After thirty-six years of unwearied Christian effort in this field, the missionaries and the Christian world are permitted to contemplate a degree of progress as surprising as it is gratifying; and to the question: "Watchman, what of the night?" is confidently answered, "The morning cometh." "It may be true," say the missionaries, "that some forms of wickedness increase; that idolatry even may assume a bolder and more offensive front; but this is only the natural effect of the increase of light. There is no doubt that heathenism is disturbed. While the mass of the people are losing their confidence in the rites and ceremonies of their ancestors, there are many who are roused by this very fact, to greater efforts to sustain them; but they only thereby publish their own shame, and hasten the destruction of their cause. That the people are extensively hypocritical in their idol worship, is abundantly evident. This is remarkably true throughout our field, and is a fact full of encouragement. We need not, as in former years, spend our time in attacking idolatry, but can directly preach Christ, and him crucified."

CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—The Church Missionary Society commenced its labors in Ceylon, in 1818, establishing missions simultaneously among the Hindoos of the northern province, and among the Budhists of Colombo and Point De Galle, and of the Kandian hills in the central portion of the island. Two energetic men, Mr. Mayor and Mr. Lambrick, stationed themselves at once in Kandy, about 90 miles N. E. from Colombo. It is surrounded by woody hills and mountains, and was anciently the capital of an independent kingdom of the same name. The town itself has only about 3,000 people, but in the neighboring highlands, to which the labors of these missionaries extended, there is a population of 200,000.

In no part of Ceylon has progress been so difficult and slow as among the Kandians. It was four years after the arrival of the missionaries before there was encouragement to build a school-house, even in the capital of the province; and after the lapse of ten years the number of pupils was small. The number of conversions was still more limited. These discouragements arose in part from the secluded and solitary condition of the province, for the boundaries of the Kandian territory were defended by dense forests, and every opening was guarded by a species of palm, covered with knobs, from the points of which protruded spikes as sharp as the beak of a hawk. Besides the natural fortifications, watches were stationed at every pass from the low country, beside gates of thorns, which were only opened for the passage of the king's people. Within these gloomy confines, Europeans seldom entered; and when the mission was commenced, in 1818, the British government discouraged the attempt, as it could not assure them of any adequate protection in such a region. The priesthood of Buddhism thus secluded, exerted undisputed sway, and the Kandians preserved a rigid conformity to all its teachings. On the arrival of the missionaries they could conceive of no possible advantages to be derived from having their children educated, and it was impossible to assemble a class. After a perseverance of five years, however, five schools had been established, numbering 127 pupils, and so indefatigable were the labors of these men, that in 1839 the number of schools had increased to thirteen, and the number of scholars to 400.

To attempt the education of females seemed for a long time utterly hopeless; for even the little instruction that was given to the boys in the temples of the Budhist priests, was withheld from the girls, who were regarded as unfit for tuition of any kind. It was therefore ten years before a school for the instruction of girls could be opened in Kandy. The Church missionaries, with an intimate knowledge of the native language, have sought to explain the doctrines of Christianity to the Kandians, in their secluded villages, and they have secured, to a great degree, the confidence of the native peasantry; but owing to the ascendancy of the priesthood, very few have avowed their belief in the truth of Christianity. During the last ten or twelve years, Europeans have settled among the Kandian hills, causing some irritation to the peasants, but affording protection to the mission, which is still continued. It is stated, however, in a recent Report of the Church Missionary Society, that the labors of the missionaries are confined in a great measure to sojourners from the maritime provinces, who reside at Kandy and other places in the interior, and who are nominal Christians, and that the native Kandians have received comparatively little attention. There are now at the Kandy station five schools: one English, three Singalese, and one for girls. The number of boys is 117, girls 10. There are five regular congregations, with an average attendance of one hundred.

The mission station of the Church of England, at Baddagame, in the low country, ten miles north of Point De Galle, although commenced as early as that at Kandy, has been even less successful, though not without some important results. Schools have been established, printed books have been circulated and read, and many have been made acquainted with the principles of Christianity. Still there have been but few conversions, and after the labor of nearly forty years, the missionaries have very little to cheer them. In the annual report for 1852, Rev. Mr. Parsons, one of the missionaries, says: "At this place the church is built (it was dedicated by Bishop Heber,) and here are the mission residences, seminary, and girls' school; but here, alas, is the greatest indifference to the good news of salvation. It seems as if the people were hardened to the sound of the church bell and the missionary's voice, and accustomed to treat both with silent contempt. Last year I established an early service for the heathen, who objected to come to the ordinary service. Like everything else at Baddagame, it succeeded for a time, but within three months fell to nothing."

By far the most important of the stations of the Church of England mission in Ceylon, is that at Cotta, a populous district within a few miles of Colombo. The situation of Cotta is peculiarly beautiful, being on the verge of vast gardens of cinnamon, and surrounded by natural forests, and interspersed with plantations of spices and groves of cocoa nut and palm. Here the mission commenced its labors in 1823, by the opening of schools and the preaching of the Gospel to the natives throughout their hamlets. In connection with this mission, a collegiate institution was founded in 1827, for the training of native teachers and assistants destined for the ministry. It commenced with ten pupils, and has continued to the present time with remarkable success. To this institution have resorted the Tamils of Jaffna, the Kandians from the hills, and the Singalese from the low country. In this "oriental college" there are at present 22 students, extending their studies to Greek and Latin, Euclid, Scripture history, &c. There are also at Cotta 28 vernacular schools for boys and 38 for girls, containing in all 750 children, besides English schools for boys and girls. There are at present two missionaries at Cotta, Rev. Messrs. Gordon and Wood, and the number of services held on the Sabbath is 15. The average attendance is about 1000, more than half of them being adults. A printing-press has been for some years in operation at this station, and from this was issued a translation of the scriptures, known as the "Cotta version."

In the Jaffna district the Church Missionary Society has three mission stations, viz.: at Nellore, Chundicully, and Copay. These are all in the neighborhood of the town of Jaffna, Chundicully being a suburb, Nellore about two miles distant, and Copay five miles distant. There is a missionary and a church at each place, but the attendance is small, the total number of adults at the three stations being 200, and of children 400. They have also 37 schools, in some of which only Tamil is taught, in others only English. In Nellore a girls' boarding school has been established, similar to that of the American mission at Oodoville. It has 42 pupils, most of them the children of heathen parents. The principal of this school is a superior native young woman, who was brought up in the school, and who speaks and writes English with remarkable accuracy. There is also a high school for boys at Chundicully, with 29 pupils.—REV. E. D. MOORE

WESLEYAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—The Wesleyan mission to Ceylon was undertaken at the suggestion of Sir Alexander Johnston, Chief-Justice of that island. He had attentively studied the character and results of the Wesleyan missions in the West Indies, and most earnestly urged upon the Wesleyan Conference the importance of extending their operations to Ceylon. Some temporary difficulties prevented the immediate adoption of the suggestion; but the impression produced upon the Methodist Conference by his appeals, led to the establishment of their Eastern Missions. Dr. Coke had set his heart upon sending or carrying the Gospel to India; and as soon as it was agreed to undertake the mission, he, though advanced in years, determined to embark in it. Being possessed of considerable property, he proposed not only to introduce and establish the present mission, but also to advance whatever money might be required for the outfit and settlement of the missionaries; a rare instance of individual generosity and devotion to the cause of missions. After some discussion, it was finally agreed that six missionaries for Ceylon, and one for the Cape of Good Hope, should sail with Dr. Coke. Those for Ceylon were, Messrs. William Ault, James Lynch, George Erskine, William Martin Harvard, Thomas Hall Squance, and Benjamin Clough. Two of the party, Harvard and Squance, were acquainted with the management of the printing-press, which subsequently proved of great service to the mission. Dr. Coke, accompanied by six missionaries, set sail from Portsmouth on the 30th of December, 1813. On the passage, Mrs. Ault, wife of one of the missionaries, died, happy in God, and was committed to the great deep, in joyful hope of a resurrection to eternal life. This was a great affliction; but one still greater soon followed. On the 3d of May following, Dr. Coke was suddenly called to his eternal reward. He had been indisposed a few days before, but there was no apprehension of danger; and on the day previous to his death, he appeared considerably better. It was supposed that he died of apoplexy, as no noise was heard in the adjoining cabins, and he was found dead. Deep and mysterious are the ways of Providence! The Doctor believed he had a call to the East; he had devoted himself to the work; and, to use his own language, "Only lived for India;" yet before he could reach his destination, he died alone, in his cabin, and was committed to a watery grave. The missionaries were thrown by this sad calamity into a state of painful apprehension; they had not only lost their counsellor and guide; but they were left also, without immediate pecuniary support. The whole enterprise had rested so entirely on their departed friend, that they did not know whether any provision had been made for the event which they had to deplore. But the loss, however, of the human arm, on which they had leaned, led them, by the grace of God, to a more entire dependence on Him.

They arrived at Bombay, May 21, and the letters of introduction which they had brought to several persons of distinction, obtained for them a kind reception. Among them was one to W. T. Money, Esq., a principal agent at Bombay, from Dr. Buchanan; and he relieved their anxiety by assuring them he should be happy to advance them any funds they might need, on the credit of their Society at home. The Governor, Sir Evan Nepean, to whom likewise they had letters, showed them all the kindness which their circumstances required, and had a house of his own prepared for their accommodation.

On the 26th of June, the mission family, with the exception of Mr. and Mrs. Harvard, sailed from Bombay, and landed at Point de Galle, after a voyage of nine days. Their generous friend, Mr. Money, had written to Mr. Gibson, the Master Attendant of Galle, informing him of the probable time of their arrival, and describing the signal which the captain would make on coming in sight of land. In consequence, he had been looking out for the ship, and paid them all the attention they required. This proof of the lively interest which Mr. Money took in their affairs, filled them with gratitude to him and to God; but what were their emotions of surprise and thankfulness, when they learned that Sir Evan Nepean also had taken the trouble of writing favorably concerning them, to the Governor of Ceylon, Sir Robert Brownrigg, who had in consequence immediately written to Lord Molesworth, commandant of Galle, directing that the Government House in the fort should be prepared for their reception! Lord Molesworth executed these instructions, not with mere official punctuality, but, though an entire stranger to them, with all the feelings of personal friendship. These favors were rendered to the missionaries for the sake of the cause in which they were embarked; and they serve to mark the rapid transition now going on in the public mind. The Rev. George Bisset, episcopal chaplain at Colombo, as well as the Governor and other gentlemen, showed them every brotherly kindness, and wished them all success. The Governor offered to allow them fifty-six dollars a month for each school that they might establish. After mature deliberation and fervent prayer, it appeared to them advisable to occupy only four stations for the present; namely, Jaffna and Batticaloa, for the Tamil division of the island, Galle and Matura for the Singalese; and it was agreed that Messrs. Lynch and Squance should go to Jaffna, Mr. Ault to Batticaloa, Mr. Erskine to Matura, and that Mr. Clough should remain at Galle.

In a few days, after celebrating the Lord's Supper together, in which Lord Molesworth requested permission to join them, Messrs. Lynch and Squance set out for Jaffna. On their arrival at Colombo they were hospitably entertained by Mr. Twistleton, and much refreshed in spirit by their intercourse with other friends. Sir Robert and Lady Brownrigg, Sir Alexander and Lady Johnston, gave them a cordial welcome, and encouraged them to proceed. Mr. Armour received them as brethren, and Mr. Chater, the Baptist missionary, was no less kind, and invited them to preach in his chapel, where the military of the garrison attended. Their attention was called to the case of a convert from Mohammedanism, who had been baptized in the fort church by the name of Daniel Theophilus, said to be the first conversion from Islamism which had been known in Ceylon. He was a man of strong mind and considerable learning; and hopes were entertained that his public renunciation of his former faith, and his open acknowledgement of Christianity, would have an extensive effect on others of the same faith. The change in his religious profession had called down upon him the indignation of his relatives and former connexions, some of whom were fully bent upon his destruction. But he was taken under the protection of the government, and by them committed to the care of Messrs. Lynch and Squance, that he might accompany them to Jaffnapatam, and there be further instructed in the doctrines and duties of Christianity.

On the first of August they set out with this interesting companion: and on their arrival at Jaffna, the sub-collector, Mr. Mooyart, received them with great kindness. Here they were also welcomed by Christian David, the Tamil preacher from Tranquebar, who presided over the Tamil Christians in that province. He told Mr. Lynch that he had for more than ten years prayed that some missionaries might be sent to Ceylon, and that he regarded their arrival as an answer to his prayers. While he was able to afford them considerable aid in furthering the objects of their mission, they in their turn greatly assisted him in the way of religious instruction. They had now a gratifying proof of the liberal intentions of the government towards them in the proposal for the endowment of English schools to be placed under their care. Since Jaffna was to be the residence of two missionaries, they found that the stipulated allowance for each school was, in their case, doubled.

At the request of the European residents, who were without the means of public instruction, they held Divine service in English, alternately reading the church prayers and preaching; and they were much encouraged by the apparent effects of their ministrations.

The other missionaries joined their stations about the same time, and met with similar aid in the prosecution of their work. Matura, to which Mr. Erskine was appointed, was about thirty miles from Galle. The civil authorities afforded him every facility he required in the opening of the promised English school, which the children of the highest classes of natives attended with manifest pleasure. He soon commenced his English ministration, also, in the Dutch church in the fort; but his congregation was small, the European garrison consisting of few troops. The native population was considerable, and the district was found to be one of the strongholds of their superstition: he lost no time, therefore, in beginning the study of Singalese, that he might attack the enemy in his quarters.

Batticaloa, Mr. Ault's station, was above 150 miles beyond Matura. It is a small island, containing a fort, with a few houses; but it is the central point of an important district of the same name, which carries on a constant trade with the interior, and contains a large population. Mr. Ault proceeded to Batticaloa, in a native dhoney, a kind of sailing barge, which was expected to make the passage in three days; but it took more than eight to reach the destined port. As he had not provided for so long a passage, his sufferings and privations by the way, added to his affliction from the recent loss of his wife, so shook his constitution, that he was ill-suited to enter upon his arduous duties. There was no habitation vacant for him; but the Collector, Mr. Sawers, and the Magistrate, Mr. Atkinson, received him into their houses, and showed him every attention, and he was soon sufficiently recovered to open the English school. On Sunday mornings he performed divine service for the civilians and military, when his congregation was seldom less than 150, the soldiers being marched to church. He had an evening service also, at which their attendance was optional; and the numbers that came were sufficient to show a desire to hear the Word, while a few applied to him under serious concern. The station was crowded with the sick; they saw their comrades dying daily; and the missionary sought to improve the solemn season to their souls. He did not, however, suffer these labors to divert him from the natives. He labored hard at the Tamil language, and soon began to itinerate among the huts in the neighboring country.

At Galle, Mr. Clough performed the English service, in the Dutch church, every Sunday; and a private house in the fort was fitted up, by some of his hearers, for preaching on an evening during the week, and for religious conversation with those under serious impressions. The marked attention of Lord Molesworth not only encouraged him, but exerted a good influence among the officers and troops. His Lordship often appeared in company with the humble missionary on public occasions, and was seldom absent from the cottage in which their religious meetings were held. The good effect produced upon the European inhabitants and the military was soon very apparent. But, though encouraged by these things, Mr. Clough could not permit himself to be detained from his missionary work. Besides the numerous Europeans and the inhabitants of Dutch and Portuguese extraction in the fort, at Galle, the Mohammedans resided there in great numbers, and had a mosque in the garrison, the only one in the whole island. There was a very large population of Singalese in the adjacent country, whose docility and gentleness of disposition were not surpassed by the natives of any other district in the British territories; but they were heathen. To these, Mr. Clough's attention was anxiously directed; and he wished to live among them, to study their language, and to exert himself for their spiritual welfare; and it was not long before Providence opened the way for him to do so. He received a visit at the Government-house, from Don Abraham Dias Abeyesinhe Amavasekara, the Maha or great Moodeliar of Galle, a fine-looking man, of good understanding, and of a liberal mind, and who, from his rank, was possessed of unbounded influence throughout the district. After the usual compliments, he addressed Mr. Clough in English, stating that he was come to place his own children under his protection and instructions; that, having heard that he was desirous to establish a school for the sons of native head-men, he was glad to offer him a good house, ready furnished for the purpose, near his own residence, which, if it suited him, was at his service; adding, that he should think it an honor to have such a reverend gentleman living near him, and that he would assist him in all things in his power. Mr. Clough having accepted the offer, was thus, without any expense to the mission fund, placed at once in a situation of comfort and respectability, in which he could prosecute the study of the language, and commence his labors among the natives. His school was soon opened, and attended by some of the most intelligent boys upon the island. The Moodeliar manifested great anxiety for his comfort, furnished him with a horse, and afforded him assistance whenever he required it. The patronage and friendship of this person had great influence on the surrounding natives. Curiosity was powerfully excited, and in his new residence Mr. Clough was visited by learned priests, and persons of various classes who came to inquire respecting the religion he professed. With the help of an interpreter, he had frequent opportunities to converse with these visitors concerning the faith that is in Christ, and had the pleasure, in some instances, of seeing them depart, apparently impressed with the results of their inquiries. By the Moodeliar's assistance he obtained a competent Singalese teacher, under whose instruction he applied himself diligently to the study of that language. He soon had reason to trace the providence of God in these arrangements, which were ordered so entirely in accordance with his design, and yet so independently of himself. He began immediately to hold intercourse with the Singalese, and especially with the priests; and Providence cast him in the way of one of the most influential in the island, who was well known both in the Kandian and British dominions. This high-priest was everywhere extolled for his extensive knowledge, both of the religion and literature of Ceylon, as well as of the Oriental languages, and several marks of distinction had been conferred upon him. He had resided for a considerable time at the Court of Kandy; and at his inauguration as a priest he had the honor of riding on the king's own elephant. Mr. Clough, desirous of becoming acquainted with the native superstitions, that he might be the better prepared to expose their absurdity and impiety, took every opportunity to be present at their religious services, and endeavored, on such occasions, to engage the priests in conversation, in the hearing of their followers. A celebrated festival, called Banna maddua, at which the priest was carried in great pomp on the shoulders of his disciples, furnished the first opportunity of conversing with the high-priest, who appeared to be deeply impressed with what he heard, and visited Mr. Clough in private, for further information. Mr. Clough gave him a copy of the Gospels at his own heathen temple, in presence of some of his pupils, educating for the Buddhist priesthood, who were not a little surprised at the joy which he expressed, and the care with which he wrapped up the book. He read it with diligence, and it furnished him with topics of inquiry, which led to the gradual development of the whole system of human redemption. After about two months, the priest avowed an entire revolution of sentiment, professed his firm conviction of the Divine origin of Christianity, and expressed a wish openly to renounce Buddhism, and to make a public profession of his faith in Christ. He now became anxious for baptism, declaring that he regarded it as the characteristic mark of those who were not worshipers of idols. But as this step would inevitably subject him to the privations of poverty, and perhaps to the attacks of infuriated idolaters upon his life, Mr. Clough made the Governor acquainted with all the circumstances of the case, and received an immediate answer from his Excellency, that if the priest, from conviction, embraced the Christian religion, protection should be afforded him.

Meanwhile, every effort was tried by his friends and the priests to shake his resolution; but threats and persuasions were alike unavailing, he had "counted the cost." On the 25th of December, 1814, he put off the yellow robes of his profession, and was publicly admitted into the visible Church of Christ, in the presence of a crowded congregation, by the ordinance of Baptism, receiving the name of Peterus Panditta Sekarras. Thus did he give up rank, affluence, connexions, family, and all that the world holds dear, to embrace the religion of Jesus, in obedience to the dictates of conscience. Through the interposition of Sir Robert Brownrigg, he was placed in a situation to maintain himself. His literary qualifications obtained for him the office of Singalese translator to the government, at a fixed salary. His studies were directed with a view to his becoming, at a future period, a preacher of the Gospel among his own countrymen. Many of the priests were so shaken by this conduct of their leader, that they, also, were desirous of embracing Christianity; but there was this difficulty in the way: when they cast off their robes, they lost all, even their freehold estates, if they had any.

Not long after the arrival of the missionaries they had to mourn the loss of one of their companions, Mr. Ault, who sank under a severe disease with which he had for some time been afflicted. He died at Batticaloa, and was interred with every mark of respect from all classes of inhabitants. His career was short, but not without effect. In the article which appeared in the Government Gazette announcing his death, after bearing testimony to his piety and zeal, it is added—"Possessing rare qualifications for the meritorious and useful work which he had undertaken, his success in the short space of eight months, in raising at that place, a respect for, and a decent observance of, at least the external form of religion, was truly remarkable. And although it could not be said that he made any converts from either the heathen or Mohammedan faith to that of Christianity; yet, by the establishment of eight schools for the education of Hindoo children, and by his talents and address having so far overcome the scruples and prejudices of their parents, as to introduce the reading of the New Testament as the only school-book to the more advanced scholars, he has laid the foundation for a most extensive propagation of our faith."

About this time it was proposed to establish a system of village preaching on the Lord's day, in the vicinity of Colombo, where Mr. Harvard was then stationed, by means of interpreters. For this purpose they were provided with Singalese youths from the government seminary, who were deemed competent to interpret the missionaries' discourses. Two or three of the government interpreters were associated with them, and Sir A. Johnston directed that the principal Singalese interpreter of the Supreme Court should accompany Mr. Harvard whenever required. The persons so employed were previously instructed what to do; the native congregations were assembled in the government schools; the meetings were always opened and closed with prayer, and were productive of considerable benefit to those who attended them. Thus, under the immediate superintendence of the missionaries, from twelve to fifteen villages were regularly supplied with public religious instruction every Sabbath. While, however, we admire the spirit that prompted these proceedings, we must not omit to record the personal inconvenience which they suffered from them, as a warning to others. Mr. Harvard confesses that "zeal, undisciplined by prudence, impelled us to exertions, in these itinerating labors, which were too violent to be lasting. In company with my interpreter, I have frequently traveled twelve or fifteen miles in one day, addressing three congregations, and returning in the evening to preach in English, in the Pettah. Mr. Clough was no less regardless of himself. The leading of the singing also devolved on us, which was even more laborious than preaching. The abundance of the harvest and the paucity of laborers, is the only apology to be made for efforts which cannot be wholly justified; and which at length inflicted injuries upon my constitution from which probably it will never wholly recover."

An English service, for natives understanding the English language, was also opened at this time in Colombo; and their place of worship having become too small, a larger building was commenced. A Sabbath-school of over 200 children was also organized. The printing-press was put in operation, under the direction of Mr. Harvard, and soon spelling-books, hymn-books, and religious books, or tracts of different kinds were printed in the Singalese, Tamil, and Portuguese languages. The mission house being situated on the main road from the country to the fort, the missionaries had frequent opportunities to converse with the natives, on their way to and from the town. The results of these interviews were often encouraging; and in one instance were productive of the happiest effects. A Buddhist priest, known by the title of the AVA PRIEST, was introduced to them by a note from the Rev. G. Bisset. This man possessed much acuteness of intellect enriched by scientific and literary research; he was highly respected by his disciples, and had attained the honorable distinction of MAHA MALAKA. He avowed himself an atheist in principle; but after much discussion his unbelief and prejudice were overcome, and he became a sincere inquirer after truth. In proof of his sincerity, he consented to Mr. Harvard's preaching in the temple of which he was the chief-priest. His pride was renounced, and he became a docile scholar, receiving with meekness instruction in the first principles of the doctrine of Christ, with a view to his baptism, which he earnestly desired. After some time, Mr. Harvard preached in his temple, through an interpreter, in front of the great image, to a large congregation of priests and people, from 1 Cor. 8 : 4 : "We know that an idol is nothing in the world, and there is none other God but one." On their return to Colombo the Ava Priest publicly renounced his former notions and was baptized in the fort church, by the name of GEORGE NADORIS DE SILVA.

In their visits to the native Christians in the villages, the missionaries were occasionally met or accompanied by Sir. A. Johnston, Mr. Twistleton, and even the Governor with his lady and suite, who attended divine service, with the Singalese Christians, in churches of the humblest structure. This countenance of the highest official authorities in the island tended to obviate difficulties which they would otherwise have found it hard to remove. There was one prejudice, however, which they could not immediately overcome. The native Christians had a strong objection to their women appearing in a place of worship, except at the administration of baptism, and the celebration of marriage. This was so prejudicial to the domestic character of the people that the missionaries resolved to persevere until they should see the mothers and daughters of the Christians taking their proper place in the church ; in which, after much effort, they were successful.

The converted Ava Priest, George Nadoris, manifested a strong desire for the conversion of his idolatrous countrymen. It appeared that half the priests and temples in the island had been under his control. He accompanied the missionaries in their preaching excursions round the country, when he addressed large companies of people, from 800 to 1,000 at a time, in the most lively and eloquent manner ; and his character as a priest was so well known before his conversion, that wherever he went the people recognized him, and the effects produced by his public discourses were remarkable. The priests came from almost every part of the country, even from the interior, to contend with him. Great numbers of the superior order of priests avowed themselves convinced of the truth of Christianity ; but they were not willing, like George Nadoris, to deny themselves and take up the cross. There was, however, one exception. Nadoris had a friend among them, who possessed considerable property, good natural abilities, and an extensive acquaintance with foreign languages. His disposition was meek, and his manners prepossessing. When introduced to the missionaries by his friend and instructor, he professed to be dissatisfied with the pagan superstitions ; offered himself for baptism, and begged to be instructed in the principles of Christianity. The knowledge which the brethren had by this time acquired of the deceptive character of the natives, made them cautious in the admission of candidates. In the present instance their examination of the man's motives was more than usually severe ; but they could detect no sinister design. His replies to their questions were given with the greatest apparent sincerity ; and, after putting him off for a considerable time, they felt so well satisfied with him, that they could no longer resist his importunity to be received into the Christian church. He was baptized by the name of Benjamin Parks. "It was most gratifying," observed Sir Alexander Johnston on the occasion, "to see the very men who had been devoted to a heathen priesthood, surmounting every prejudice of education and profession, and convinced of the delusion of that idolatry which they had been taught to preach." He also further remarked "that it was one of many proofs of the good effect produced among the natives by the circulation of the Scriptures."

In the month of June, 1815, Rev. John McKenny arrived from the Cape of Good Hope, and was followed, early in 1816, by four more, Messrs. Callaway, Carver, Broadbent, and Jackson, as a reinforcement ; and a young man, named Salmon, was appointed as an assistant missionary. He was the first preacher they had obtained from among the inhabitants of the island. His acquaintance with several languages rendered him a valuable acquisition as an interpreter, and he was received on trial, and appointed to the Matura station, with Mr. Callaway, to whom he proved a useful colleague. Not long after, a second young man, named John Anthoniez, also born in the country, was employed as a local preacher at Galle.

The building commenced at Colombo was finished and opened for public worship on Sunday, December 23d, 1816. An appropriate discourse was preached by Mr. Clough from Ps. 122 : 6. It was provided with an organ, purchased at Galle. In the evening a second service was held, which was crowded, the Governor and his lady, and most of the civilians and military officers of the station being present, together with a number of respectable natives.

It was now agreed to have service in English every Sabbath at 7 A. M., and at the same hour in the evening ; also a Singalese service at half-past ten in the forenoon. The missionaries now began to hold annual conferences for the regulation of the concerns of the mission. It is said of them in the Society's Report, "By preaching, catechizing, conducting native schools, and printing the Scriptures and useful books, they are laying the foundation of a work, which, if zealously supported, promises, under the blessing of God, to re-erect the temples of Christ now in ruins, through the neglect of Christians ; to arrest the devastating progress of Paganism and Mohammedanism, now almost triumphant over the feeble remains of Christianity ; to reassert the honor and victories of the cross ; and convey the knowledge of God and salvation through an island, the essential principle of whose religion is, to deny God, and whose almost universal practice is, to worship devils."

The concerns of the mission were daily gathering strength, and the missionaries, hoping to occupy Caltura the ensuing year, asked for four additional missionaries, to enable them to occupy all the coast to Galle ; and two more to go northward. In pursuance of this arrangement, they established themselves among the Tamil population of Jaffna, Trincomalee, and Batticaloa ; and so early as 1819, they had opened schools in the principal villages along the western coast, from Negombo to Galle. For twenty years the Wesleyan missionaries carried on the work of general education in the maritime provinces, which was afterwards taken up by the Government in 1834. They did not aspire to the communication of the higher branches of learning, which had already been provided for in the seminary of Colombo—an institution maintained by the Government for the education of the sons of the chiefs and higher order of the natives ; but in the principal villages, to which they extended their operations, the children of the peasantry were instructed by the Wesleyans in the principles of Christianity, and the essentials of general elementary knowledge.

The usual objection was at first urged to females learning to read ; but this was soon overcome ; and at a very early period the attention of the missionaries was directed strongly to an object which has since been kept steadily in view : the education of the Singalese, through the medium of their own vernacular tongue. Until taken up by the Wesleyans, this important department had been exclusively in the hands of the priesthood, who occupied themselves in every pawsela and temple, in teaching to write upon olas, and read from the legendary books of the Budhists. In their hands education was of the lowest description, and the priests themselves were but a stage in advance of their pupils. Science formed no feature in their own education ; history is confined to the events connected with religion and its movements ; medicine is culled from the imperfect notices of their ancient Sanskrit authorities ; and astronomy, degraded into the mere dreams of astrology, is affected to be studied by the priests, who, by a singular anomaly, share its cultivation with the tom-tom beaters, or berrawagos, one of the lowest and least respected castes in Ceylon.

Vernacular education was begun by the Wesleyans in 1817, in the hope of superceding the Budhist priesthood in this department ; and so successful was the effort, that before the close of the year, upwards of 1000 scholars were in attendance ; twelve months after the number increased to 4000 ; and during thirty years that the system has been in operation, upwards of 21,000 pupils, females as well as males, have from time to time been instructed in the numerous schools of the mission. No religious test is required for admission, and no compulsion is exerted to enforce participation in the Christian services of the schools. The objections of parents are at once respected, if advanced ; but the instances have been rare in which any scruples have ever been urged, either by the priesthood or by the people, to any portion of the system.

But laborious and extended as have been these efforts of the Wesleyans, the tenor of their observation and experience has produced a conviction that however efficient education may have proved among the Budhists as a pioneer and precursor for the introduction of Christianity, its value is but secondary as compared with preaching to adults, and awaking the native mind through the instrumentality of the pulpit and printing-press. "Under this conviction," says Sir E. Tennant, "the Methodists have been the closest investigators of Budhism, the most profound students of its sacred books in the original, and the most accomplished scholars both in the classical and vernacular languages of Ceylon." The information thus acquired has been sedulously employed by them in the preparation of works in Singalese, demonstrative of the errors of Budhism, and illustrative of the evidences and institutions of Christianity. To the value of these publications and the influence exercised by their promulgation throughout Ceylon, the missionaries of other churches who labor in the same field with the Methodists, have borne their cordial and concurrent attestation.

Of the converts made from paganism to Christianity, by the instrumentality of our missionaries in Ceylon, we have the following testimony from Mr. Harvard, in answer to the inquiry of the committee : "As it respects the nature of the change which our converts have undergone, I have no hesitation in saying, that in every case it has been real, according to its degree. There has been a real conviction of the falsehood of their previous faith, and a real persuasion of the truth and excellence of the Gospel. I have had every opportunity of being satisfied on this point. As in each case of conversion from heathenism the change has been real, so it has been operative. In none of them have there been any lingerings after their former idolatry. They have renounced their former practices ; and, so far as my knowledge has gone, their conduct has been a constant conformity to Christian practice. To a very gratifying extent the change in our converts has been experimental. It is scarcely to be expected that a man coming out of the darkness of heathenism, under the ordinary influence of the Spirit, should very rapidly apprehend the things of God. However, in all we have been satisfied of a conviction of sin, and an earnest desire to be saved. In some cases we have had professions of religious enjoyment that we dare not call in question, and which have been justified by a corresponding faithfulness and consistency of life." "I have heard," says Mr. Fox, writing in 1823, "in this country, both in the Singalese and Portuguese languages, as artless and satisfactory sentiments of Christian experience as I ever heard in the English language; and I have seen the colored face beaming with smiles, while the last audible sound, 'Yesus, Wahansey,' Jesus, my Saviour, passed the dying lips."

In the years 1826 and 1827, several other priests of the highest class were converted to the Christian faith, and have become active agents in the mission. An institution for the instruction of young native converts, with a view to the Christian ministry, has been in successful operation since 1826.

Kandy, the capital of the interior of the island, was occupied as a mission station in 1840. This mission, besides its immediate benefit to the people, led to an investigation of the subject of government support of idolatry. This exposure roused the astonishment and indignation of the Christian world, which was followed by the issuing of those instructions which led to the disavowance of the guilty and mischievous connexion between the government and the idolatrous and superstitious practices of their Buddhist, Hindoo, and Mohammedan subjects.

In 1842 a mission was established among that wild and barbarous people, called the Veddahs, who, in a state of savage independence, inhabit the jungle in the interior of the island, a few days' journey from Batticaloa. God has crowned the enterprize with his blessing, and granted his servants great success. Under the direction of the learned and devoted missionaries with which God has favored the Ceylon mission, the press, in the different languages spoken there, has done a noble work. It has not only presented them with the Holy Scriptures, in a language which they can read, but has also furnished them with school-books, and works on history, biography, science, and theology, besides a periodical literature. The Ceylon native ministry are a class of very able, devoted, and zealous men, continually growing in number and efficiency.

The manner in which the missionaries have to meet and combat the Buddhism and devil-worship in Ceylon, is well exhibited in the following communication from the Rev. Joseph Rippon, of Point de Galle, addressed to the secretaries of the society in 1851: "On my arrival here, I found Mr. Dickson doing the full work of this large and important circuit, and laboring among the people with great acceptability and success, preaching in three different languages weekly, and taking long, fatiguing journeys, but so worn down by disease and incessant labors, that it was painful to see him or hear him speak. I was thankful that I came out by the quickest route, or otherwise the life of a valuable missionary must have been sacrificed, and this important station left unoccupied. He much needed the rest which he is now taking on the continent, and I sincerely pray that it may be blessed to his complete restoration to health, though there is too much reason to fear that his disease is too far advanced to be arrested. I relieved him at once of the English work, and, in a month, had so far acquired the Ceylon-Portuguese, as to be able to preach in it. I found it a miserably corrupt, and, in a literary point of view, worthless dialect, but still valuable to a missionary, as the only means by which he can communicate the Gospel to many thousands of perishing souls. My Singalese work is assuming an intensely interesting character. Though I am diligently studying the language, I am afraid it will be a month or two before I can reach the people through this medium as effectually as I wish; and I am, therefore, for the present, using an interpreter. The head master of the government mixed school kindly offered his service gratuitously, and, as he possessed peculiar qualifications for the work, we spend many evenings in the surrounding villages, preaching to a deeply interesting, but fearfully deluded people, the unsearchable riches of Christ. The difficulties in the way of their conversion are stupendous. My circuit embraces about half of the southern provinces,—the whole island being divided into five provinces for government purposes,—and extends along a densely populated sea-coast for thirty-five miles, and as far into the jungle as the imagination can reach, for, unfortunately, this is the only means I have at present of penetrating there. The people are in theory all Buddhists; but in practice, all devil-worshippers.

"Within four miles of my house there are sixteen Buddhist temples. In one of these alone there are thirty priests! The whole number of priests in this circuit is perhaps 500. It is not by human might, nor by power, that we can prevail against such a host as this! Frequently, in the dead of the night, I hear the music from the devil dances in the neighborhood. I have attended these midnight orgies, and it is only by doing so that any person can form an idea of the strength with which this superstition binds down an otherwise acute, ingenious and intelligent people. Never did a Christian congregation in England listen with more unbroken silence, nor an audience in Exeter Hall hang with more complete absorption of soul on the lips of its most chosen speakers, than these people do on the frantic gestures, and hideous yellings, and senseless incantations of the devil priest. To their conceptions, he is penetrating the invisible world, and communing with spirits. His ascendancy over their minds is complete. He is the great intercessor between devils and men, for the removal of all evil, and bestowment of all good. Without the priest, nothing can be done. If a house is to be built, if a journey is to be taken, if a child is to be born, devils must be propitiated, and their favor secured; but, especially, in cases of sickness where all ordinary methods of cure have failed, devil dances and incantations are the last resort, the poor deluded wretches often dying in the midst of the ceremonies, although the priest has perhaps offered a fowl in sacrifice, dug open graves and slept in them, and fried eggs in human skulls, in order to obtain the necessary influence to perform the cure! An evil so wide-spread and so deep-rooted will not be easily destroyed; and a conviction of its magnitude, and of the necessity of resorting to some extraordinary means for its extinction, has grown upon me daily.

"The whole system received a severe shock last autumn at Matura, its great stronghold. The priests there are considered the cleverest in the island; and Mr. Murdock, the Secretary of the Singalese Tract Society, being at that place on business, challenged the priests publicly, and offered them a large reward if they would cause any of their incantations to take effect upon him, by causing him to fall down dead; for these priests profess to be the dispensers of death to the living, as well as of life to the dying. They used all the methods of preparation I have already mentioned, sleeping in graves for many nights, and met Mr. Murdock, in the presence of many hundreds of Singalese, who had gathered together to witness the experiment on the day appointed. Their first effort was to evade the challenge. They excused themselves on the ground that they should be tried for murder if they killed him. Application was therefore made to the government authorities, and an undesired permission obtained for them to do their worst. Their next attempt was to intimidate. Their incantations never failed; his death was certain if he tried them; and he had better spare himself at once and run no risk. When they failed, they were driven lastly to the test, and a miserable failure it was. They stood reading their incantations, burning resin, and blowing its fumes upon him, for more than an hour, 'and the people looked when he should have swollen or fallen down dead suddenly, but after they had looked a great while, and saw no harm come to him, they changed their minds, if not with reference to him, at least with reference to the power of these charms. A derisive cry was raised throughout the crowd, and the devil priests have since been hooted through the streets of Matura. I have tried the same plan with great success in the neighborhood of Galle; and, even to-night, I have just returned from a village where I had been undergoing a test, in some respects similar. I challenged the priests some weeks ago, when they refused to meet me, assigning various reasons why they could 'do me no hurt,' as, that I was of a different nation, &c. I have spent several evenings in replying to their excuses publicly, to the people of the village; and, being driven to extremity, they resolved to make a grand effort to-night to put me down, as they term it, which means, to make me fall senseless to the ground, and to cause blood to gush from my nose, ears, and mouth. The spirit which can conceive such a thing is diabolical; but the cool determination that can resolve to accomplish it, shows to what a degree these men can imbibe the evil spirit of their master.

"They brought priests twenty-seven miles from Matura to help them, and spent many days in preparation by digging open graves, &c. They have also had two devil dances in the village to-day, but whether to gain power for the experiment or not, I cannot say. The news reached Galle; and six coaches full of people, with about thirty on foot, flocked to the village, where a number of Singalese people were gathered to receive me. I preached to them for nearly an hour, while two different parties of priests, who did not dare to face me, were reading their incantations against me in the immediate neighborhood, and the people were watching with intense interest, not knowing what moment I should fall to the ground. When all was over, and they saw I was uninjured, their astonished looks showed that to their minds at least I had passed through a perilous ordeal, however ridiculous it was to me. My chief difficulty is to convince the spectators that they are as safe from these influences as I am. To make this point quite sure, I have promised to take a little Singalese boy, next Tuesday night, and have offered a reward of ten rupees to any priest who will cause incantation to take effect upon him, on condition that the child shall not know what they are attempting, and that no effort shall be made to frighten him. Failures such as that of to-night, go like an electric shock through the whole population, and the effect will be seen after many days. I find this the most effectual method of arousing the people and gaining their attention, and can ever after raise a good congregation in the villages where the experiments have been tried. I have one last blow to strike at this system, by a challenge to all the priests in the province, to meet me publicly before the face of the people; and then, with this kind of opposition to them I shall have done.

"Our prospects with reference to the over flow of Buddhism were never so cheering as they are at present. Our excellent chairman, the Rev. Daniel J. Gogerly, has published a series of pamphlets, entitled The Institutes of Christianity, in which the errors of Buddhism, geographical, philosophical, and theological, are pointed out with unanswerable force. The system reels under the blow. There is perhaps not a more profound Buddhist scholar in the island than he, not even among the priests themselves. The priests are reading them and comparing the extracts with the works of Budha; and if a priest be asked, why none of them attempt an answer, his reply generally is, 'Who is able?' and his rueful countenance is a sufficient attestation of his sincerity. I am making arrangements to furnish every priest in my circuit with a complete set.

"One of the mightiest agencies which is now at work for the evangelization of South Ceylon, is a Singalese Religious Tract Society. It is entirely unsectarian in its character, and is supported by Christians of all denominations. Its income is above £500 a year, with an annual grant of 150 reams of paper from the London Tract Society. It has already printed and put into active circulation 397,600 Singalese tracts; 140,600 of which were printed during the last year. It has also a widely circulated monthly periodical, and has issued a Singalese hymn book, and a history of the patriarchs. It is conducted with great energy and efficiency by its secretary, Mr. Murdock, who was mainly instrumental in its establishment, and who relinquished a highly lucrative government situation that he might give his undivided attention to these and kindred objects.

"On the whole, therefore, our prospects are hopeful; our movements against Buddhism and devil worship are on a comprehensive scale, and we have manifest tokens of the presence and blessing of God upon our labors. Impressions are widely scattered; the Gospel seed is sown in many hearts to grow in secret for a time; convictions are produced, and souls are saved.

"The most available portion of the circuit for missionary effort is within a circle of four miles around my dwelling; but even this contains one hundred and seventy villages, and there are jungle districts where I fear the foot of a missionary must not tread for years to come. The extent of population may be estimated from the fact that though my residence is a mile from the fort and town of Galle, on the Matura high road, 600 persons pass it every hour throughout the day."

The mission in South Ceylon is the oldest Wesleyan mission among a heathen population in the eastern world; it is now in its forty-first year, having been commenced in the year 1814. In this quarter of the world, the missionaries have had to encounter the most formidable systems of pagan idolatry; systems consecrated by immemorial antiquity, wrapped in all the subtleties of metaphysical sophistry; embodied in books of poetry and philosophy, venerable in the eyes of the people for talent and age; inculcated by a numerous and learned priesthood, and intimately associated with every circumstance of civil and domestic life; systems too, which avowedly encourage the vilest passions of the human heart, promote an utter dereliction of sacred principle, and reduce the glorious privilege of immortality to an imaginary state of unimpassioned repose, in which no joy shall gladden, and no pain afflict, no activity arouse, and no desire ruffle; but in which the human mind of "large discourse," and lofty presage, shall sink into eternal quiescence and annihilation. Yet truth is prevailing over these forms of error. Several of the "priests have become obedient to the faith," and many thousands of the people have joyfully renounced the boasted advantages of their former worship for "The unsearchable riches of Christ." It is possible that the Society's mission in South Ceylon is undervalued. The mission has, however, an interest of its own, both present and prospective. Buddhism is the most gigantic form of error with which the Christian church has to contend. But the southern district of Ceylon is at once its cradle and its strength. Strike it here, and the wound will be felt to its very centre. Buddhism is a connected system; its doings in other lands are reported here, and occurrences in this land are told in the courts of kings in Siam and Burmah, and travel wherever its connecting machinery is found. The progress and triumph of Christianity here would tell in every part of the system, and be a prelude to its entire downfall. Prospectively also this mission has a peculiar interest; it is the first fruits of all the future missions of the society in Buddhist lands. The Buddhism of China is only a reflection of that of Ceylon, which was its source. Even locally it is situated in the direct route to the other strongholds of this form of error. And therefore the destinies of the future only confirm the demand which the duties of the present enforce that existing missions to the Buddhists should be well sustained in all the means that are necessary to secure their greatest present and permanent efficiency.

In his late visitation journal, the Bishop of Colombo gives an account of the great success which the head of the church has conferred upon the labors of the Wesleyan missionaries in Ceylon; we had intended to present a portion of that report to the reader, but the space allotted to this article is already exhausted, and we can only in conclusion direct attention for more particular information to the annexed table.—Wesleyan Missionary Notices, Annual Reports and Methodist Magazine; Hough's Christianity in India; Sir. J. E. Tennent's Christianity in Ceylon.—REV. W. BUTLER.

SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS.—This society has three stations in Ceylon. The first was established at Newera Ella, in 1838, and has now one missionary. The second was commenced in 1840, at Matura, and has now one missionary, 113 church members, 9 schools, 381 scholars, of which 71 are females. That at Calpentyn was commenced in 1842, and has one missionary, with a native missionary at Putlam.

The labors of the London Missionary Society in Ceylon do not appear in a statistical form, for the reason that they were discontinued many years since. The missions of the English Baptists, the Wesleyan Methodists, the American Board, and the Church of England, though occupying the same field, and often in close proximity with each other, have been conducted with the utmost harmony, and without the intrusion at any time of denominational strife or jealousy. Upon this fact the British colonial officers have often remarked with great particularity and pleasure. Frequent mention is made in missionary reports, and by intelligent travelers who have visited the various missions of the island, of the Roman Catholics, who have been somewhat numerous there ever since the possession of the island by the Portuguese, and of their hostility to the Protestants and their labors. In the very last report of one of the Church of England stations, the missionary says, "The Romanists are exerting themselves, and making every effort to injure us, and having lately obtained a grant from government for education; they are seeking to destroy or injure our schools, and threaten any Romanist parent who dares to send his children to a Protestant school. Festivals, processions, and theatrical representations, are the means by which they decoy the unwary and the ignorant." But though the Catholics have been among the bitterest enemies of Protestant missions in Ceylon, it does not appear that the missionaries have ever entered into much controversy with them, or been hindered by them from the steady and successful prosecution of their work.

Below is given a comprehensive view of all the missions in Ceylon, as at present existing:

TABULAR VIEW.

when Papal emissaries secured the defection of Mar Elias of Elkosh, one of the two patriarchs of the Nestorians, the other being Mar Shimon, whose seat was at Kochaness, near Julamerk, in Kurdistan. This defection is said to have been brought about by the Papists refusing to surrender a firm an essential to his accession to the patriarchate till he consented to acknowledge allegiance to Rome. Even then an attempt was made to set aside his claim in favor of that of Mar Youssef, but the measure excited so decided an opposition, that Rome was induced to resort to a more conciliatory course. This and similar manoeuvres at the death of that Patriarch, when a Chaldean from Khosrova was appointed in his room, instead of the regular successor, and the name changed from Mar Elias to Mar Nicolas, have interfered with the thorough subjection of this sect to Rome. But ever true to the one end of subduing all things to herself, she perseveres in fastening more firmly her iron yoke as its members become more subservient to her sway.

The Chaldean clergy consists of (1) the Karooya, or reader; (2) the Hoopodiakono, or sub-deacon; (3) the Shemmosha, or deacon; (4) the Kasha, Kashiha, or priest; (5) the Khorepiskopa, Archidiakono, or Deputy Bishop (Archdeacon); (6) the Episkopa, or Bishop; (7) the Mootran, or Metropolitan Bishop; and (8) the Katoleeka, Patriarcha, or Patriarch. All of these, except the two last, may marry before ordination, but not after.

Their books are written in ancient Syriac, and are the same with those of the Nestorians, save as they are gradually altered in conformity to the creed of Rome. At first only the name of Cyril was substituted for Nestorius, &c.; but greater innovations are made as the people are able to bear them.

Besides the vicinity of Mosul, Chaldeans are found at Diarbekir, Bert, Khosrova in Persia, Arbels and Bagdad.

This sect is accessible through the missions of the A. B. C. F. M. at Oroomiah and Diarbekir, but principally through the station at Mosul, where some of the members of the Protestant church are converted Chaldeans. Recently, through Papal intrigues with the Pasha, the large Chaldean village of Telkoif has been closed to missionary efforts, and even Protestants who own property there have been forbidden to visit it. But such a state of things cannot last, and we may hope soon to hear that such measures have redounded, as they always do, to the furtherance of the truth.—

CHALDEANS.—This name is applied by some to the Nestorians, but belongs more properly to that portion of them who have fallen off to the Pope. As long ago as 1681 a Patriarch was ordained over such Nestorians as had seceded to Rome, under the title of Mar Youssef, Patriarch of the Chaldeans. His seat was at Diarbekir till about the year 1780, CHINA: On account of its great antiquity, its extent of territory, its vast population, its physical, social, and moral condition, its political and commercial importance, China presents a high claim upon the attention of the scholar, the philanthropist, and especially the Christian. And this claim is greatly augmented at the present time, by the wonderful movement among its native population, for the reformation of its political, social, and religious institutions. Little was known of this great empire, in the Western world, till it was visited by the Venetian traveler, Marco Paulo; nor were his discoveries generally known in his day. The researches of the Catholic missionaries in Peking, early in the 16th century, together with the efforts of the Western powers to secure a profitable trade with China, contributed to extend our knowledge of the country; and these have subsequently been followed up by Christian missions and commerce; and yet, with all these aids, the interior of this vast kingdom is but very imperfectly known.

Territorial Extent.—The Chinese Empire is bounded on the south-east by the Pacific Ocean, and on the south-west by Cochinchina, Laos, and Burmah. By the Himalaya mountains on the side of Thibet, it is separated from Assam, Bootan, and India. Its western border, including Thibet, Ladak and Ili, extending north to the Russian territories, is bounded by the provinces of Lahore, Cashmere, Badakshan, Kokand and the Kirghis steppe. Russia is conterminous with China from the Kirghis steppe on the west, to the sea of Okhotsk on the east. 3,300 miles, the Altai and Daourian mountains forming a natural boundary between these two great empires. The whole Chinese Empire is 12,550 miles in circumference, (about half that of the globe,) comprising, according to McCulloch, 5,300,000 square miles, and covering about one-third of the continent of Asia and about one-ninth of the land area of the globe. Russia is nearly 6000 miles in its greatest length, its average breadth, about 1,500 miles, and measures 7,725,000 sq. miles, being nearly one-seventh of the land on the globe. The area of the British Empire, at the lowest calculation is 6,508,000 square miles. Brazil comprises an area of 3,390,000 square miles, and the United States and territories measure 3,235,148 square miles, situated, as to soil and climate, within the most eligible portion of the earth, while a large part of the British, Russian, and Chinese empires, can never be otherwise than very thinly settled.

Political Divisions.—The Chinese divide their empire into three principal parts, according to the form of government adopted in each:—(1) The Eighteen Provinces; (2) Manchuria lying north of the gulf of Leautung, and east of the Inner Daourian mountain to the Pacific; (3) Colonial Possessions, including Mongolia, Ili, Kokonor and Thibet.

The first only of these is, by other nations, called China. It lies on the eastern slope of the high table-land of Central Asia, in the south-eastern angle of the continent. In its scenery, soil, climate, navigable rivers and various and abundant productions, it will compare with the most favored portions of the habitable globe. The Chinese call it "The Eighteen Provinces," "The Middle Kingdom," and other pompous names. They regard it as including within its area, the major part of the earth, and as occupying a central position among the nations.

Comparative Dimensions of China Proper.—The dimensions of the Eighteen Provinces, as defined by the Chinese, cannot be much below 2,000,000 square miles, including the provinces of Cansuh and Chihli, a little exceeding two-fifths of the whole empire. But estimating China Proper, according to the old limits, McCulloch makes its area 1,348,870 sq. miles. Its length from north to south, is 1474 miles, and its breadth 1355 miles. The coast line from Hainan to Leautung is above 2,500 miles, its inland frontier is 4,400 miles, making it seven times larger than France, fifteen times larger than the United Kingdom, and nearly half as large as all Europe, which contains 3,650,000 square miles. The area of China Proper is nearly equal to that of the thirty-one United States of America, which is about 1,558,424 square miles. In the relative position of the United States and China, there is considerable resemblance, which involves much similarity of climate. They are both, on their eastern shores, washed by great oceans. But in the same latitude, China is considerably colder than this country.

Mountains.—The principal mountains of the Chinese empire, are the outer Hingan, Daourian, and Altai, separating it from Russia in Asia on the north. These mountains seldom rise more than 7,000 feet above the sea. On its western border are the Ak-tak, Belar-tag, and Karakara mountains. On the southern border are the lofty Himalaya, running south-easterly to about 95° east long., a distance of more than 1,000 miles. In the interior of its vast colonial dominions, are the Celestial Mountains, separating Eastern Turkistan from Soungaria; and, running nearly parallel with them to the south, are the Kwanlun mountains running easterly between Ili on the north, and Thibet on the south. These ranges, with partial interruptions, extend to the western borders of China Proper, and between them lies the Great Desert of Gobi, and much of the high table land of Central Asia. Besides these are the Taugnu mountains on the north-west, the Bayankara in Kokonor, the Inner Hingan, running south, near the western border of Manchuria; and there is still another long range commencing near the mouth of the Sagalien river, on the north, and running nearly parallel with the sea-coast to the northern point of Corea. The south-western and southern provinces are a mountainous region, though to a large extent capable of cultivation, and very productive. In the mountains, and lofty table lands of Central Asia, the great rivers of China originate. Nearly four-fifths of the empire are mountainous, aside from the Desert of Gobi, but generally well rewarding the husbandman for his toil. The character of the Chinese inhabiting those mountainous regions differs widely from that of those residing in the Great Plain, the former being rough in their manners, and bold, hardy, and independent, in their bearing.

Great Desert of Gobi.—Next to the Great Desert of Sahara, in Africa, the Desert of Gobi is the most remarkable. It lies between the Celestial Mountains on the north and the Kwanlun range on the north-west, reaching from the Belar-tag mountains on the west, to the Inner Hingan or Sialkoi, on the east, a distance of 2,200 miles, with an average breadth of between 350 and 400 miles, and a superficial area of about 1,200,000 square miles. Though this tract is not all entirely desert, none of it is very fertile. Its great altitude is supposed to be the principal cause of its sterility. Along the southern side of the Celestial Mountains, is a strip of arable land of from 50 to 80 miles in width, in which lie nearly all the Mohammedan cities and forts of the southern circuit, as Kashgar, Oksu, Hami, and others. The Tarim or Yarkand river flows eastward through this fertile tract, and empties its waters into the Lop-nor lake. About east long. 96°, at the Kiayu pass, the desert is only 50 miles wide. West of this point lies what is called the Desert of Lop-nor, and east of the same is what is properly termed the Desert of Gobi. The former desert is about 1200 miles in length, and 4500 feet above the level of the sea, while the latter seldom reaches the elevation of 4000 feet. The province of Kansah reaches across this desert tract to the base of the Celestial Mountains. Between the Altai and the Inshan mountains, the desert is from 500 to 700 miles in width. Within this tract lies the depressed valley, called the Shah-moh, i. e. sandy floats, varying in width from 150 to 200 miles, the lowest depression being from 2,600 to 3,000 feet above the level of the ocean. This valley is almost entirely covered with sand, sometimes rising into low hills, but generally level, with a scanty and stunted vegetation; and the water, in its numerous small streams and lakes, is brackish and unwholesome. This desert is an almost complete waste, but north of Kokonor, it assumes its most terrific appearance, being rendered intolerably hot, by the reflection of the sun's rays from the dazzling stones and the mountains of sand, with which it is covered, and which are said to move like the waves of the sea. North and south of the Shah-moh, there is a gravelly and sometimes rocky surface, which, in many places, affords good pasturage for the herds of the Kalkas tribes. From the south of the Inner Hingan range, the desert lands reach nearly to the Chang-pehshan, north of Leantung. Thus, almost from the extreme western limits of the Chinese empire to its eastern coast there is nearly a continuous desert, variable in width, and elevated several thousand feet above the sea.

Rivers and Lakes.—China is peculiarly favored as to the means of internal navigation. The four principal rivers are the Yellow river, the Yangtszkiang, the Sagalien or Amour, and the Tarim or Yarkand. The Yamchangbu, in the southern borders of Thibet, supposed to be the same with the Brahmaputra, which empties into the Bay of Bengal, is also a noble stream flowing east within the southern border of Thibet, upwards of 1000 miles. Of these the Yellow river is the most renowned in Chinese history; but by reason of its rapidity incomparably less useful than the Yangtszkiang. Besides the rivers of China Proper, which rise in the mountains and highlands of Thibet and Kokonor, there are numerous streams in the colonial possessions of the empire, which are either lost in the Great Desert or empty themselves into lakes, or find their way to the north sea, into regions south of the Himalaya, or west of the Karakorum mountains. Though the lakes are numerous and useful as the sources of rivers, the channels of navigation, and the means of subsistence to millions of the people, yet none of them can compare with the great lakes of North America. The lakes lying both north and south of the Desert of Gobi, are in general salt, owing, perhaps, to their great evaporation.

Boundaries and Civil Divisions of China Proper.—China Proper is bounded on the east and south-east by the Pacific Ocean; on the south by the Pacific, Cochin-china, and the uncivilized tribes between it and Burmah; west by Burmah, Thibet and Kokonor; north-west and north by the province of Kansuh and Inner Mongolia, from which it is separated by the great wall. The great wall is strictly the northern boundary of China Proper, though a part of Chihli lies north of it. The eighteen provinces into which it is divided, are arranged by the Chinese into the northern and eastern, southern and western provinces, according to their relative location.

The coast of China is dotted by many small islands, which, together with the main land, afford numerous and safe retreats to vessels during the terrible storms that at times sweep their shores. They are inhabited by a numerous and hardy race of men, who subsist by fishing and occasional piracy. Between Hong-Kong and Ningpo the coast is high, and barren, giving little promise of the rich and fruitful regions in their rear.

Climate.—The climate of China Proper, compared with most other countries in the same latitude, is healthy. China has not been subject to those wide-spread and destructive pestilences which have so often swept over Hindostan, and other portions of the eastern world. It is seldom visited with extreme drought. Its average temperature is estimated lower than that of any other country in the same latitude. The climate on the coasts, like that of our Atlantic States, is changeable, and rheumatic and pulmonary complaints are common. On the Great Plain, which reaches from the Chinese wall to the Yangtszkiang, a distance of 700 miles, and comprises an area of about 210,000 square miles, the climate varies according to its latitude and elevation. The northern part is more elevated and salubrious; the southern and eastern sections, bordering on the rivers and the sea-coast, are low and marshy, and agues, fevers and kindred complaints prevail; yet, considering its enormous population of 177 millions, it must be, to the natives, in the main, a healthy country. But, to foreigners, it has proved very unhealthy.

The maximum heat of Shanghai, in lat. $31^{\circ} 24'$ N., according to Dr. Lockhart, is 100° Fah. and the minimum 24° . The ice is not thick, and the snow continues only a short time. In a single day the thermometer sometimes varies 20° , and the spring winds, both here and even downwards to Canton, are chilly. The climate of Ningpo is considered more pleasant and salubrious than Shanghai. In the course of the year the thermometer at this place is reported to range between 24° and 107° , and changes of 20° in two hours sometimes occur. In Shanghai, Ningpo, Fuh-chau, Amoy, and to some extent in Canton, fires are necessary to foreigners in the winter and spring; but the Chinese dispense with them in their dwellings, and in some measure supply the deficiency by clothing themselves in skins, and by wearing, at the same time, several suits of apparel, which give them a grotesque appearance. They often carry about with them small stoves, filled with charcoal. Fuh-chau, in about 46° N. lat., is among the healthiest of the five ports. Amoy has a delightful climate, its insular position moderating the heat of summer, and giving it the full advantage of the sea breeze. The thermometer ranges between 40° and 96° , and compared with Ningpo, the changes are not rapid. The heaviest rains on the Chinese coast are usually in the spring and early part of summer; and in August terrible typhoons sometimes occur, producing great destruction of life and property, among both native and foreign shipping. The latter half of the fall and the entire winter, are the most pleasant and healthy portions of the year, the air being clear and bracing, with little rain. Four or five months in the year warm apparel is necessary. Canton, situated about 22° N., compared with most other places in the tropics, has a fine climate. The thermometer ranges between 50° and 88° ; consequently the heat, though of longer continuance, is there less severe than at the more northern ports. The inequalities of climate in the eighteen provinces of China are probably no greater than in the United States. A good proportion of the Chinese, compared with other nations, attain to old age.

Soil.—China Proper is among the most favored of the nations, as to the fertility of its soil. The most fertile portion of her territory is the Great Plain, of which the fact of its containing such an immense population, is conclusive proof. It is the most densely populated territory of its size on the globe. The other portions of China are to a great extent either hilly or mountainous, though on the banks of the rivers there are large tracts of rich soil, and the high lands are capable of supporting a numerous and hardy population.

Persons of the Chinese.—The Chinese, in general, are in stature considerably below the average height of Europeans, but well-built; and compared with other Asiatics, strong, hardy, and athletic. They have coarse black hair and small black eyes, the inner angle of the eye inclining downwards, and the eyelids seeming but partially opened, which detracts from the animation and expressiveness of the countenance. They have high cheek bones, short and somewhat flattened noses; foreheads of moderate elevation; features oval; hands and feet small; and complexion a light olive, with sometimes a yellow tinge. But their complexion is modified by their mode of life and the latitude in which they reside. Many of their delicately-bred females might pass among us for fair and even beautiful.

Intellectual Character.—In native capacity, the Chinese are not inferior to the Europeans. They have shown themselves capable of competing with the most gifted minds in literary pursuits, and with the shrewdest foreign merchants in trade. Their literati possess vigorous and powerful minds, and the Chinese statesmen have exercised great ability as diplomats. The imperial civil code is a work of great ability. They have a voluminous literature, evincing great intellectual attainments.

Population.—The most reliable information accessible to European and American scholars in China leads to the conclusion that the present population of the Eighteen Provinces, cannot be much short of 367,000,000. This conclusion is the result of a comparison of the several censuses made by different emperors, the last of which was in 1812. This is deemed incredible, by some distinguished scholars; and in many of the geographies the number is placed much below this figure. But those who have had the best opportunities of learning the truth on the subject, generally favor the larger number; among whom are, Sir Francis Davis, and Messrs. Medhurst, Gutzlaff, Bridgman, and Williams.

History.—The Chinese have strong claims to great antiquity. Their traditionary records carry us back about 4,000 years, to the Emperor Yu, the founder of the Hea dynasty, 2,204 B. C. Yet China, like other great nations, has been the theatre of frequent and bloody convulsions. Previous to the present dynasty, 20 different dynasties had risen and fallen, each rising like the present, and also closing its career, amid scenes of violence and blood. The Manchu was not firmly established until 20 years after the occupation of Peking by the first Manchu emperor in 1644. Like the ancient eastern and modern European nations, China has often been made a "field of blood." The armies which have been successively brought into the field, in these conflicts, have been vast, and the carnage in proportion. No quarter has usually been shown to the vanquished; but death has rioted in his slaughtered victims. Twice, within less than 600 years, it has been overrun by foreign princes, connected with the savage hordes on her frontiers; first by the Monguls in 1280, who governed the empire 88 years, and were expelled by the Chinese at the commencement of the Ming dynasty in 1368, which held the throne 276 years. Then again was it subjugated by the Manchus, whose dynasty dates from 1644, having lasted 260 years. But its days seem now almost numbered. Happy will it be if the next dynasty shall be a Christian one, agreeing in character with the name of its leader, the "Prince of Peace." Happier still the day when Christ the true Prince of Peace shall reign without a rival in the hearts of China's unknown millions.

There is reason to believe that the primitive domains of the Chinese monarchs were very small, lying mostly within the "Great Plain," and comprehending only a small part of that. The dominions of the present dynasty are more extensive than of any preceding line of monarchs. Until a late period that part of China Proper lying south of the Yangtszkiang, was in a state of barbarism; and even now in its southern and south-western quarter there are independent aboriginal tribes, called Meautsz, children of the soil, who have never submitted to the Chinese government. Their homes are in the mountainous regions, where they maintain their savage state.

National Works—Great Wall.—The Chinese, until within a comparatively short period, greatly excelled the nations of the western world, both in the arts, and in internal improvements. Among the earliest of these is the great national wall, built by Tsim-Chi, about B. C. 220, which, for its magnitude, may be classed among the wonders of the world. It was designed to protect his dominions from the incursions of the northern barbarians. As evidence of its original solidity, it has to the present day resisted the elements and the frosts of a wintry region. Its entire length, including its windings, is estimated by McCulloch at 1,250 miles. Its height is from 15 to 30 feet, being 25 feet wide at the base, and 15 at the top; having square towers at short intervals, generally about 37 feet high, and 40 feet square at the base, built without the wall. This immense structure is composed of earth, faced with masonry, and covered with tiles, and extends over the highest mountains, through the deepest valleys, and over rivers by bridges. It is at present in a state of decay, being no longer needed for its original use, since the incorporation of the Mongul and Manchu territories in the Chinese empire.

The Grand Canal commences in Hangchan, in about 30° 20' N. lat., and 119° 45' E. long., and extending north, unites first with the Yangtszkiang, and subsequently with the Hoang-ho, and terminates at Lintsin, in about 37° N. lat. and 116° E. long., being in a direct line 512 miles long; but, including its bends, above 650; and, by its union with navigable rivers, forming a water communication between Hangchan and Peking, across ten degrees of latitude. By its union with other smaller canals and navigable rivers, it not only aids in irrigating immense tracts of land, but facilitates the conveyance of produce to all parts of the empire. Though its construction must have required a vast amount of labor, yet, aside from its great utility, it ranks not high as a work of art, and in this respect cannot compare with similar works in Europe and America. This canal was dug in 1344, by the last prince of the Mongul dynasty.

National Roads.—"In the public roads," says McCulloch, "and where rugged steppes are only accessible by means of laboriously-formed passes, Chinese industry is fully apparent. Wherever intercourse is expedient between any two points, no natural impediments, no labor or expense, are too great for the Chinese to overcome." Yet, we are not to conclude that the celestial empire abounds with good roads, in our sense of the term; for, as goods are transported in boats by water, or carried overland by porters, the roads are generally unsuited to wheel carriages. They are usually mere foot-paths, sometimes paved and sometimes not.

Cities.—In the number and magnitude of its cities, no other country can compare with China. In their architecture, however, there is little to interest or to excite admiration. The houses are generally but one story high, covered with tiles, without glass windows, miserably lighted and ventilated, and often crowded together without much respect to order. Their plastering is mud, overlaid with a thin coat of lime. Their floors are either tiles, boards, a cement made of lime, sand, and red earth, or the mere ground a little elevated. The rooms are sometimes ceiled above with thin boards, but as often, perhaps, without any ceiling. They plaster the walls of their rooms, but never the ceiling, except in the houses of foreigners. The framework of their dwellings is simple and peculiar, and is not allowed to rest on the outer walls. As a protection both against fire and robbers, the houses of the more wealthy are often surrounded by a wall from 18 to 20 feet high, commonly made of earth, capped with projecting tiles, and plastered on both sides. These walls are sometimes two or more feet thick at the base, and, with proper care, will stand 60 or 80 years. If well made, they in time become almost as hard as brick. The dwellings of the Chinese, in their general form, are much after the model of a tent. Those of the rich frequently contain, each a spacious court, with side rooms for the different members of the household, and with more private apartments in its rear. This court is the reception room for guests, and in its back part are the domestic idols. Gardens, in which there is an attempt to imitate lake, woodland, and mountain scenery, are often found connected with their dwellings. The houses of the rich are adorned with carved work and a profusion of coarse paintings, and the door-posts of the dwellings of all classes are ornamented with red paper, on which sentences from the classics are written in large characters. So also above the doors, and sometimes on them. Some of their temples and other public dwellings are vast structures, abounding in carved work, both in wood and stone; and in paintings and gildings; and, in their general construction, they show much architectural skill. But they are wanting in good taste, being suited to a barbarous, or uncivilized age. The streets in Chinese cities are very narrow, the widest seldom exceeding 15 or 20 feet; and they are often so crowded with articles of merchandise and various handicraft operations, that passing is difficult, especially in the filthy markets, early in the day. The stench arising from the articles of food exposed for sale, and the smoke and dust from the numerous cooking establishments in the streets, is very offensive. As the use of wheel carriages is impracticable, passengers, goods, building materials, and every other article in use among the people, must be carried by coolies. Sedan chairs are used by many of the more respectable citizens. A horse is seldom seen in the streets. The Chinese merchants and traders exhibit much taste and skill in the arrangement of their goods. In the evening especially, their spacious shops, illumined by numerous lamps and by large ornamented lanterns suspended in front, present quite a splendid appearance. Their drug-stores will compare very well with similar establishments in this country. There is, however, no comparison between their mercantile buildings and the superb establishments of European and American merchants. The shops are often lighted from windows in the roof.

The Chinese have a method of guarding against extensive fires, which is peculiarly their own. They divide their cities into sections by fire-proof walls, from 20 to 30 feet high, made of earth, plastered on both sides, and protected from the rains by a projecting cap of tiles. No one is allowed to build higher than this wall, unless he will raise the wall to an equal height with his house.

With these preliminary observations, we proceed to notice briefly some of the more important of the Chinese cities, embracing the principal cities on the coast, in which there are or have been Christian missions, and those which have become by treaty the centres of trade. And as the particular descriptions given of the capital will apply to other cities also, we shall not repeat them; as, in these respects, all their cities are nearly alike, everything, almost, being stereotyped.

Peking, or the Northern Capital, if not the largest, is yet the most important, being the seat of the imperial power. It is situated in the Chihli province, amid a sandy plain, in latitude $39^{\circ} 54'$ north, and longitude $116^{\circ} 27'$ east, nearly on the parallel of Philadelphia. Its entire circuit, including the suburbs, has been estimated at 25 miles, and its area at 27 sq. m.; and its population from 1,500,000 to 3,000,000. The truth may be between the two extremes, perhaps about 2,000,000. It is an ancient city, but did not become the seat of government until 1282, during the reign of the celebrated Mogul emperor, Kublai Khan, who subsequently made Hangchau, his imrial residence. After the expulsion of the Monguls, the emperors of the Ming dynasty held their court at Hiang-ning-foo, now called Nanking, until Yungloh its third monarch, in 1411, made Peking the seat of government, which has ever since been the residence of the imperial court. This city consists of two parts, the one containing about 12 sq. m., being the northern or Tartar city, including the imperial palace and the government buildings; and the other, called the southern or outer city, being occupied by the Chinese. The walls are 30 feet high, 25 thick at the base, and 12 at the top, being surmounted with a parapet, and surrounded with a ditch. Near the gates, 16 in all, the walls are faced with stone, and elsewhere with large bricks, laid in mortar, which in time become nearly as hard as stone. Between the facings, the wall is composed of earth taken from the surrounding ditch. Square towers, projecting 50 feet from the outer margin of the walls, occur at intervals of about 60 yards, and one of these defences stands on each side of every gate. The gateways are covered by strong arches, which are surrounded by wooden buildings, several stories high, with painted port-holes. The towers on each side of the gateways are connected in front by a semi-circular fort, which is entered on the side.

Canton is the largest of the five ports open to foreign commerce. It is the capital of Kwangtung, situated on the north bank of the Pearl river, in lat. $23^{\circ} 7' N.$, and $113^{\circ} 14' E.$ long. It was for a long period, the principal foreign emporium, but is now rivaled by Shanghai. The city proper is about 6 miles in circumference, being divided into two unequal parts, by a wall running east and west; but the entire city, including the suburbs, is about 10 miles in circuit. In magnitude it is regarded as the third city in the empire, containing a population probably of 1,000,000. In wealth it may be next to Peking. The foreign factories are the best buildings in the city, and an honor to the distinguished nations to whose enterprising merchants they belong. The promenade grounds, between the mercantile bongs and the river are beautiful, and when, morning and evening, enlivened by merchants and strangers, seeking exercise and diversion, they are a pleasant resort. The contrast between the enlightened and polished citizens of the west, and the surrounding Chinese is strikingly apparent. The English Episcopal church on these grounds is a tasteful edifice. The city proper is yet closed against the entrance of strangers. The populace of Canton have heretofore been peculiarly unfriendly to foreigners, and their treatment of them in language and demeanor uncommonly reproachful; but of late there has been a great change for the better, at least so far as Christian missionaries are concerned. The immense amount and variety of native craft in the river opposite Canton, is not among the least interesting and surprising objects to the traveler. They constitute a vast floating city.

Whampoa, the "Yedow Anchorage," is about 14 miles below Canton, and is the anchorage ground of the foreign shipping. Above this point large vessels cannot safely venture. There are two floating chapels for seamen, the one Protestant, the other Roman Catholic. The first is furnished with a chaplain by the American Seamans' Friend Society, and contains apartments for the chaplain, and a reading-room for sailors. On the south side of the anchorage are two islands, called French and Danes Islands, on which foreigners are allowed to bury their dead, and ramble at pleasure. In this neighborhood is a dense population, and the lands are rich and highly cultivated, and large herds of cattle are raised for the use of the shipping, the Chinese eating little beef.

Macao is a Portuguese settlement, about 8 miles in circuit, on a small peninsula at the north-western extremity of the large island called Hingshan, between 60 and 70 miles south-east of Canton. It was occupied by the Portuguese early in the 16th century, and was formerly a place of much trade; but in a commercial aspect, it is not now of much importance. It is, however, a very pleasant and healthful locality. The population of the peninsula is about 30,000, of whom upwards of 5,000 are Portuguese and other foreigners, subject to Portuguese officers; but the Chinese are governed by their own magistrates. This place is the head-quarters of the Catholic missions in China, and the seat of a college, in which many Chinese youth have been educated to become preachers of that faith in different parts of China. The town is protected by three forts, on commanding eminences, and others outside of its walls defend its waters.

Hong-Kong is a flourishing English settlement, about 40 miles eastward of Macao. Victoria, its chief city, is in lat. $22^{\circ} 16' N.$, and long. $114^{\circ} 8' E.$ The island, which is nine miles long, eight broad, and 26 in circuit, was ceded by the Chinese to the English in 1842, at the treaty of Nanking. It is mountainous, with little productive soil, but on its northern side, where stands the long and beautiful town of Victoria, is a spacious and safe harbor. The town contains many elegant buildings, beautiful roads, and a mixed population, of whom, probably more than two-thirds are Chinese, whose families for the most part reside on the main land. The governor of this colony is also superintendent of British trade at the Five Ports. Here is stationed a considerable military force for the protection of the British interests in China. It is now regarded as a healthy place. It is the residence of a bishop of the Church of England, having the oversight of her Chinese missions. The Catholics are numerous. The amount of money expended in buildings in this colony, since its session, is thought to exceed 2,000,000 of dollars. It is a place of much trade, and a large opium depot. Several newspapers are published here.

Amoy is situated on the coast northward of Canton, in latitude $24^{\circ} 40'$ N., and long. $118^{\circ} 20'$ E. having an excellent harbor, a large native and an increasing foreign trade. It stands on the south-western corner of the island after which it is called, at the mouth of the Dragon river, which leads to Chiang-chau-foo. This island is about 40 miles in circumference, and besides the city it is dotted with numerous large villages. The scenery in and around the bay is quite picturesque. Across the channel from Amoy is the island of Koolungsoo, on which is the missionary burial ground, and a place of interment for other foreigners. The city and its suburbs is about 8 miles in circuit, with a population, probably, of upwards of 200,000; while that of the remaining part of the island may be 100,000. This city was captured by the English in 1841, and restored again to the Chinese in 1845. The surrounding country is densely populated, and in a high state of cultivation.

Fuhchau.—Fuhchan-foo, that is, happy district, is in latitude $26^{\circ} 5'$ N., and longitude $119^{\circ} 20'$ E. It stands on the north bank of the Min, about 34 miles from its mouth. The walled part of the city is about three miles from the river, the intervening space on the south being a beautiful plain, under the highest cultivation, with moderate elevations, sufficient to give a pleasing variety to the landscape. On the north, the city walls are near the base of the mountains, which bound the valley of the Min, from a long distance above the city, to its mouth. Some miles to the west is also a mountain range of moderate elevation, and the mountains on the south bank of the river also reach from above the city to its mouth. These two mountain ranges converge 8 or 10 miles below the city, thus placing Fuhchan in a vast natural amphitheatre, through which the Min winds majestically, diffusing beauty and fertility throughout the extensive valley through which it flows. The British consulate stands on a hilly eminence in the southern borders of the city, from which is an extensive view of grand and beautiful scenery. From the southern and eastern borders of the city proper, the suburbs extend for about three miles south-east to the northern bank of the river. At Tongchiu, a small islet amid the stream, the river is spanned by a stone bridge, 420 paces long, on the north side, resting on 40 stone piers, and on the south side of the island by another, resting on 90 abutments, extending to the south shore. These bridges are ancient structures, and on one side are lined with shops. The intervening island is about an eighth of a mile in diameter, and a quarter of a mile long, and densely inhabited. On the south bank of the river is a large suburb of about 3 miles in length. The whole city within and without the walls is supposed to contain a population of not less than 600,000 souls. The foreign trade at this port has hitherto been small, owing in part to the difficult entrance to the river, though navigable for large vessels to within 12 miles of the city. The native trade is large, and the floating population vast. To perform the circuit of the walls on foot requires about two and a half hours, and the entire circuit is probably about eight miles. This city is the residence during a part of the year of the viceroy of Fuhkien and Chekiang, and of other high officers; among whom are the lieutenant-governor and the commander of the Tartar troops. The Manchus occupy the eastern section of the city, between whom and the Chinese there is little intercourse. Outside of the south gate is a handsome Catholic church, in which a Spanish priest officiates. Timber and paper are among the most considerable exports from Fuhchau. Within a circuit of 20 miles in either direction from this city, there is a large number of towns and villages, all speaking one dialect, which, including the city, may be the abode of 2,000,000. In a political and missionary aspect, Fuhchau is among the most important of the Five Ports, and in view of its commercial advantages may yet become a place of much trade. The opium trade is here vigorously prosecuted, and its destructive and demoralizing influence is widely felt.

Ningpo is the only important city on the coast, northward from Fuhchau. It is situated in $29^{\circ} 55'$ N. lat., and $121^{\circ} 22'$ E. long., near the head of navigable water, about 12 miles from the sea. Like Fuhchau, its native commerce is large, but its foreign trade has hitherto been small, excepting the opium trade, which is there also vigorously prosecuted by two or three receiving ships, stationed a little off the mouth of the river leading to the city. Its walls are about five miles in circuit, and the city and suburbs are thought to contain a population of near 300,000. It is one of the neatest and best built cities on the coast, containing some streets respectable for width, and many large and well furnished shops. Many of its dwellings are of two stories. It stands in the midst of a large and fertile plain, densely peopled, and skirted by mountains on one side, about 18 miles distant. During the late war it was captured by the English troops, and held by them till the termination of hostilities. At Chinghai, below Ningpo, near the river's mouth, there was a bloody engagement, and great carnage among the Chinese forces.

Shanghai, in lat. $31^{\circ} 10'$ N., and long. $121^{\circ} 30'$ E., is now the rival of Canton, in the foreign trade, and bids fair to become the largest foreign emporium in China. It is the principal seaport of Kiangsu, and lies on the north shore of the Wusung, about 14 miles from its mouth, and near its junction with the Hwang-

pee. By means of this river, it communicates with Suchau, Sung-kiang, and other cities on the Grand Canal; while by the Yangtszkiang, it receives produce from the south-western provinces of the empire. It hence enjoys the greatest advantages for an extensive commerce. The city lying within the walls is three miles in circuit, and the entire city is estimated to contain a population of 225,000. It has, for some time, been in the hands of the insurgents. After an unsuccessful attack, the imperial troops burnt the eastern quarter of the city, which is now a desolation. The section occupied by the foreign merchants, in its streets and tasteful buildings, much resembles a western city, presenting a strong contrast to the neighboring dwellings of the poor Chinese. This city also stands on a large and fertile plain, and the whole surrounding country is occasionally overflowed, causing great mortality, by the generation of noxious miasma. Such was the case in 1849. The native trade of Shanghai is said to be larger than at any other city in the empire. Nevertheless, Shanghai is a poorly built and dirty place, with narrow and densely crowded streets, almost blocked up with articles of traffic. A large fleet of opium receiving-ships are stationed outside the river Wusung. Among its heaviest exports are tea and silks. This city is now occupied by a larger number of Protestant missionaries than any other in the empire, and three or four tasteful and commodious Christian churches have been built within the walls, in which large congregations have convened to hear the word of God. A large Catholic church stands just outside the walls, on the banks of the Wusung.

Nanking.—Kiangningfoo, or Nanking, the capital of the Kiangsu province, stands on the southern bank of the Yangtszkiang, in about 32° N. lat. and 119° E. long. Next to Peking, it is, perhaps, the most celebrated city in China, though now shorn of its former glory, and apparently greatly abridged in its limits, and diminished in population. It was the capital of the empire only about 50 years, including the earlier part of the Ming dynasty, the court having been transferred to Peking in 1411, by the emperor Yungloch. It was here that the Chinese were compelled to submit to humiliating terms of peace with England, in 1842. It has recently become celebrated, as the theatre of conflict between the imperial troops and the insurgents, and by the latter is still held. At the taking of this city by the insurgents, the Manchu troops made but a feeble resistance, and were indiscriminately put to the sword. The walls are still very extensive, making its defence difficult. The ancient palaces have disappeared, and few monuments of ancient royalty now remain, except the mementos of the princely dead.

Nanking is celebrated for its porcelain tower completed in 1430, after the lapse of 19 years from its commencement, and at a total cost of

$3,313,978. It is celebrated also for its manufactures, including satin, crape, nankeen, paper, ink, and artificial flowers of pith paper. It is also renowned for its scholars, and was, till taken by the insurgents, the residence of a governor-general of these provinces, and the abode of a host of officials and literary men, anxious for promotion. Its population is estimated at 400,000. Only a part of the area within the walls is covered with dwellings. The surrounding country is beautified by hills, valleys, villages, and fruitful fields.

The Arts.—The productions of the Chinese in the department of the fine arts, have little comparative merit, though a few centuries ago, China was in advance of Europe. Her landscape and other paintings, though excellent as regards their coloring, generally fail in perspective, and their portraits want expression. Some of their paintings on rice paper, however, are very pretty, and their delineations of the persons and costume of their own countrymen, are many of them quite accurate. Their music is harsh, nasal, sonorous, and wanting both in harmony and melody, though admired by themselves. Their statuary, even the best of it, cannot compare with the Grecian and the Roman, and with that of western artists of the present day.

Though, in the mechanic arts, the Chinese excel in some things, yet in general, they are far behind the Western world. Their implements are few and simple, though well suited to their use; but they are totally ignorant of the multifarious and powerful machinery by which Christian nations can so rapidly and so tastefully perform the most delicate work, and execute the most magnificent undertakings. They however in some degree make up in numbers, and the cheapness of labor, what they lack in machinery and in mechanical skill. Works have been executed in China, which in magnitude may compare with the pyramids of Egypt, and far exceed the proudest monuments of human labor in the Western world.

The art of printing from blocks, which is a species of stereotyping, the manufacture of paper, of gunpowder, of the most beautiful porcelain, and the discovery and use of the compass, all originated among the Chinese; besides their exquisite workmanship in cotton, silk, wood, stone, ivory, and the precious metals. Of what they know in the arts, they have borrowed next to nothing from other nations. In this respect we have learned more from the Chinese than they from us. While we were in comparative barbarism, they in mechanical knowledge and skill, were equal, if not superior to their descendants of the present day. Consequently for the improvements which the Chinese have made, they, under God, have been mainly indebted to their own genius and researches.

ture is regarded by the Chinese as the most honorable, as well as the most useful profession. It is encouraged by the example of their emperor, who, at the capital, annually holds the plough in the presence of his high officers and thousands of the people; and a like ceremony is performed in the chief cities of the provinces, by his high officers, as his vicegerents. It is thus honored because it is the main support of the state. Though their agricultural implements are few, simple, and rude, yet practically, agriculture has been made very effective, as evinced by the unexampled density of the population. Though for thousands of years the same lands have been under culture, producing annually two, and sometimes three crops, yet so far from becoming sterile, they appear to be increasing in fertility; not only are the alluvial plains on the margins of the great rivers carefully cultivated, but lofty hills are in many cases terraced from the base to summit. For fertilizing their lands, the Chinese depend much on night soil, which they obtain from the cities and villages. The manure is collected for future use in pits, on the margins of their fields. The rice is first thickly sown in a small patch, and the shoots, when nearly a foot high, are transplanted in rows in the soft mud, and by and by between these rows the shoots for a second crop are planted, which rapidly matures after the first is gathered. For their crops of rice, especially, the Chinese, like the ancient Egyptians, are greatly dependent upon diligent artificial irrigation. To overflow their fields, they resort to a great variety of ingenious expedients; sometimes diverting the mountain streams from their regular channels, watering first the highest plots of ground, made level and bounded by low embankments, and from thence descending, as the proprietor wills, into the lower grounds. In other cases, water is raised from canals, rivers, and ponds, by wheels propelled by water power, by buffaloes, or by a species of treadmill, worked by two persons. The water is forced upwards through a box trough by a chain of paddles which revolves over two axles, one at each end of the trough. It reminds one of the Israelites, who, while in Egypt, are said to have watered their lands with the foot. The Chinese gardener is assiduous in irrigating his plants. Chinese agriculture in general is much like gardening, each family at the most, ordinarily owning and cultivating but a few acres. Oxen and buffaloes are much employed in plowing, furrowing, and rolling the ground. Women labor in the fields in common with the men. The land, theoretically, belongs to the emperor; yet it descends to the eldest son, so long as the taxes are promptly paid. The younger brothers, however, with their families, being joint laborers, have a perpetual right to a support from the proceeds of the land. Daughters cannot inherit. The Chinese beat out their grain in the field on a board, one end of which rests in the bottom of a tub that receives the grain. The straw is carried home on the shoulders of men. Carts are little used, man, to a great extent, performing the labor, which here is devolved upon the beast. The agricultural classes do not generally live upon their lands, but in villages located upon the more elevated grounds. Fences are very rare, the lands being divided by ridges of earth, or embankments, which serve as footpaths. In the neighborhood of the cities, they are paved with flat stones, lying transversely. Some of these walks are many miles long. The rich plains on the rivers are minutely traversed by creeks and canals. Over these streams on the main routes, are thrown strong stone bridges.

Productions.—In the northern and eastern provinces, rice is the most important agricultural product, grown mostly on the plains. Wheat may rank next. Sweet potatoes are produced on the hill sides, as also tobacco, peas, beans, and a great variety of vegetables. In the southern provinces, sugar is made from the cane in considerable quantity. Cotton, upon which the Chinese mainly depend for clothing, is raised in large quantities on the Great Plain. The fruits of China are much the same as in other countries in the same latitude; but they are not distinguished for their excellence. The Chinese are fond of flowers, which are extensively cultivated in the neighborhood of the large cities. And not content with these, artificial flowers of great beauty are manufactured and worn by females of all classes and ages. Money may procure in China almost any article of food, clothing, or furniture that may be desired, and at moderate prices. Foreign merchandise may be obtained for about the same prices as in this country. Compared with the price of food, the relative value of the dollar in China is several times greater than in this country. But the lot of the poor man in China, who must labor for a mere pittance, is a difficult and trying one.

Commerce.—The Chinese may be called a commercial people. They have an extensive internal trade, and make large exports in tea, silks, camphor, cinnamon, fans, fire-crackers, porcelain, and other products of the soil and of the shop. A vast amount of native shipping may be found in all the principal cities situated on navigable waters. The merchants are found in the most distant nations of her wide colonial possessions, in the cold regions of Manchuria and Mongolia, far west in the broad territory of Ili, and in the remotest bounds of Tibet. Her ships find their way to Japan, and throughout the ports of the Indian Archipelago, Cochin-china, Camboja, and Siam, and some few have reached Burmah and British India. Multitudes of Chinese adventurers are found in the Sandwich Islands, and on the western shores of the American conti-ment. The commercial enterprise is the more remarkable, in view of the little protection afforded it by the imperial government, and the vexatious duties imposed on internal trade. Chinese merchantmen, trading at the different ports between Shanghai and Canton, have been obliged, at great cost, to hire foreign armed vessels as convoys to protect them from the pirates which swarm along the coast. When once at sea, Chinese vessels have little or no protection from government vessels, and if they venture into foreign ports, they are by their own laws regarded as aliens. But such is the commercial spirit of the Chinese, that in spite of these obstacles, their trade is of great extent. Necessity makes them a trading as well as an agricultural people; and they are skilful managers of trade. Placed side by side with western merchants in Singapore, Batavia, Siam, and China, they do not fall behind them in the acquisition of wealth. Some of the richest men in Singapore and Batavia are said to be Chinese.

Fishing.—Multitudes of the Chinese depend upon fishing for a livelihood. Large fleets of fishing craft swarm at the mouths of the principal rivers, and in the neighborhood of the large cities on the coast, sometimes numbering from one to two hundred sail. Vessels often fish two and two, for mutual aid in dragging their nets. The rivers and lakes of China also abound with fishing craft, and great quantities of fish are raised in artificial ponds. The number of large fish sometimes taken from a small pond, is surprising. Birds are trained to catch fish, and other ingenious modes of fishing are adopted in which the Chinese excel. Sharks, sometimes of large size, are common in the Chinese fish markets. Fish, both fresh and salted, forms an important part of the food of the people, which they eat with rice and vegetables. The fishermen are generally poor and illiterate, and when reduced to straits, sometimes turn pirates.

Literary Examinations.—Literary attainment is greatly prized in China, as being a passport to office, and to distinction and influence in society. In the chief cities of the provinces, the lower literary degrees are conferred on those whose essays are adjudged to possess the highest merit. The themes are assigned by imperial officers to all alike. The candidates, while composing their essays, are shut up in a large hall, and allowed nothing but implements of writing; and every avenue to the premises is guarded to prevent communication from without. The names of the competitors are not known to the judges till after their decision. Only a fixed number of degrees, bearing a small proportion to the number of aspirants, can be conferred at one time. The first degree is called the siu-tsai, answering imperfectly to our A. B. The second is ku-jin, indicating a higher grade of literary attainment, and makes the possessor eligible to office. The third degree, called tsin-sz, (entered scholars or doctors,) is triennially conferred at Peking, only those of the ku-jiu, who have not been appointed to office, being eligible, as candidates. The fourth and highest degree, called hanlin, entitles to enrolment, as members of the Imperial Academy, with fixed salaries. The triennial examination for this degree is held in the palace. In the conferring of degrees, great impartiality is professed. The meritorious scholar, however poor, has legally the same chance for success, with the sons of the rich and influential. Yet, it is generally thought that there is much of favoritism and bribery. But very few among the tens of thousands of annual competitors reach even the lowest degree, and of the successful ones but few secure the second degree, though many struggle for it from youth to hoary age. The government makes no provision for the support of primary schools, nor does it compel the people to provide instruction for their children. But the making of distinguished scholarship a passport to office and honor, exerts a mighty influence upon the youth of China, in stimulating them to the pursuit of knowledge.

Character and influence of the Chinese Classics.—With regard to physical, social, and moral education, Chinese authors give many excellent rules. But while they give directions as to the best methods of study, and the means of preserving health, and enforce the social duties of man to man, they make no allusion to the higher and more solemn duties of man to his Creator. The ceremonies to be observed in the mutual intercourse of parents and children, husbands and wives, brothers and sisters, rulers and subjects, &c. are minutely described, and strenuously enforced; and their works on morals are not without allusions to a future recompense of the evil and the good. Honesty, truth, benevolence, and even purity of heart, in their sense of the term, are inculcated. But their views of internal purity and of virtuous conduct are radically different from the Bible standard. Truth is inculcated, but falsehood is practiced; even Confucius, their idolized sage, setting the example. But the consciences of the Chinese are in favor of virtue.

The classical writings of the Chinese are chiefly political in their bearing, designed to instruct and admonish the ruler in the good government of himself and of the people. Their influence over prince and people is very powerful; and the writings and instructions of Confucius, as reported and explained by his disciples, have, doubtless, been the main support of the Chinese government, since his day. (This illustrious man was born 551 B. C.) He says little on religious subjects; but besides con- niving at the popular superstitions of his day, he gave his influence in support of ancestral worship, by inculcating the religious veneration of both the dead and the living. Dr. Bridgman says of him: "Through a long life, of threescore and twelve years, Confucius busied himself exclusively with the things of this world. He not only wrapped himself up with the tissues and tatters of his pagan ancestors, but all his energies were exerted, from first to last, in dissuading his fellow mortals from all thought of a world to come. He neither searched himself, nor would he allow others to inquire, after the wisdom and attributes, or even the existence, of heaven and earth. Creator, Divinity, and divine things had few if any charms for him. Time and sense, and things present and visible, alone engrossed all his time and all his thoughts. In the arduous labors of collecting and arranging the fragmentary records of the ancients, and in repeated endeavors to reform the men who were his contemporaries, almost his whole life was occupied. He seems to have felt that the gods of his nation were vain; and yet it does not appear that he ever was conscious of man's insufficiency. Thus he was "without God in the world." On the part of his disciples, he is a principal object of religious veneration.

The Chinese classics are decidedly superior in moral purity, to the Grecian and Roman authors; but they teach the perfectibility of human nature. They maintain that, however corrupt a man may become through the influence of evil example, he may, by his own unaided efforts, restore himself to primeval purity. Such a doctrine is hostile to the humbling truths of the Gospel, fostering the pride of the human heart. Confucius seems to have had no very distinct idea of an intelligent Great First Cause, and his followers are regarded as atheistical in their sentiments. So true it is, that "the world by wisdom knew not God."

Chinese Schools.—The Chinese schools originate in the private enterprise of the teachers, whose wages depend on the number of their pupils. They seldom number over 20. Three or four dollars a month would be thought good wages. Sometimes several families unite in hiring a teacher by the year. Children usually enter school between the ages of six and seven. Each morning on entering the school-room, the children are required to bow, first to the tablet of Confucius, before which incense is burning, and then to salute the teacher. He then reads the lesson, and the boys repeat after him the characters, until they can do so independently. Then each one reads them by himself, till he can repeat them from memory. Chinese education is a constant exercise of the memory, until the classics can be rehearsed verbatim. These embrace the writings of Confucius and Mencius, with copious commentaries, by distinguished scholars. Each day's lesson is rehearsed by the pupil, in the presence of his teacher, and writing is a daily exercise. During the first two or three years of study, they do little except to learn the forms and sounds of the characters in their particular dialect, which in most cases widely differ from the vulgar tongue. Consequently the books which they have memorized are not understood. After three or four years of hard study, they begin to be initiated into the meaning of the characters, the teacher daily explaining a few of them marked with red ink, and requiring his pupils to repeat the explanations after him. The number thus explained is gradually increased, until simple sentences are explained, and ultimately the entire text. The constant use of the pencil, first in copying the characters, and afterwards in composing, gives the Chinese student great skill and celerity in writing.

The Chinese Language.—The Chinese characters were originally symbols, not of sounds, but of ideas; but most of them now bear not the remotest resemblance to the things signified. In the imperial dictionary there are about 80,000 characters, composed of 214 radicals, or elements, according to which they are arranged. Thousands of these characters are now nearly obsolete, and not above 8,000 or 10,000 of the remainder are in common use. But the thorough mastery of these—in their forms, sounds, and significations—is a herculean work, especially including the ready and felicitous use of them in composition. But such is the attachment of the Chinese to their system of writing, that it would be no easy matter to induce them to relinquish it, and adopt an alphabetic system. The Chinese character serves them as a universal medium of communication, which no alphabetic system could do, in view of the multiplicity and diversity of dialects spoken within the eighteen provinces. In Fokien alone are eleven principal dialects. The Chinese written character has, without doubt, powerfully contributed to the integrity of the empire, amid its frequent change of dynasties. It has likewise availed to maintain identity of manners, customs, sentiments and feelings. The empire, in its grand characteristics, has thereby become stereotyped, and new modes of thought and action are difficult to be introduced. In this language, free, bold, eloquent and pathetic address is next to impossible. As a medium of thought, it has great advantages and marked defects.

The Chinese system of education, though it supplies valuable mental discipline, yet rather cramps the mental energies, and impedes expansive, vigorous, independent thought. The memory is sorely tasked, while the reasoning powers are but partially exercised. It imparts little knowledge. One may hold the first rank among the Chinese literati, and yet be ignorant of the most common branches of education in our common schools. Many respectable Chinese scholars are not acquainted with the geography even of their own country. There are men who are familiar with the geography, and civil and political condition of the principal Christian nations, but this knowledge they did not acquire at school.

Ability to Read.—There is a diversity of opinion as to the proportion of intelligent readers in China, according to the locality of the observer. Among farmers, fishermen, boatmen, small mechanics, and petty tradesmen, there are comparatively few intelligent readers, though some of them are familiar with the few characters used in their particular vocations. As the result of somewhat extensive inquiry, the writer has come to the conclusion that scarcely one in ten of the adult population of China can understand books written in the simplest and most popular style. Many read the characters fluently, who do not understand their meaning. Female education is not appreciated in China, and few females can read.

Industry, and Frugality.—Compared with other eastern nations, the Chinese are an industrious people, though among them are found multitudes of idle vagabonds. The mass of the people are frugal from necessity. By their skill in cooking, they secure considerable variety of food with very limited means. Multitudes feed themselves for less than four cents a day. Salt, fish, rice and vegetables, with a few simple condiments, constitute a large part of their food; though a variety of other articles may be had in the cities by those who are able to buy.

Marriage.—Children are often very early betrothed by their parents, sometimes even in infancy. This is done through a class of persons who make a regular profession of match-making. And, however unsuitable the match, when once made, it is inviolable. In many cases, they never see each other until the period of their marriage. Instances have been known of betrothed damsels committing suicide, to escape union with the persons to whom they had been betrothed. Before the consummation of the marriage, a stipulated sum must be paid to the parents of the bride, generally from 20 to 100 dollars, according to the circumstances of the parties. Their marriages are pompous and expensive. The bride, locked up in a red quilt sedan, borne by four men, and sometimes followed by an immense train gaily dressed, with music, banners, and other paraphernalia, is carried by night to the house of the bridegroom, where the parties pledge each other in a cup of wine, and the joint worship of the ancestral tablets, sometimes joined with prostration to the parents of the bridegroom. At the marriage feast, spirituous liquors are freely used. The sexes eat and drink separately, when the young wife is subjected to many severe jokes.

Condition of Females.—The Chinese females are very rigidly confined to the house, and enjoy limited opportunities of social intercourse, even with their own sex. Brothers and sisters are in a great degree isolated from each other. When a visitor enters the house, the betrothed girl must retire into a private apartment. Almost from the cradle to the grave, the Chinese females lead a life of painful degradation and toil: at home, imprisoned, and after marriage subjected to the tyrannical rule of an unfeeling husband and a cruel mother-in-law, until she in turn is allowed to domineer over the unhappy wives of her sons. How enviable the lot of daughters born and educated in Christian lands!

Funerals and Burying Grounds.—On the decease of parents, their remains are enclosed in air-tight coffins, and for 7 weeks retained in the house, and every fourth day is devoted to special funeral rites. Food is offered them, the essence of which they are supposed to eat, and prayers are offered by Budhists and Tauist priests for the happiness of their spirits. In these ceremonies there appears a striking resemblance to the tenets and practices of the Romish Church. Much importance is attached by the Chinese to the circumstances and place of interment of their dead, as affecting the peace and prosperity of survivors. Women are their principal mourners. To see them kneeling and howling in lonely burial grounds, as the writer has seen them, by the graves of their husbands and children, is indeed heart-rending. Into their dark minds, their religion sheds no ray of light to illuminate the gloomy regions of the dead.

The barren hills and the mountain sides are the chosen places of sepulture, but necessity, in some parts, compels them to bury on the plains. Vaults are not uncommon. Great numbers of the dead are placed in plank coffins and retained above ground for many years. They are arranged sometimes in open sheds, often to the number of 15 or 20, side by side, being the deceased members of the same family. Within the city walls, interments are seldom allowed. The Budhist priests burn the bodies of their dead and place the ashes in common vaults.

Government.—The Chinese government is supposed to have existed under different dynasties, nearly 4000 years. It is a system venerable for its antiquity, and wonderful for its unity and official responsibility, from the lowest to the highest of its officers; the emperor, however, being theoretically responsible to none, unless to heaven, whose vicegerent he professes to be. There are nine orders of civil and military mandarins, distinguished by the color and material of the buttons on their caps, by the ornaments on their girdles, and some other insignia on their robes. Civil and military officers are on nearly an equal footing; and as the highest of the latter are commonly held by Manchus, they operate as checks and spies upon each other. Every officer through out the provinces, is obliged to render an account of his administration to the emperor, through the officer next in rank above him; so that the relative merits of all may be known and awarded. A general council, composed of the most distinguished personages in the empire, assembles daily, at the palace in Peking, in the imperial presence. This council is of recent origin, and is thought to correspond practically with the ministry of western nations. It consists of both Chinese and Manchus, and includes the chancellors of the cabinet, the presidents and vice-presidents of the Six Boards, and the chief officers of all the other courts in the capital, all being selected by the emperor. Its business is to write the imperial edicts, and to aid the emperor by its joint consultations. The imperial cabinet is a still more select council, composed of the four high chancellors, and two assistant chancellors, consisting equally of Chinese and Manchus. Subordinate to the cabinet is a large body of officers, of six different grades, a majority of whom are Manchus. The first on the list of the chancellors, is regarded as the premier. Their business is to deliberate on the government of the empire, proclaim the imperial will, and aid in all matters affecting the peace and well-being of the empire; all concerns, from the highest official appointments, down to the lowest police court of crime, being through this cabinet, brought before the imperial court. Other minor duties also devolve on this body. The opinions of these ministers on the numerous documents which come before them, are expressed in writing, on slips of paper appended to the same, which, early on the following morning are submitted to the emperor, being read by the prime minister, usually a Manchu, and the decision of the sovereign is immediately written by one of the Chinese chancellors. Business is thus rapidly expedited. Subordinate to these two councils, are the Six Boards, the Colonial Office, the Censorate, Courts of Representation and Appeal, and the Imperial Academy, making in all, thirteen departments.

The Peking Gazette is compiled from the documents of the General Council, and is to the people the main source of information touching the affairs of the empire. Copies of this paper are transmitted to the high provincial officers, and without change or comment are allowed to be reprinted and widely circulated. The Six Boards are the Board of Civil Office, of Revenue, of Rites, of War, of Public Works, and of Punishments. At the head of each of these Boards are two presidents and four vice-presidents, in which the Chinese and Manchus are equally represented; and subordinate to each of these is a large retinue of officers of different grades. The Censorate is, in its influence, one of the most important of the Courts; and examples have not been wanting of great fidelity in the reproof even of emperors themselves, by courageous ministers. Its powers are extensive in connection with the administration of the courts, the provincial officers, and the criminal jurisprudence. Ordinarily, however, no great reliance can be placed upon the fidelity of these public censors.

The whole number holding civil offices in the empire, is estimated at about 14,000; but the dependents on the government are much more numerous. In the empire are eight viceroys and 15 lieutenant-governors, each viceroy having the government of two provinces, or two high offices in one province. The lieutenant-governors are sometimes subordinate to the viceroys; but, in other cases, they govern independently. Every important position, both in the civil and military departments, is provided with its appropriate officer, down to the lowest rank. In theory, the Chinese government would seem to be the most perfect government on earth; but in practice, it is far otherwise, owing chiefly to a want of integrity in its officers. They look for gain, and are seldom very scrupulous as to the means of securing it. The Edinburgh Review, speaking of Sir George Stanton's translation of the Chinese Code of Law, says, "When we turn from the ravings of the Zendavesta or the Puranas, to the tone of sense and business in this Chinese collection, it is like passing from darkness to light, and from the drivings of dotage to the exercise of an improved understanding; and redundant and minute as these laws are, in many particulars, we scarcely know a European code, that is at once so copious and so consistent, or so free from intricacy, bigotry, and fiction." But, whatever may be the excellency of the Chinese laws, the government is oppressive and corrupt in its practice, often illegal in its exactions, and, frequently, for a bribe, screening the guilty and oppressing the innocent. Woe to him who, whether innocent or guilty, falls into the hands of the Chinese officials, for he is not likely to escape without being fleeced, if nothing worse. It is probable that as many perish in the wretched prisons of China, from want and cruel treatment, as by the hands of the executioner.

The nominal salaries of Chinese officials are thought to form but a small part of their actual receipts, a vast amount being the fruit of bribery and illegal exaction. Their retainers also are greedy dogs, which can hardly be satisfied. Pity has little place in their hearts, and the prisoner, whether innocent or guilty, is severely taxed for his scanty privileges. Chinese legislation is defective, neither defining nor acknowledging the rights of the subject. A watchful and rapacious police swarm in every city and hamlet, as spies on the people, and no one knows when he is safe and in whom he may confide; and he prefers suffering heavy exactions to resistance or complaint, lest he should expose himself to ten-fold worse evils.

But when large bodies of the people are jointly subjected to heavy exactions, they do sometimes resist, and inflict sore retribution on their oppressors. There is nothing like popular representation in the government, and appeals from iniquitous judicial decisions are, in most cases, impossible. The judges report to their superiors as suits their own convenience. The peaceable disposition of the Chinese is mainly the result of slavish fear, generated by constant surveillance and the absence of mutual confidence and legal responsibility. Every neighborhood has its local overseers, who are responsible for the good conduct of their charge, and no member of a family or clan can offend the government without involving his relatives in suffering. This system of fear and espionage extends from the humblest of the people, through all ranks upwards, to the highest minister of the realm. In the Chinese civil polity, there is much resemblance to the regulations of the camp. The fact, however, that this system of government has continued for thousands of years, securing to so many millions such an amount of peace and prosperity, speaks much in its favor. Both the Monguls and Manchus, though originally barbarians, were obliged to conform to the maxims, usages and laws of the ancient Chinese sovereigns, as detailed by Confucius and his disciples. In theory, the Chinese government is patriarchal, the emperor being regarded as the father of his people; and as, in China, the father has, under certain regulations, the power of life and death over his children, so the emperor, according to his pleasure, though not irrespective of law, inflicts upon his erring children his fatherly corrections, even to death itself, through his constituted official agents. As deceased parents and ancestors are the objects of religious veneration, so the emperors are worshiped both before and after their decease. This worship is required of the high officers when they convene in the palace. The emperor is theoretically Heaven's vicegerent, and the ceremonies and objects of worship of the state religion are not allowed to the people. He only and the high officers to whom he delegates the right, must sacrifice to high Heaven. For others to do it would be rebellion. No one can be an official in China, without being an idolator, the officers being required on certain occasions to honor the local deities. In the ceremonies of the state religion, the emperor is the chief-priest. Like the Pope of Rome, he sits in the temple of God, showing himself, that he is God. The grand objects of imperial worship are heaven, earth, the temple of imperial ancestors, and the gods of the land and of grain.

Standing Army.—The army of the present dynasty is numerically large, being estimated at 1,200,000; but, in the late war with England, as well as in the conflict with the insurgents, it has proved inefficient. The Tartar soldiers are the most reliable part of the army, but they have become enervated by idleness and vice. But the greater part of the army consists of a sort of militia, who are maintained in part by a small stipend from the government, and in part by their own labors. Several times a year they meet to be drilled, presenting, on such occasions, a truly grotesque appearance. Chinese forts are manned with rudely-constructed ordnance, wanting in some cases even a clumsy gun-carriage. Their port holes are of immoderate size. Their navy, though numerous, is furnished with inexperienced officers and seamen, and is despised even by its own people. The admirals know little of the sea, and when called to meet the enemy, are said sometimes to depute their subalterns to the command. They cannot even cope with the pirates that infest the coast, having, at times, been obliged to buy their friendship with silver.

Revenue and Disbursements.—The annual revenue of China has been variously estimated at from $120,000,000 to $200,000,000. Aside from the maintenance of the palace, the support of the Manchu nobility, who are related to the throne, and the presents sent to the Mongul and Mohammedan tribes in the colonies, the main expenditures are for the support of the army and navy, and for the maintenance of the civil officers. The nominal salaries of the latter are small, compared with that of western civilians. The salary of a viceroy or governor-general, who rules over more than 50,000,000, is only about $27,000; that of a lieutenant-governor, $21,333; that of a treasurer, $12,000; and from thence the salaries gradually decrease, according to rank, to about $170. As regards legal taxation, both direct and indirect, for the support of government, China is favored above every principal country in Europe. And, as there is no powerful aristocracy in China, the money that is squeezed out of the people by the officers, returns back among the masses.

Physical, Social, and Moral Condition.—The mass of the Chinese, according to our standard of competency, are miserably poor; and yet such is their great simplicity as to style of living, and skill in making the most of their little, that their actual suffering from want is not great. Their system of clanship, though the source of many and great evils, yet inclines them to afford relief to their kindred. Living as they do, in large families, often including parents, children, grand-children, and even great-grand-children, numbering, in some cases, sixty or more individuals, there is something like equality of condition. But in seasons of general scarcity the suffering must be very great and general; and notwithstanding all that the government, out of its storehouses, can impart to the poor, multitudes die of famine, and others are driven to robbery and piracy. Granaries are provided by the government in the walled towns, to be opened in seasons of scarcity, from which food is either sold at a reduced price, or gratuitously distributed, according to the circumstances of the applicant. It is a politic and benevolent provision, reminding us of the plan of Joseph, in anticipation of the Egyptian famine.

According to our ideas of comfort, the dwellings of the mass of the Chinese are miserable in the extreme. They are low, damp, dark, and ill-ventilated, and abounding in filth. Their furniture is meagre, often consisting of only a few rude stools and a board platform for a bedstead, on which is spread a mat, with sometimes a block of wood for a pillow. The houses of the wealthy are comparatively spacious, and well-furnished with chairs, bedsteads, light-stands, tables, cupboards, and other articles, both tasteful and convenient; but even their dwellings are wanting in cleanliness and comfort, yet they are much more comfortable than we should be in the same circumstances. Knowing nothing better, they think their condition an enviable one, and would not willingly exchange circumstances with any people. Among the lower orders the separation of the sexes is not rigidly maintained; and the cruel practice of binding the feet of female children does not exist to much extent among the farming classes, nor among boat-women—servants are often free from it. Fashion, however, still binds and shrivels the feet of the daughters of civilians, merchants, mechanics, and humble artizans; and when poverty is conjoined with disability for active labor, the wretched female becomes the subject of extreme suffering and degradation. Small feet are necessary to complete a Chinaman's idea of beauty; and consequently daughters can seldom be respectably married without being thus tortured and fettered. The daughters of the Manchu are never subjected to this practice.

The present Chinese custom of shaving the head, and allowing the hair on the crown to grow to an indefinite length, was forced upon them by the present dynasty, as a badge of subjection. What was then their shame is now their pride. The Chinese possess much corporeal vigor, can endure much toil, and a good proportion of them attain to old age. Though among the more respectable classes there is an excessive and favorite attention to ceremony, yet in general their minds and manners are gross, and their conversation indecent. Their Bacchanalian revels are frequent and noisy, accompanied with ingenious devices to excite them to the excessive use of intoxicating drinks. The refining influence of intelligent and virtuous female society is greatly needed.

Moral Condition.—Most of those vices which are known to exist among other heathen nations, prevail among the Chinese. The language of the Apostle in the 1st of Romans, is a faithful description of their character as a people. The Chinese are a nation of liars, and they are adepts in the arts of deception. They are also given to gambling, from the highest to the lowest. A great amount of spirituous liquor is drank in connection with their food, and on other occasions, but beastly intoxication is not common in open day.

Notwithstanding the rigid seclusion of the daughters of the Chinese, there are probably few countries in which prostitution is more common and public, or attended with less disgrace; to say nothing of the system of legalized concubinage.

The Opium Trade and Opium Smoking.—Of all the vices prevailing among the Chinese, the smoking of opium is the most destructive to property, health, and life. It appears to have been first brought to China by the Portuguese, as early as 1767. That year 1,000 chests were sold at Macao. The English East India Company commenced the importation of opium in 1673. In 1780, two receiving ships were stationed a little south of Macao, at Lark's Bay. As early as the year 1800, an Imperial edict was issued against its sale and use in China, in consequence of the disastrous effects of its use. In 1809, the Hong merchants were, by the government, compelled to give bonds that opium should be discharged from no vessel at Whampoa. But though steadily opposed by the supreme government of China, its subordinate agents, at the principal points on the coast, have never been proof against the seductive power of gold, and their own love of this poisonous drug; and with slight interruptions, this iniquitous and contraband trade has, till the present time, continued steadily to increase. The opium is chiefly of two kinds, Benares and Patna, produced with compulsory labor, by the East India Company, and sold at Calcutta; and the Malwa produced in a province in the western part of India, under the government of native princes, and sold at Bombay. It pays the Company a transit duty of 400 rupees per chest, the number of chests in 1846 being 25,000, and furnishing the government a net income of £1,000,000. In the same year, the income from the opium sold at Calcutta was £2,000,000, making a gross amount of income from this article of £3,000,000. In 1847, at Calcutta alone, the revenue from Opium, amounting to upwards of 31,000 chests, was £3,000,000. Most of the opium sold at these two ports, is exported to China, at an estimated profit of about 15 per cent. to the merchant. About 50 armed-vessels are constantly employed in this trade, including the large number of receiving ships, stationed at Lintin, below Canton, and at the mouths of most of the principal rivers, and in the vicinity of the most important cities along the coast to Shanghai, including Nomoa, Amoy, Chin-Chin, Fuhchau and Ningpo. These receiving ships are all abundantly supplied with opium, and attended with clippers constantly passing up and down the coast. Including the irregular craft, the number of foreign vessels employed in the opium trade must be much larger than has been mentioned. It is stated by Dr. Nathan Allen, in his valuable Essay on the Opium Trade, that Mr. Jardine, of the firm of Jardine, Matheson & Co., being about to return to England a few years since, divided with his partners £3,000,000, almost $15,000,000 of profit in trade, the greater portion of which had been accumulated in the space of ten years. Thus both the production and sale of opium are powerfully stimulated by the love of gain, regardless of the ruinous consequences of this trade. Notwithstanding the cupidity of all ranks of the imperial officers in the provinces, manifested in their readiness to receive bribes to allow the introduction and use of this drug, the government at Peking has been uniformly opposed to the trade. In 1839, just before the commencement of hostilities between England and China, upwards of 20,000 chests, valued at $12,000,000, having been delivered up to Commissioner Lin, at Canton, through his compulsory measures, were destroyed by command of the emperor. This remarkable act, committed as it was in the face of a threatened invasion, which soon actually followed, is sufficient evidence of the sincere opposition of the Chinese government to the opium trade. It has been computed that not less than 4,000,000 of the Chinese are habitual opium smokers, and that the average length of the lives of these wretched men, after becoming addicted to this habit, is not above ten years. On this calculation, 400,000 of the Chinese, in consequence of the use of opium, are annually hurried into the grave. On whose souls must the blood of these slaughtered multitudes rest? In the light of God's word, what a weight of criminal responsibility must press upon that company whose coffers are annually filled with the price of so much blood? And no less guilty are those who aid and abet it for the sake of gain. The emperor of China, when urged to increase his revenue, by legalizing the opium trade, replied: "It is true, I cannot prevent the introduction of the flowing poison; gain-seeking and corrupt men will, for profit and sensuality, defeat my wishes; but nothing will induce me to derive a revenue from the vice and misery of my people." A noble sentiment, worthy of a Christian mind! What a contrast to the practice of the East India Company, and its multitudes of nominally Christian coadjutors, in the sale of opium! Very naturally may the Chinese regard with abhorrence that religion which in their view tolerates, if not encourages, such iniquity. The use of it rapidly enervates, emaciates, and destroys the body, often speedily reducing the insatuated smoker to the appearance of a walking skeleton, and its effects upon the immortal mind are even more to be deplored, wasting its vigor and incapacitating it for powerful and continuous effort. The bodily and mental sufferings of the confirmed smoker are too great to be described. His state may be called one of living death. While he has the means of procuring wholesome food, the injurious effects of his indulgence are less powerful; but when, as a consequence of his excessive vice, he can no longer procure healthful aliment, and opium likewise fails him, then diarrhea comes, and often amid his own filth, and by the way side, the wretched man dies like a brute. On this subject the writer can speak from personal observation. The use of this drug turns out a numerous, miserable, and abandoned class of men, who subsist, while they have strength to move, by begging in the streets, a mere pittance, from shop to shop, and finally, in many cases, perish by the way side, without an eye to pity them or a hand to help. Numbers by the use of opium suddenly terminate their wretched lives, and rush, uncalled, into a miserable eternity. Multitudes of unhappy females in the same way wilfully destroy themselves, often as a consequence of the vices of their husbands. The misery which this drug introduces into families and communities, and the vice and crime of which it is the occasion, cannot be told. In the opinion of the Chinese there is little or no hope of the reformation of the opium smoker; and he himself, while he groans beneath his chains, and hates, with peculiar malignity, the instruments of his ruin, despairingly surrenders himself to his fate, having neither the physical nor the moral resolution to abandon the drug. Such is the almost hopeless condition of millions of the Chinese. The evil is constantly and rapidly increasing, and threatens, like a resistless flood, to overwhelm the empire. At a moderate calculation the first cost of opium to the Chinese is about $40,000,000 annually, most of which is paid in silver, though of late Chinese products have, to some extent, been taken in exchange. Opium and the implements used in smoking it are publicly sold, and the dens in which its victims congregate now need little concealment. The higher classes are much addicted to this vice. From careful and repeated inquiries of intelligent individuals, the writer is of the opinion that opium is used by more than one-half of the adult male population of Fuhchau. Probably the proportion is about the same at the other ports. But the first cost of opium to the Chinese is only a part of its actual expense. The officers must be bribed to wink at its sale; the native merchants must fill their coffers; and the preparers and retailers of the drug must all live by their iniquitous business. But the pecuniary loss, though enormous, weighs but a feather in comparison with the physical, social, and moral evils which result from the traffic. The example of Christian nations in obstinately perse vering in this trade, in opposition to national law, and in the face of these terrible evils, tends most powerfully to prejudice the Chinese against the glorious Gospel. The writer has had ample evidence of this fact in his experience as a missionary. Next to the deep corruption of the heart, the sale by foreigners and use by the Chinese of this drug, constitute the most formidable obstacle to the success of the Gospel in China. And yet there seems little hope of their emancipation from this evil, except through the power of Divine truth, accompanied by the Holy Spirit, rectifying public sentiment and purifying the heart. But if professedly Christian nations would arrest the sale, there would be much hope for the salvation of China. Such a course would, in the end, be an incalculable advantage to lawful commerce. Trade with China must ultimately be extensive and profitable, in proportion to the wealth and prosperity of the people, to which the use of opium is terribly ruinous. Commerce, humanity, religion, the good of the undying soul, all require its immediate suppression.

Female Infanticide in China.—Another of the crimes more or less prevailing among the Chinese is the unnatural one of female infanticide. This crime is known to a great extent to prevail in sections of the Fokien and Kwangtung provinces. The degree and extent of its prevalence in other parts of the empire is unknown; but considering the small degree of criminality which public opinion, in China, attaches to this practice, it may be expected to prevail elsewhere, under similar external circumstances. Rev. David Abel made particular inquiries on this subject in the vicinity of Amoy. In 40 towns and villages in the department of Tsienchau, he learned that on an average, about 40 per cent. of the girls born there, were murdered by their parents in infancy, and about one-fourth of those born in 17 towns in the department of Chiangchau. It is known to prevail in Fuhchau and vicinity. A country woman a few miles below the city, of her own accord, informed the writer and other friends that she had destroyed four daughters, as if the thing were common and innocent. Intelligent Chinese residing in Fuhchau, represent the practice as being very common in the neighboring villages. The unfeeling manner in which the matter is spoken of, gives us reason to suppose that the custom is general. It is probably more common among the poor than among the rich. Their sons they do not destroy, because they regard them as profitable to their parents. Poverty, the difficulty of rearing them, and the expenses of their marriage, are the more common reasons assigned for the destruction of their female infants. Mothers seem no less ready to strangle or drown their infant daughters, than fathers, perhaps anticipating their sufferings and future degradation if spared to live.

Religious Sects.—The principal religious sects in China are the Buddhists, the Taoists, and the Confucianists. The latter, however, hardly merits the name of a religious association. Buddhism does not exist in China in its purest form, as in Siam and Burmah; but among the people it is combined with the early superstitions of the Chinese. It was introduced in the year of our Lord 66, through an imperial embassy sent westward in search of a sage, who had appeared or was expected soon to appear. In Hindostan they met with the Buddhists, and returned to the emperor with several priests, and with some of the books and relics of that sect, and from that time Buddhism spread rapidly in China, through the means of its books and the conformity of its priests to the popular idolatry. The opinions of this sect are widely prevalent in China, and their temples and monasteries abound; although few of the people are its professed devotees. Their priests are employed at funerals, and in seasons of public calamity, and have much influence over the popular mind. They derive their maintenance partly from presents and partly from the cultivation of the lands appropriated to their monasteries, many of which are liberally endowed.

Tauists.—The sect of the Tauists, or Rationalists of China, claim as their founder, Laotse, or Laukiun, born B. C. 604, in the province of Hupch, and is believed by his followers to have been carried in the womb 80 years, and to have been born with white hair and white eye-brows. He is represented to have been of humble parentage, a diligent and successful student in historical and sacred lore and to have traveled through Central Asia. His Memoir on Reason and Virtue is his only philosophical work. In his doctrines, he is said to resemble Zeno, recommending retirement and meditation as the principal means for the purification of the soul, and restoring it to the bosom of the supreme Reason, from which all material, visible forms are said, by him, to be emanations. In one section he says, "All the visible parts of the universe, all beings composing it, the heavens and all the stellar systems, all have been formed of the first elementary matter; before the birth of heaven and earth, there existed only an immense silence in illimitable space, an immeasurable void in endless silence. Reason alone circulated in this infinite void and silence." He regards all good beings as emanating from, and returning again into the bosom of Reason, there to dwell forever: but the bad are to be subjected to successive births, with their accompanying miseries. Mixed with these ideas, there is much confused speculation. In his language there is somewhat to remind us of the actual creation of the world by the eternal Word, but neither he nor any of the pagan philosophers by their reasonings attained to clear ideas of the Great First Cause. He lived an ascetic life, and en joined contemplation united with good deeds. In his writings are many excellent sayings. Laukiun's followers believe him to have been an impersonation of Tau or Reason, the last of three incarnations having been A. D. 623. The Tauist sect is made up of priests, who with their families, live in the temples, and are supported by the cultivation of the grounds belonging to these establishments, the sale of charms and nostrums, and by presents received from the people on funeral and other occasions. They shave the sides of their heads, and coil the remainder of the hair on the crown, and wear slate-colored robes. They study astrology, profess to deal with spirits, pretend to have found a liquor, the drinking of which will insure immortality. Some of the emperors are reported to have tried it to their cost. By some of the emperors this sect has been much honored. A splendid temple was erected to Laukiun containing his statue, and in A. D. 674 literary examinations were ordered to be held in his Memoir on Reason. The Tauists are now extensively regarded as cheats and jugglers. The ceremony of running through the fire is still observed by them and by their deluded followers, both of whom are at times severely burned. They worship a great number of idols, and are very superstitious. Probably Pantheism is the prolific mother of their idols.

Confucianism.—The Confucianists are the literary men of China. They have no distinct religious system, except such as is comprehended in the worship of Confucius, and the reverence of his doctrines. Confucius said little on religious subjects; his instructions being political in their bearing, attaching great importance to ceremonies in social and official intercourse, and in conjunction with the worship of the dead. There is much reason to doubt whether Confucius had any distinct idea of an almighty, spiritual Intelligence, distinct from the material universe. An intelligent agency is however allowed by him and his followers to exist in the persons of the sages, who, from time to time, have risen up to expound the will of heaven and earth, the male and female powers of nature; and with them they form a trinity. They sometimes seem to be placed on an equality with heaven itself. The most renowned of these sages are Yau and Shun, two ancient emperors, and Confucius, the instructor of 10,000 ages, to whom, according to the Chinese Repository, there are, in connection with the examination halls, 1560 temples dedicated. In these temples are offered tens of thousands of pigs, rabbits, sheep, and deer, and 27,000 pieces of silk; all of which are appropriated by the worshipers. His followers are regarded as materialists or atheists; yet they conform to the popular idolatry, and probably, in fact, differ not much from the multitude, in their religious sympathies.

In the Confucian system, a holy life is not enforced by future sanctions, and the duty of man to his Maker is entirely unnoticed. Dr. Bridgman expresses the opinion decidedly that the Chinese pay divine honors to Confucius. He says: "In their moral codes and in their religious systems, the Chinese place Confucius in the highest rank, and give to him the highest honors. There is in each one, of all the fifteen hundred and odd districts of the Empire, a temple dedicated to him. There twice annually, once in spring, and once in autumn, the local magistrates, as priests, must enter and offer to him, to the sage Confucius, prayers and sacrifices. On one of those occasions, in the city of Shanghai, I was, with other missionaries, an eye-witness of these solemnities. A bullock, pigs and goats, and many other offerings were all duly prepared and laid before the altar; and then the magistrates, in their robes of state, officiated as priests, kneeling, prostrating themselves, and offering prayers. Thus, in their official stations, clothed with authority, they go forth in public and lead on these devotions; offering to a mortal man that worship which is due only to Jehovah. The Emperor, his ministers of highest rank, and all his representatives, "the shepherds of the whole flock in all the Empire," engage in these acts of devotion, doing honor to Confucius, not as a mere man, but as a god. As they honor Heaven and Earth, so they honor this man!"

The ancient popular idolatry of China.—Before Confucius's day, there prevailed a popular idolatry in which ancestral worship was prominent. To no other form of idolatry are the Chinese more attached at the present day, and in no other worship are they more serious. How much of the nature of divinity they attach to the deified spirits of their progenitors, it is difficult to decide; but on the pantheistic principle, so prevalent in the eastern world, they may legitimately regard the authors of their existence as constituting a part of the divine essence, and worship them as such. This principle lays an indefinitely broad foundation for polytheism. Everything mysterious and spiritual seems in their view to partake of the divine, and hence, shin, not a very uncommon term for spirit, is the generic name of all their objects of religious worship, and as corresponding to theos and theoi, the Greek terms for God and gods, in English, has been preferred by the majority of Protestant missionaries in China, as the word to be used in the translation of the Scriptures, for both the true God and for false gods. In the worship of ancestors, all the pagan sects unite, and it was tolerated by the Jesuits in their Chinese converts.

Besides the worship of ancestors, the Chinese have innumerable other objects of religious reverence, as the god of wealth, the patron deities of the various professions, and the gods and goddesses of the sea, hills, rivers, and other localities. From the common practice among the people of appealing to heaven in their oaths, they would seem to have an idea, though doubtless a confused one, of some superior power, more to be feared than their common objects of worship; but how much the different deities or powers of nature, on the pantheistic principle, are in their minds associated and blended, it is difficult to determine. The God in whose hand their breath is, they do not honor. Their motives to religious worship seem to be chiefly to avoid temporal calamities, and procure temporal blessings; and to this end they offer their prayers and sacrifices to their innumerable local deities. With regard to the destiny of their souls, they seem to allow themselves no great anxiety, except so far as they imagine their future happiness to be dependent upon the worship to be rendered them by their descendants after their decease. The Chinese regard it as among the greatest of calamities to die without any sons to perpetuate their name and make offerings to their spirits, at their graves. Their fears are to a great extent imaginary, and their hopes are shrouded in the gloom of a dark and doubtful futurity. Like the ancient heathen, they are led away by dumb idols, and yield themselves to the guidance of the prince of the power of the air, the Spirit that worketh in the children of disobedience.

MISSIONS.

NESTORIAN MISSIONS.—The Nestorians, at an early period, appear to have established Christian missions in China, though few or no traces of their labors are now known to remain. Arnobius, in the third century, mentions the Ceres, as Christians, whom Mosheim regards as Chinese. The Nestorian patriarchs are said in the fifth century to have sent metropolitans into China, thus indicating the long existence of Christian churches in the empire. Between A. D. 636 and 781, no less than seventy Nestorian missionaries, whose names are preserved, labored in that empire, among whom Olopun, the earliest of the number, was especially distinguished. The record discovered by the Jesuit missionaries, in 1625, in Singanfoo, in Shensi, is the most celebrated monument of the zeal of the Nestorians in China. This record is engraven on a stone tablet, and Mosheim regards it as genuine. It purports to have been erected in A. D. 781, in the second year of Kienchung, the ninth emperor of the Tang dynasty; Kingtsing, a priest from the church in Tatsing (India) being the author of the preface to the proclamation issued by the emperor Taitsung, in favor of Christianity. This proclamation is dated in the 12th year of his reign, corresponding to the year of our Lord 639. The preface gives the history of the Nestorian missions in China, for 145 years, from A. D. 636 to 781. It eulogizes the emperors who reigned during this period, and recounts their efforts in favor of Christianity, in the building of churches in numerous cities; honoring the ministers of religion, among whom Olopun, who arrived in 696, was raised to the rank of high-priest and national protector. Some of the emperors of this period, however, seem not to have patronised Christianity. One or more persecutions were raised by the Buddhists and literati, and the churches were allowed to go to decay. But in the mean time among the priests there were able defenders of the Gospel. Making all due allowance for the inflated language of this document, it seems probable that there were at this time, Christian churches in the chief cities of the empire. A translation of the Scriptures is said to have been in the library of the palace. The statements contained in this inscription respecting India are glaringly incorrect. The Nestorians, moreover, are represented as using images and praying for the dead—whereas they abhor image worship; and Christ is spoken of as having succored the confined spirits. It is possible, however, that the word translated images, may have some other signification. But, however this may be, it is evident, from other sources, that there were Nestorian churches in China at this time. The patriarch Salibazacha is reported to have sent a metropolitan to China, in 714. Timotheus, who appears to have been the Nestorian patriarch upwards of forty years, was zealously devoted to Christian missions. During his patriarchate, Sabchaljune, a learned monk, from the convent of Beth-oben, after having been ordained bishop, and successfully preaching the Gospel on the eastern shores of the Caspian sea, penetrated China, and there extensively published the word. On his return to Syria he was murdered by barbarians. Others soon followed him to the Chinese. Christians were found in Southern China in the ninth century, by two Arabian travelers, and many Jews, Mohammedans, Persians, and Christians, in A. D. 877, are said to have been massacred in Canton by one Baichu, who had revolted from the emperor. In A. D. 845, Wutsung ordered 3,000 priests from Ta-tsin, to retire to private life. Marco Polo, a distinguished Venetian, who visited China about the middle of the thirteenth century, and there spent more than twenty years, for a time holding a high office in Chih-Kiang, under Kublai Khan, often speaks of meeting with the Nestorian Christians in Tartary and China. In the eleventh century the missionary zeal of the Nestorians was stimulated by the remarkable conversion of a Mogul prince, called after his baptism Prester John, whose subjects, 200,000 in number, became nominal Christians. His domains are supposed to have been on the northern borders of China Proper. His descendants, for several generations, were renowned for their military achievements, and the third in succession as conqueror on the fields of Transoxonia and Persia. The last of this race of Christian kings was slain by Gengis Khan, about 1202. The victorious arms of the Mohammedan princes, about the beginning of the fifteenth century, overran the regions in which Nestorian missions had been planted, to the coast of the Caspian sea, and the expulsion of the Monguls from China, in 1369, by the Ming dynasty, probably nearly extirpated the surviving Nestorians in this land. Assyria and Persia have, since the tenth century, been ruled by the followers of Mohammed. Christians in those countries have been bitterly harrassed; and the Nestorians, from being a numerous and powerful community, are now few and despised. Their missions are no more. No Nestorian churches, and no copies of the Scriptures translated by them into Chinese, or any books of theirs, are known to exist in China. Yet it is to be hoped that many souls may have been saved, by means of their missions. There may have been much admixture of error in their teachings; but we have reason to believe that the flickering flame of true piety lingered much longer with them than with any other of the ancient Christian sects. (See Nestorians.)

PAPAL MISSIONS.—The Roman Catholic Missions in China began in the 13th century. An interesting account of them is given in Williams's Middle Kingdom, to which we are chiefly indebted for the following facts. John de Monte Corvino went to China by the way of India, and was kindly received by the emperor Kublai Khan. At Cambalu, the present Peking, he built a church, and in eleven years is said to have baptized nearly 6000 persons, and purchased 150 children, whom he taught Greek and Latin, and for whom he composed devotional works. His success procured him the office of archbishop from Clement V. in 1307, with seven assistant suffragan bishops. He died in 1330. In 1336 he was succeeded by Nicholas de Benra, with 26 assistant missionary laborers. Corvino in one of his letters speaks of having translated the New Testament and the Psalms into the Tartar language. These missionaries appear to have labored chiefly among the Monguls, and their subsequent expulsion from China by the Ming Dynasty, was accompanied by the annihilation of Christianity among them. For upwards of 200 years between the rise of the Ming Dynasty, in 1368, and the arrival of Ricci, in Canton, in 1581, we hear little respecting either the Nestorians or Catholics. From the commencement of Ricci's labors to the death of Yunching, in 1736, is a highly interesting period of Papal missionary history in China. Ricci and his associate Ruggiero were much opposed by the government, and attempted the concealment of their real intention, by affirming that their only wish was the acquisition of the Chinese language, arts, and sciences of the country. Ricci was finally allowed to reside at Shanchau-foo, where, habited as a Buddhist priest, he remained for some years, ingratiating himself by his courtesy, presents, and scientific attainments, though his doctrines were opposed by the Confucianists and suspicious magistrates. He and his associates subsequently adopted the dress of the literati, left Shanchau, and after temporary residences in Nanchang, Suchau, and Nanking, he was admitted into Peking in 1601, and courteously treated by the emperor Wanleigh. Other Jesuits joined him, and under his direction successfully prosecuted their work. Ricci's manners, acquirements, and liberal presents, gained him the favor of men in authority, some of whom he ere long numbered as converts. Among these, Siu, baptized Paul, a native of Shanguai, was an early, and very efficient coöperator. His daughter, named Candida, was an illustrious and able coadjutor in the missionary work. But among the imperial officers there were powerful opposers, and in 1617 the missionaries were ordered to leave the country. They, however, maintained their position, and by the year 1636, had published 340 treatises, some religious, but mostly scientific. Ricci, the superior of all the missions, among his published rules, allowed to the converts the practice of ancestral worship, regarding these rites as merely civil in their nature. This subject subsequently became a bone of contention between the Jesuits and the Franciscans, and the source of much alarm to the Chinese. Ricci died in 1610, at the age of 80 years. By the Jesuits, he has been greatly extolled for his virtues; and by others maligned. A Catholic author thus speaks of him, "The kings found in him a man full of complaisance; the pagans, a minister who accommodated himself to their superstitions; the mandarins, a polite courtier, skilled in all the trickery of courts; and the devil a faithful servant, who, far from destroying, established his reign among the people, and even extended it to the Christians." After his death, the work prospered under the patronage of Paul Siu, who in 1622, obtained the repeal of the edict of expulsion, and arrested the persecution. Schaal, a German Jesuit, recommended to the emperor Siu in 1628, by his great attainments, secured imperial honor and authority among his brethren. During the bloody commotions intervening between the decline of the Ming dynasty, and the firm establishment of the Manchus on the throne, lasting about 30 years, the missions suffered much. In this contest the northern missionaries sided with the Manchus, while the Romish missionaries at the south favored Tunglieh, the surviving claimant to the throne of the fallen Ming Dynasty, in whose family were some distinguished converts, and whose troops were led by two Christian Chinese officers, Thomas Kiu, and Luke Chin. During the reign of Shunchi, Schaal and his coadjutors were honored, and converts were multiplied in the provinces; but the regents into whose hands the government fell at his death in 1661, issued a decree that Schaal and his associates merited the punishment of seducers, who announce to the people false and pernicious doctrines. Schaal, though tutor to the young emperor Kanghe, was proscribed and degraded, and in the following year died of grief, aged 78 years. Verbiest, the next most distinguished of the missionaries, was with others imprisoned, and numbers were banished from the country. On Kanghe's assuming the reins of government in 1671, then but 8 years of age, he released Verbiest, to appoint him his astronomer in place of Schaal, and allowed the missionaries to return to their stations, though he forbade his subjects embracing Christianity. The missionaries requited the kindness of the emperor, not only by their scientific labors, but by casting cannon for his army. In 1636 Schaal cast some for Shenchu, and Onbiest cast the total number of 450 pieces, more than 300 of which he blessed and called after the names of different saints. On the arrival in China while Ricci was yet living, of the Franciscan and Dominican orders, a violent dispute arose between them and the Jesuits, regarding ancestral worship, and the proper term in Chinese for God, which continued into the reign of the successor of Kanghe, and was referred to the emperor himself and to the decision of Popes Innocent X., Alexander VII., and Clement XI., whose successive decrees nullified each other. The final decision, however, was adverse to the Jesuits, establishing Thien Chu, as the term for God, and forbidding the practice of the ancestral rites to the Chinese converts. The spirit with which these disputes were conducted, the pomp and arrogance of the priests, and the interference of the popes with the laws of the realm regarding its rites and ceremonies, at length aroused the jealousy of the government, and awakened a determined and bitter opposition, manifesting itself in a succession of persecuting edicts. Kanghe would not allow the Pope the right to legislate over his subjects, and in 1706 decreed to countenance only those missionaries who preached the doctrines of Ricci.

In 1718, he decreed that no missionary should remain in the country without his permission, given only after the promise to follow the rules of Ricci; and yet no missionary could leave for China without the most solemn promise to follow the instructions of Clement XI., respecting these ceremonies. Kanghe's policy was to restrain the missionaries, and keep them about him at court, while he allowed the work of persecution in the provinces. After the death of Kanghe, in 1723, the hostility of the government to the missionaries increased, and the Catholic faith was strictly prohibited, except the few wanted at Peking for scientific purposes. The missionaries were all ordered to leave the country, and more than 300,000 converts were left without teachers. Some missionaries secreted themselves, and others, after reaching Canton, contrived to return to their flocks, who were every where subjected to severe persecutions. Since that time they have seldom been free from persecution.

The character of the Catholic missionaries may be seen from the following remarks of Ripa, one of their missionaries at Peking:—"The diffusion of our holy religion in these parts, has been almost entirely owing to the catechists, who are in their service, to other Christians, or to the distribution of books in the Chinese language. There is scarcely a single missionary who can boast of having made a convert by his own preaching; for they merely baptize those who have been already converted by others. He even adds, that up to his time, in 1714, none of the missionaries had been able to surmount the language, so as to make themselves understood by the people at large."

Between 1580 and 1724, about 500 missionaries had been sent out. The empire is partitioned into Bishoprics, and Vicariates, divided between the Portuguese, the Spanish Dominicans, the Lazarists, the French Society, whose missionaries are mostly Jesuits, and the Propaganda, whose missionaries are principally Italians. The summary for 1846 gives 12 bishops, and 7 or 8 coadjutors, about 80 foreign missionaries, 90 native priests, and about 400,000 converts. The schools are not given. There are six colleges for educating native priests, including that at Naples. The above statistics are the latest we have found. Undoubtedly the number of Catholic missionaries has greatly increased in China since 1846. In the report of the Lazarist missions in the empire in 1849, found in the Annals of the Faith, including Macao, the Vicariates of Honan, Kiangsi, Chihkiang, Mongul Tartary, Eastern Thibet, and the diocese of Peking, there are stated to be 33 European priests, 45 auxiliary priests, 6 nunneries for the education of native clergy, 50 schools for both sexes, and a total of about 50,000 neophytes. If the other bishoprics have increased in the same ratio as the Lazarists, within the last few years, the estimate for 1846 must be much below the present numbers.

The Catholic church requires no evidence of spiritual regeneration, as a condition of baptism; but this ordinance is itself regarded as producing this great change. They attach the greatest importance to the baptism of the dying children of the heathen, and make this a distinct department of their missionary work. Statements are annually made to their societies of the number of dying and other infants of the pagans baptized. "The agents in this work," says Verolles, "are usually elderly women, who have experience in infantile diseases. Furnished with innocent pills, and a bottle of holy water, whose virtues they extol, they introduce themselves into the houses where there are sick infants, and discover whether they are in danger of death, and in this case, they inform the parents, and tell them that before administering other remedies, they must wash their hands with the purifying waters of their bottle. The parents, not suspecting this pious ruse, readily consent, and by these innocent frauds, we procure in our mission the baptism of 7 or 8,000 infants every year." One missionary speaks of the employment of the sponge for this purpose, to whose use the Chinese were led to attach peculiar medicinal virtue, and consequently were much delighted to have their sick children washed, that is, baptized with it. The preaching of the Gospel is regarded as a secondary matter, their work being, to a large extent, ceremonial. We hear little of them as preachers, this work being entrusted to their native assistants. The word of life is never distributed; for its influence is feared.

PROTESTANT MISSIONS.—The first efforts of the Protestant churches for the salvation of the Chinese were chiefly directed to the Chinese emigrants in the Indian Archipelago and Siam, with a view to the ultimate spiritual regeneration of China itself. It was hoped that laborers might thus be raised up who should become the ministers of mercy to their own people. To some extent these hopes were realized. And when China was opened partially to the Gospel, some who had been laboring and praying for China's perishing millions, were prepared to enter into this great field; but others had already entered into their rest.

LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—The operations of this society in China were commenced in 1807. The subject had been under consideration for a considerable time previous; their first object being to secure a faithful translation of the Scriptures into Chinese. Their first missionary was Rev. Robert Morrison, who may be regarded under God as the father of Protestant missions in China. By talent, education, and piety, he was peculiarly fitted for the post. Having been engaged for some time previous in the study of Chinese, under the instruction of a learned native then in England, he embarked in January, 1807, going by the way of New York, and while in the United States, he received from Mr. Madison, then Secretary of State, a letter of introduction to our consul at Canton, from which he subsequently derived much advantage. On his arrival in Canton, he devoted himself to study, at first occupying a retired room, eating and dressing like the Chinese, and having little intercourse, except with the natives in his service, with whom he held a religious service in private. He subsequently deemed it wise to throw off the Chinese costume. He hired apartments in a factory, and through Sir George Stanton, formed an advantageous acquaintance with Mr. Roberts, the chief of the Company's factory at Canton. Near the close of 1808, he was married to Miss Morton, daughter of John Morton, Esq., and on the day of his marriage, was appointed translator to the Company's factory at Canton, with a salary which rendered him independent of the society's funds. This appointment greatly aided him in his great object of translating the Scriptures, and preparing a dictionary and elementary books in Chinese. In this work, he was much assisted by a manuscript Latin and Chinese Dictionary, furnished him by the Royal Asiatic Society, a Harmony of the Gospels, and the Pauline Epistles in Chinese, the work of some unknown hand, and a copy of the Acts of the Apostles in Chinese, which he brought out with him. He also acknowledges valuable aid from an Exposition of the Decalogue, in three volumes, furnished him by a native Roman Catholic convert. Sam Tok, the Chinese with whom he studied in London, continued to be a valuable assistant. At the close of 1808, he writes to the directors:—"The grammar is prepared for the press, and the dictionary is filling up. The manuscript of the New Testament is in part fit to be printed." His revision of the Acts of the Apostles was printed in 1810, being the first portion of the Scriptures in Chinese printed by any Protestant missionary. His Chinese grammar was printed at Serampore in 1815, at the expense of the East India Company. The Gospel of Luke was published in 1812.

About this time, an edict was issued by the Chinese government, prohibiting the printing of religious books, and the preaching of the Gospel, followed with acts of persecution; but Mr. Morrison unobtrusively continued his work, and in the same year the directors sent out Mr. Milne, as his fellow-laborer. In July, 1813, he reached Macao, but was allowed to remain there only 10 days. The following five months he spent at Canton, in the study of the language. In February, 1814, he left for a tour in the Indian Archipelago, taking with him 2,000 Testaments, 10,000 tracts, and 5,000 catechisms.

In his letter of January 11, 1814, communicating to the Society the fact of the completion of the New Testament, Mr. Morrison remarks, "I give this to the world, not as a perfect translation. I have done my best; it only remains, that I commit it by prayer to Divine blessing. The Gospels, the closing Epistles, and the Book of Revelation are entirely my own translating." For the middle part of the volume he acknowledges his obligations to the labors of some unknown individual. During this year the Company testified their value of Mr. Morrison's Dictionary by furnishing an experienced printer, Mr. P. P. Thoms, with the necessary apparatus for printing the work. In 1814 Mr. Morrison baptized the first Chinese convert to Protestant Christianity, Tsae A-ko, aged 27, after much instruction, long trial, and a full confession of his faith in the Lord Jesus. This was done, to use Mr. Morrison's own words, "at a spring of water issuing from the foot of a lofty hill, by the sea-side, away from human observation." He continued steadfast in his Christian profession till his death, in 1818. Mr. Milne rejoined Mr. Morrison September 27, after his return from his tour in the Archipelago. In one year, after entering the missionary field, he published a farewell address to the Chinese in the Archipelago, a singular instance of linguistic proficiency. In January, 1816, Mr. Milne went to Penang, and while there obtained from the government land for a missionary establishment at Malacca, which latter place became the permanent field of his missionary labors, where he afterwards became the head of an Anglo-Chinese college, founded in part by the liberality of Dr. Morrison.

On the 7th of July, 1816, Mr. Morrison and Lord Amherst visited Peking; which visit furnished a good opportunity of obtaining information respecting the country and its different dialects. In 1817, he was honored by the University of Glasgow with the title of D. D.; and during this year he published his "View of China for Philological Purposes," and a "Chinese translation of the Morning and Evening Prayers of the Church of England." In the translation of the Old Testament he chose the Pentateuch, the Psalms, and the Prophetical books, and Dr. Milne the remainder.

In November, 1818, the entire Bible was completed, and published, by the joint labors of Morrison and Milne, a glorious work, which the Catholic missionaries in China have not yet executed, notwithstanding they boast of about 400,000 converts. Dr. Morrison also published other smaller works. The British and Foreign Bible Society, during his lifetime gave at different times the aggregate sum of £5000 for the printing of the Chinese Scriptures, and £400 were for the same object collected in the United States. In his translation of the Scriptures, he did not adopt an elevated and recondite style, intelligible only to the highly educated; but he chose language plain and simple, suited to the comprehension of the common people. He says, "In my translation I have studied fidelity, perspicuity, and simplicity. I have preferred common words to classical ones; and would rather be deemed inelegant, than hard to be understood. To the task I have brought patient endurance of labor and seclusion from society, a calm and unprejudiced judgment, and, I hope, an accurate mode of thinking. With a reverential sense of the awful responsibility of misrepresenting God's word, I have made no departure in any sensible degree from the sense of the English Version; and have not affected to make a new translation, or an improved version, immediately and solely from the original."

Those who have thoroughly tested Morrison's translation, as the writer has done, by reading it extensively with Chinese of different degrees of literary attainment, can hardly deny its general perspicuity; and as to its fidelity, it has not probably been surpassed by any succeeding Chinese version of the Scriptures. His style is not pleasing to Chinese scholars, preferring, as they do, the terse and recondite, unintelligible to ordinary readers. His principal fault consisted in the use of too many connective particles, giving to his composition an unnecessary verbosity. Fewer words might have been used, and the meaning of the Spirit have been made equally clear.

In 1821, Dr. Morrison was bereaved of his wife, who died of the cholera in the sweet hope of heaven. This year his valuable Dictionary was completed. As a Chinese lexicographer he performed an invaluable service to commerce and Christian missions; and his name deserves to be held in grateful and honored remembrance. His Dictionary was published by the East India Company at the expense of £15,000.

In 1824, Dr. Morrison returned to England, after 17 years of severe missionary toil, and was there received with distinguished honor. After his marriage to Miss Armstrong of Liverpool, they embarked in May, 1826, and arrived at Macao on the 19th of Sept. following.

Leang Afa, a distinguished Chinese convert, baptized by Dr. Milne, and ordained by Dr. Morrison before he sailed for England, deserves a brief notice. He is the author of several valuable tracts, and has distinguished himself by his usefulness to individuals, several of whom he has baptized, and likewise by his zeal and boldness in the preaching of the Gospel and in the distribution of books at the literary examinations. In Aug. 1834, the rage of the mandarins was excited against him. Two of his friends were seized, and one of them was cruelly beaten because he refused to betray Afa's concealment; and he himself, with great difficulty escaped to Macao, and was taken on board one of the English ships at Lintin.

One of the tracts distributed on this occasion fell into the hands of the distinguished leader of the insurgents, and was the foundation of his earliest Christian impressions. Afa has ever remained steadfast in his Christian profession, and continued to be a diligent preacher of the word.

Dr. Morrison's health was not vigorous after his return to China; yet he conducted religious services on the Sabbath, often both in English and Chinese, and prepared tracts for distribution. About this time, he had the satisfaction to baptize Choo-Tsing, a Chinese teacher once employed at the Malacca college. In 1832 he writes, "I have been 25 years in China, and am now beginning to see the work prosper.

By the press, we have been able to scatter knowledge far and wide." The following year he and his assistants, Afa and Agang, were diligent in scattering the word of life; 60,000 sheet tracts, and 10,000 copies of prayers and hymns having been printed, and most of them distributed, partly among the students at the literary examinations. Though feeble, he continued his work in the absence of his family, who had sailed for England. On the 1st of Aug., 1834, this devoted missionary was suddenly called from his earthly labors to his home in heaven, having continued his Chinese services with his domestics to the close of his life. His last service was characterized by much holy ardor. His remains were taken to Macao for interment. China shall yet rise up and call him blessed. By his decease, the mission was left without any one to look after the few who had been brought under Christian instruction, and who were dispersed by the persecution which broke out shortly after his death. In 1835, Rev. W. H. Medhurst and Rev. Edwin Stevens arrived in China, but nothing permanent was done by this Society, in Canton, for 14 years after the death of Dr. Morrison. In Feb. 1848, Benjamin Hobson, D. D., a missionary of the Society, secured an eligible position some distance above the foreign factories, on the margin of the river. He met with a kind reception in the neighborhood, and the patients who visited him three times a week, numbered from 100 to 150, and were attentive to the preaching of the word by Afa, followed by remarks from himself. The Sabbath was reserved for special religious services, in which Afa was a bold and faithful preacher. The reports of this mission, from year to year, down to 1853, represent it as continuing a steady and encouraging course of Christian effort in the way of medical and surgical aid to the sick, accompanied with the teaching and preaching of the word of life by the venerable Afa and Dr. Hobson, assisted by Lau Ting Shen, agent of the Religious Tract Society. The number of hospital patients for 1852 and 1853 was 44,366. Four weekly services were held with the patients. Between 70 and 80 usually attended the public services, conducted alternately by Afa and Dr. Hobson. In 1853, there were 11 church members, and 5 native agents. Dr. Hobson remarks, "With respect to any visible effects upon the heart and conscience of our hearers and readers, inducing them to seek salvation from the wrath to come, we are still very much in the same position as when the missionary hospital was opened here five years ago." Yet he believes that favorable impressions, with regard to the Gospel, are manifesting themselves. Systematic opposition to its truths is decidedly diminishing, and its teachers are treated with more respect by the rude and turbulent surrounding population. In 1852 he published a valuable work on the Elements of Physiological Science and Anatomy, which has been read with interest by the Chinese.

Hong-Kong.—Soon after the termination of hostilities between England and China, the Directors of the London Missionary Society decided on the relinquishment of their missions in the Archipelago, and concentrating their efforts for the Chinese in China itself. Instructions were accordingly given to their Chinese missionaries to meet in Hong-Kong, to consider the plan of future operations. This meeting was held in August, 1843, at which were present Messrs. Medhurst, Legge, Milne, Hobson, J. and A. Stronach, S. Dyer, and the Hon. J. R. Morrison. Agreeably to the recommendation of this committee, the society resolved on converting the Anglo-Chinese College in Malacca into a Theological Seminary, for the training of a native ministry for China, selected Hong-Kong for the seat of this Institution, and appointed Rev. James Legge as its superintendent. Rev. Dr. Legge and family arrived in Hong-Kong on the 10th of August, accompanied by three promising native Chinese Christians from Malacca. The printing apparatus, and other moveable property at Malacca, were soon transferred to Hong-Kong. A medical establishment was also opened in connection with the mission, by Dr. Benjamin Hobson, who, since 1848, has been assisted by the Canton Medical Missionary Society. Agong and Chin Seen, who came with Dr. Legge from Malacca, and Leang Afa, preached in the hospital, and in other parts of the settlement with much encouragement. The report for May, 1845, gives a cheering view of the mission. During the year, the native evangelists had been diligent in preaching the Gospel to large and attentive congregations in the Chinese part of the settlement. Rev. William Gillespie arrived there July, 1844. Ground for a missionary establishment had been obtained, convenient to the Chinese population, and the requisite buildings erected thereon, and the foreign residents in Hong-Kong had liberally responded to an appeal for the erection of a chapel for English and Chinese worship, called the Union Chapel. In June, 1846, two aged Chinese were received into the Mission Church, and on that occasion seven Chinese surrounded the table of the Lord. Chin Seen, who had long enjoyed the care and instructions of Dr. Legge, was ordained to the Gospel ministry. Dr. Hobson had previously been obliged to leave for England on account of the health of his wife. She expired on the borders of her native land. During his absence he was married to a daughter of the Rev. Dr. Morrison, and on the 10th of March, 1847, embarked the second time for the East, together with J. H. Herschberg, M. D., subsequently medical missionary at Hong-Kong. Rev. Dr. Legge, by reason of ill-health, returned home in 1846, accompanied by three intelligent Chinese youth, who, during their stay in England, were there baptized by him in the presence of the great congregation. These young men were natives of Malacca, and were baptized in the church in which Dr. Milne, the President of the Malacca College, used to worship. It was a thrilling scene. After Dr. Legge's return to Hong-Kong, he mentions, under date of November, 1848, the reception of an aged Chinese, and three young men of much promise, into the church. The latter were members of his seminary. Their names were A-chiong, Ach'heong and A-King. Thirteen others, including three seminarists, were also applicants for baptism. In 1850, he had four candidates for the ministry under his instruction, besides the oversight of a male boarding school of 30 pupils, and the stated preaching of the Gospel in the Union Chapel. The native church, under the pastoral care of Chin Seen, then numbered upwards of 20 members, and the Bazar Chapel, in which he preached, was filled with attentive hearers. During the year, six members had been added to the native church, one of whom was a man of talent and highly educated. It is remarked, that for one candidate received, the missionaries were compelled to decline many. The Magazine and Chronicle for June, 1850, contains an extract of a letter from Dr. Herschberg, giving a cheering account of the influence of his hospital, from which it appears to have been the birth-place of some precious souls. His average daily patients were between 50 and 60, and in connection with the medical practice, about 100 daily heard the Gospel.

In their annual view of their Chinese Missions for 1851, the directors remark: "It is therefore with peculiar satisfaction that the directors report that the New Testament thoroughly and carefully revised, principally by our missionaries at Shanghai, has been printed in that city, and also at Hong-Kong." By the introduction of metal type of reduced size, and of beautiful form, for which we are indebted mainly to the patient labors of Mr. Richard Cole, the Scriptures in Chinese can now be printed in a small volume, and at a greatly reduced price. According to this report, there were then in the school at Hong-Kong, under the superintendence of Dr. and Mrs. Legge, 40 boys and 20 girls, all domesticated amidst the habits and enjoyments of a Christian family, and carefully instructed in the several branches, both of useful and Christian knowledge. In the theological class were five young men. Since the opening of Dr. Herschberg's Hospital, in September, 1849, 3,066 patients had been relieved. The report of 1853, represents the missionary operations at Hong-Kong, as being in a prosperous state, though, in October, 1852, the mission was afflicted by the sudden death of Mrs. Legge, leaving three children and an afflicted husband, to mourn her departure. The number of church members was then 24, male pupils in the boarding school, 45, and 10 girls. In this mission is one of the most valuable printing establishments in China.

The London Society's mission at Shanghai was commenced by Messrs. Medhurst and Lockhart in December, 1843, with encouraging prospects. It was the earliest Protestant mission in that city. Dr. Lockhart, under date of Feb. 1, 1845, states the number of his patients, since the preceding February, to have been 10,600, to whom Mr. Medhurst preached three times a week, and distributed tracts to readers. At his house he had attentive congregations. In the surrounding villages, as far distant as 15 miles from the city, they had preached and distributed tracts, and had been invited to large towns 25 miles distant. In March of the same year, two interesting inquirers are mentioned, and subscriptions to the amount of $1,000 for a Union Chapel by the foreign residents in the city, designed for English and Chinese worship. An English service on Sabbath morning was held in the Consulate, and there was weekly preaching in a Chinese temple. Mr. Medhurst's valuable printing establishment at Batavia was brought to Shanghai, and now began to be employed in the printing of weekly sermons, and other publications. Opposition from the numerous Catholics at Shanghai began to appear. A later communication remarks, "Our sanctuary was opened on the 24th of August, (1846,) when every part of it was crowded with hearers, who listened attentively to the preached word. Since that time, divine service has been continued therein every Sunday afternoon, attended by crowded congregations, who come regularly and sit quietly to the end." At the meeting of the Society in May, 1847, it was reported that three Chinese had already been baptized, one of whom was a literary graduate. During the year ending May, 1847, 34,400 copies of different works were printed, and about 500 tracts had been given weekly to the attendants on the religious services, besides those distributed in the hospital, in the neighboring villages, and on the junks trading to Peking and other cities. The medical department was flourishing. Nov. 26, 1846, Rev. Mr. Milne and his wife arrived at Shanghai, and April 1, 1847, Rev. Messrs. Muirhead and Southwell, and Mr. A. Wylie, superintendent of the press, sailed for that city.

In June, 1847, delegates from several stations convened in Shanghai, for the revision of the New Testament in Chinese. After a long discussion on the proper term for God and gods to be employed in a Chinese translation of the Holy Scriptures, not being able to agree in opinion, they concluded to proceed in the work of revision, and leave the terms for God and the Holy Spirit, for future settlement. Canton, Amoy and Ningpo, were represented by Rev. Messrs. E. C. Bridgman, J. Stronach, and W. C. Milne; and Shanghai, by Rev. Messrs. Boone and Medhurst. Rev. Messrs. Johnson and White were chosen to represent Fuhchau, but circumstances did not allow of their acting on the committee. The ill-health of Bishop Boone prevented him from taking much part in the revision.

The Report for 1847 mentions the formation of a church of nine members. In the following year, ending May, 1848, the labors of the mission continued much as usual, and the attendance on the preached word was encouraging. The printing amounted to 71,400 copies of various works. In 1849, besides the English service in the chapel, conducted in rotation by brethren of different missions on Sabbath mornings, there were held on other hours of the day, three native services, and one in the hospital, besides two weekly services in the former, and two daily exercises in the latter place for the patients and others employed on the premises. In most of these services there was a good attendance. The colporteur Wang Show-yih was a zealous laborer in Shanghai and the neighboring villages. In September of this year, the writer visited Shanghai, and there spent some weeks in the hospitable family of Rev. Dr. Bridgman. It was a season of severe sickness, especially in this mission, two of whose members, Rev. Mr. Southwell and Mrs. Mary Wylie, were there called to their heavenly rest. Rev. Mr. Southwell had recently entered the field, and Mrs. Wylie was called home, after having long toiled for Christ among the Kaf-fres in South Africa, then known as Miss Mary Hanson, Agent of the Ladies' Society in London for the Instruction of Females in the East. A letter from Rev. Mr. Muirhead in 1850, remarks, "In the chapel we have on the Sabbath six services, from half-an-hour to an hour each, and during the week we have service once every morning, and in the evenings twice. Every week, there are not less, on the average, than from 800 to 1,000 individuals within the walls of the chapel, hearing the words of eternal life." This comprised only a part of the weekly labors of these brethren in the preaching of the Gospel. In the following year, the labors of the mission were unremitted, and health prevailed among them. The missionaries remark that, though many are willing to, hear the word, they have no personal convictions, and like not the exclusiveness of the Gospel, however much they affect to admire the excellency of its moral precepts. The hopeful conversion and baptism of 8 Fokien men, through the labors of Rev. J. Stronach, during less than a year, deserves grateful mention. While engaged in the revision of the Scriptures, he statedly preached to the Fokien residents in Shanghai, with blessed results.

Between April and October, 1850, there were printed at the Shanghai mission press, 50,000 copies of evangelical publications. The revision of the New Testament had been completed, and that of the Old Testament had been commenced. Soon after the completion of the revision of the New Testament, Rev. Messrs. Medhurst, Milne, and Stronach, in compliance with the instructions of the directors of the society, withdrew from the general committee for Scripture revision, and prosecuted their work on the Old Testament alone. Dr. Bridgman being a minority of the committee, on the revision of the New Testament, does not regard himself responsible for the style of the revision, or its principles of translation. This work is essentially the production of Messrs. Medhurst, Milne, and Stronach. A letter from Rev. J. Stronach, in July, 1851, gives the gratifying intelligence of the reception to church membership of eight other Fokien Chinese, making in all sixteen within the space of twelve months. The latest intelligence from this mission, preceding the report for 1852, represents the various services at the chapels, as being well sustained, though for the most part, as usual, consisting of transient visitors. Preaching in the temples and by the wayside was continued, favored with a listening ear among the people. The hospital was sustained, and the press was kept in vigorous operation. During the year there were printed 5,000 copies of the Gospels and Acts; 10,000 of a condensed statement of Christianity; 10,000 of the Three Character Classic; 10,000 catechisms; 3,000 of Sabbath calendar; 5,500 copies of the New Testament, and 2,000 copies of Two Friends, making together, 45,500 copies. The preaching of the Gospel has been the main instrumentality used for the salvation of souls, for which purpose, besides the hospital and temporary halls, in 1853, the mission had, in the centre of the city, two chapels, jointly accommodating 800 hearers. This year the revision of the Old Testament, by Rev. Messrs. Medhurst, Milne and Stronach, was completed. The whole number of Dr. Lockhart's patients, since the commencement of the mission, in 1843, is stated at 100,000, and the entire amount of printing by the mission, during about ten years, including fly sheets, tracts, books, and Testaments in the Chinese language, was estimated at about 500,000 distinct copies. A boarding-school of eighteen male pupils had, as early as 1853, been opened by Mr. Muirhead, designed to teach various branches of useful knowledge, solely through the medium of the Chinese. The native church then numbered twenty-one members, sixteen of whom were Fokien residents, and three Shanghai Chinese. The brethren, while not discouraged by their limited success and the obstacles to the triumph of the Gospel, yet deplore the extreme religious apathy of the people. They remark, "All around us, we find proofs of civilization and refinement. Increased intercourse, however, with this world of souls, has greatly unfolded its moral and religious characteristics, and we see that the masses are either the dupes of an atheistical philosophy, or the slaves of despicably puerile superstitions. Though several systems of idolatry obtain among them, each with its numerous temples and cumbersome rites, yet the religious apathy spread over all the people is woeful. 'Like priest, like people,' all seem utterly devoid of serious thought and concern."

Amoy.—This city and its vicinity is one of the most promising missionary fields in China, owing in part to the frank and friendly disposition of its inhabitants towards strangers. This society's mission in Amoy was commenced by Rev. Messrs. J. Stronach and William Young, in July, 1844; Rev. Dr. Abeel, of the American Board, having already been in this field upwards of two years. On the 1st of December they commenced Christian worship in a large hong, in a populous part of the city, which they had previously fitted up for a chapel, and here, daily, morning and evening, preaching in Chinese was sustained, with audiences varying from 100 to 150. A letter, written in July, 1845, speaks of increasing decorum during religious services, and of the wide diffusion of the Gospel, through preaching and tract distribution. Under date of June 29, 1846, Messrs. Stronach and Young speak of having, during the last three or four months, visited upwards of twenty towns and villages in the neighborhood of the city, some of which contained 10,000 inhabitants. In all these places they met with a friendly reception, and preached the word. Owing to the small proportion of readers, they were deeply convinced of the importance of the living preacher, and were shocked by the extensive prevalence of infanticide. In May, 1847, the meeting for Chinese women is described as increasing in attendance, and the truth seemed to be producing a powerful impression upon the hearts of the people. By reason of ill-health, Rev. Mr. Young and wife, in the summer of this year, left Amoy for England. Rev. A. Stronach, under date of March 10, 1848, gratefully announces the hopeful conversion and baptism of a father and his son, the latter aged 28, being the first fruits of this mission. Rev. Mr. Pohlman was present, and assisted in the solemn services. Another letter of December 6, 1848, describes the conversion of a Chinese soldier, called Tan Tai, an intelligent and courageous man, and who subsequently signalized his devotion to Christ amid persecution from his military associates, but who, notwithstanding his Christian principles, was subsequently promoted to office in the army.

Mrs. William Young's female boarding school, which commenced before their departure for England, in July, 1846, was resumed soon after their return, in the fall of 1848. On the 1st of November, 1849, it contained six boarders and nine day scholars, and funds only were wanting, indefinitely to increase the number of pupils. Besides studying the Chinese character, they were then learning to read their mother tongue, through the medium of the Roman letters. In 1851, this school had thirteen boarders and seven day scholars. The Chinese boys' boarding school, under the care of Rev. A. Stronach, then contained eight pupils, whose studies included the Chinese classics, the English language, and the careful reading of the Holy Scriptures. Rev. T. Gillfillan joined this mission in March, 1850, but within about two years returned to England. On the first Sabbath in January, 1852, two other Chinese were added to the church. Two of the church members were employed, as colporteurs. A joint prayer-meeting of the mission churches of the L. M. S. and of the American Board had been established by a voluntary movement of the native Christians. In 1853, a spirit of active piety pervaded the native church, and ten individuals were candidates for baptism, three of whom were expected soon to be admitted into the church.

AMERICAN BOARD.—The following account of the origin of American Missions in China has been kindly furnished us by REV. JOSHUA LEAVITT, who was, at the time, Corresponding Secretary of the American Seamen's Friend Society :

After the lamented decease of Dr. Milne, Dr. Morrison was left for several years to labor alone, and without the solace of any Christian society that would sympathize in his work. At length, a kind Providence sent to Canton a true brother, in the person of the late excellent David W. C. Olyphant, Esq., who went to China in a mercantile capacity, in connection first with the house of Thomas H. Smith & Co., and afterwards with that of Talbot & Co. Mr. Olyphant entered deeply into the situation and plans of Dr. Morrison. Together they established the monthly concert of prayer—the first on the eastern coast of Asia. As the London Missionary Society delayed year after year, the sending of additional helpers, Mr. Olyphant suggested that an appeal should be made to the American churches to enter into the work. A joint letter was actually forwarded to Dr. Spring, and some publications were made through the New York Observer ; but up to the year 1829, nothing effectual had been done in the matter.

In the summer of 1828, the American Seamen's Friend Society went into operation. Shortly afterwards, the acting secretary came into possession of communications, and a small collection of publications, which had been forwarded by Mr. Olyphant to his friend Mr. George Douglass of New York, who was also, like himself, a Baltimorean. Among the publications were some accounts, by Dr. Milne, of his explorations among the ancient Dutch churches in the island of Java, as well as historical sketches of the movements in China. The perusal of all these documents produced a strong desire to see the American church enlisted in the evangelization of China. A labored article on the subject was published in the Christian Spectator. One of the plans suggested was, that the Seamen's Friend Society should make a beginning, by sending out a chaplain for the numerous body of American and English sailors in the port of Canton, who might after a while become qualified to preach to the Chinese. Another suggestion was, that by a mission to Java, the Reformed Dutch churches in this country, who were then doing but little for missions, might be aroused to a zealous co-operation in the work.

In February, 1829, the executive committee of the A. S. F. S., formally resolved to establish a mission at Canton, as soon as the proper man could be found. In September, of that year, Mr. Olyphant wrote to the Society at New York, and simultaneously to the American Board at Boston, that the good ship Roman, Captain Lavender, belonging to him, would sail for Canton early in October. and if a missionary could be sent out in her, the passage should be free. Mr. Evarts went at once to Andover, and there found Elijah C. Bridgman, a young man who had just finished his theological studies, and was still undecided as to his future field of labor. Mr. Bridgman was so much impressed by the providential aspect of the call, that he at once resolved to respond to it and devote his life to China, and he thereupon went to his native place, Belchertown, Mass., and was ordained as a missionary to the heathen.

On the same day that Mr. Evarts went to Andover, the Seamen's Secretary was led, through a suggestion from John Nitchie, Esq., to make a proposition to the Rev. David Abeel, a zealous young clergyman of the Reformed Dutch Church, who had just returned to his father's house in New Brunswick, N. J., having resigned his parochial charge at Athens, N. Y., on account of the delicate state of his health. He also gave a favorable response, and in less than two weeks from the day the application was made, both the missionaries arrived in New York on the same day, and prepared to embark for China. Mr. Abeel remained about a year in the service of the Seamen's Friend Society, and then, as had been at first proposed, transferred his services to the American Board, under whom he visited Java and other eastern countries. He was succeeded as Seamen's Chaplain by Rev. Edwin Stevens, a tutor in Yale College, whose interest in behalf of China originated from the perusal of the article in the Christian Spectator. Dr. Bridgman still remains in China, and is acknowledged to be the most accomplished and learned Chinese scholar of the age.—J. L.

Canton.—Mr. Abeel, having connected himself with the Board as their missionary, made exploring tours to Java, Singapore, and Siam. Mr. Bridgman entered at once on the study of the Chinese. He also became editor of the Chinese Repository, which was established in May, 1831, a post which he continued to hold for 16 years. Preaching to foreign residents, also, continued for many years to form a prominent part of his work. He had under instruction a number of Chinese youth, among whom was a son of Leang Afa ; and part of his time was devoted to the distribution of books, and personal conversation with the natives.

A printing-press, types, and office furniture, were presented to this mission by the Bleeker street Church and Society, New York, and called the "Bruin press," in memory of their former pastor.

The mission was reinforced by the arrival of Rev. Ira Tracy, and Mr. S. Wells Williams, October 26, 1833, and of Rev. Peter Parker, M. D., Oct. 28, 1834. Mr. Williams took charge of the printing-press, giving himself also to the study of the Canton dialect.

Rev. Mr. Tracy soon left to establish a mission at Singapore. Rev. Edwin Stevens, who had been employed as Seamen's Chaplain, while acquiring the language, was now a missionary of the Board, and in 1834, he accompanied Rev. C. Gutzlaff, and a gentleman from Bengal, on a tour, with the intention of visiting the tea plantations in Fuhkein. On the 6th of May they reached the mouth of the Min, which leads to Fuhchan. After proceeding up the river, unmolested, four days, they were suddenly fired upon, on the morning of the 5th, by the soldiers on both sides of the river. Two of their men were slightly wounded, and they were compelled to return. This was the first visit of any Protestant missionary in this region. In August, 1835, Messrs. Medhurst and Stroms proceeded northward to Shantung, in the American brig Huron, with a cargo, consisting of a few bags of rice, and 20,000 volumes of Christian books. They visited Shanghai, and a number of villages on the coast, and distributed many thousand books to eager multitudes. They returned in safety, after an absence of two months. This vessel carried no opium.

Mr. Williams was at Macao, in 1836, printing Mr. Medhurst's dictionary. Dr. Parker, having visited Singapore, returned in September to Canton, and opened a dispensary, to which great numbers of ophthalmic and other patients resorted. Mr. Stevens, being on a missionary voyage in the Indian Archipelago, was suddenly called away by death at Singapore, January 5, 1837.

In 1838, Mr. Williams was still at Macao, studying the Chinese and Japanese languages. This year, Messrs. King, Parker, Gutzlaff and Williams undertook a voyage to Yeddo, in the ship Morrison, to return to their country seven shipwrecked Japanese, and also to ascertain whether there was any opening for Christian intercourse with Japan. But the shipwrecked Japanese were not permitted to land, and the vessel was subjected to a brisk cannonade, both at Yeddo and Kagosima Bay, and with difficulty escaped. They embarked on this voyage July 3, and returned to Macao August 29.

Rev. Mr. Abeel, who had returned to the United States in 1833, on account of his health, rejoined the mission in Feb. 1839; and Wm. B. Diver, M. L., arrived in September following. It was during this year that the Chinese government took those vigorous measures at Canton to suppress the opium traffic, which resulted in the war with England. The disturbances at Canton interrupted the operations of the mission, and the hospital was temporarily closed, having, previous to this time, given aid to 6,540 patients. A revised edition of the New Testament, prepared in part by Mr. Bridgman, had already been printed in Singapore, and, to some extent, distributed in Canton. Dr. Parker took this opportunity to visit the United States and England, and plead the cause of Christian philanthropy. He returned again to his work in 1842. Rev. Dyer Ball, M. D., having been obliged to leave Singapore on account of the health of his wife, removed to China. He remained at Macao till the close of the war; after which, he joined Dr. Bridgman, at Hong-Kong, which had been ceded to England by the treaty of Nanking, in 1842. Here mission premises were erected on land purchased for the purpose of the government, and missionary operations were steadily prosecuted in the several departments of preaching, printing, and tract distribution, and the healing art for about three years. Here Mrs. Ball died in 1844. In the summer of 1845, the brethren left Hong-Kong, and resumed the partially suspended missionary operations at Canton.

In 1844, Mr. James G. Bridgman arrived in China, and some time in the year 1846 became an assistant missionary of the Board, and was subsequently ordained at Canton.

In June, 1846, Dr. Bridgman was married to Miss Eliza Gillett, a member of the American Episcopal Mission; and Dr. Ball was subsequently married to Miss Robertson from Scotland. On the return of the missionaries to Canton, a strong prejudice against foreign teachers was found to exist; but in the hospital there was an encouraging field of labor, where the word might be sometimes addressed to 100 souls. The missionaries, however, were much restricted, being obliged mostly to live within the limits of the foreign factories. In 1846, a party, consisting of Messrs. Bridgman, Pohlman, and Bonney, with Mrs. Bridgman, while passing under a bridge in a boat, narrowly escaped with their lives from a shower of stones thrown upon them from the bridge, by an infuriated mob. Mr. Bonney had formerly been a teacher in the Morrison School; but in 1846, he became an assistant missionary of the Board, and has since been a devoted laborer, in preaching, teaching, and distributing books.

Dr. Ball superintended the Chinese printing, dispensed medicine statedly to the sick, kept a boarding-school of eleven pupils, and conducted a Chinese service in his own house on the Sabbath, where an interesting audience convened. Dr. Bridgman's time was divided between the Repository, the revision of the Scriptures, the preaching of the Word at the hospital, and occasionally to Dr. Ball's congregation, and the instruction of an interesting Bible class, two of whom gave increasing evidence of piety, and five of whom desired to profess Christianity. Mrs. Bridgman had a promising school of Chinese youth under her tuition. Rev. Dr. Parker having accepted the appointment of Secretary of Legation to the United States Embassy, his connection with the Board was consequently dissolved in 1847. Almost from the first the Hospital had been sustained independently of the Board. His labors continue much as heretofore.

Dr. Bridgman thus speaks of the moral character of the people, after 16 years continuous residence in China: "The longer I live in this country the more do I see of the wickedness of this people; the more do I see the necessity of great efforts to bring them to a knowledge of the truth. The great bulk of the people know not God nor his truth. They are the willing servants of sin; they love unrighteousness, and there is no wickedness which they will not commit. All that Paul said of the ancient heathen is true of the Chinese, and true to an extent that is dreadful. Their inmost soul, their very conscience seems to be seared, dead, so insensible, that they are, as regards a future life, like the beasts that perish. It often fills my heart with inexpressible sorrow to see what I see, to hear what I hear. It is truly a great valley of death, of putrefaction, of living death. No painting, no imagination can portray, and lay open before the Christian world, the awful sins, the horrible abominations which fill the land." The writer's experience of about 18 years among them confirms his description.

With the approval of the Committee, Mr. Williams returned to this country in 1844, and while here published his "Middle Kingdom," one of the most valuable works that have been issued upon that country. He returned to his post in 1848.

In March, 1847, Dr. Ball secured a house by the river side, about a mile and a half below the factory, and there soon after opened public worship in Chinese, with an audience of from 60 to 100. In July a meeting for females was commenced by Mrs. Ball and her daughter, now Mrs. Happer, which was at times attended by 30 or 40. This movement was an important advance in regard to missionary liberty.

The Report for 1848 acknowledges the printing of 10,000 copies of tracts by Milne, Abel, and Afa, at the expense of Rev. Dr. Parker. The word of life was everywhere dispensed among the people. One member of Dr. Bridgman's Bible-class had been baptized, and another gave much evidence of piety. On the 1st of June, 1847, he removed to Shanghai, to aid in the revision of the New Testament. Since that time the general course of missionary labor has been essentially the same from year to year. The missionaries in that field have been enabled to maintain their ground, and gradually, by private teaching, by the diligent preaching of the Gospel in stated places and by the wayside, by the healing of the sick, and the manifestation of a uniform spirit of love to the people, to dissipate their bitter prejudices, and win their confidence and respect. For a time Mr. Bonney labored with much encouragement at Whampoa, and widely preached and dispersed among the numerous villages the word of salvation. Dr. Ball's school, in 1849, numbered 14 boys, who, in addition to the study of their own classics, were instructed in geography, astronomy, natural philosophy, and the truths of the Bible, through the medium of the Chinese. The Chinese Repository was suspended at the close of 1850, after having reached its 20th volume. In December, 1850, this mission was afflicted by the death of Rev. James G. Bridgman, occasioned by a wound inflicted upon himself in a fit of temporary insanity, connected with greatly impaired health. He survived the wound but a few days. In 1850 Mrs. Bridgman had an interesting girls' school of 20 scholars at Shanghai, 12 of whom were boarders. In 1852 two Chinese at Canton are reported as furnishing good evidence of piety, and Dr. Ball's school had amounted to 20 pupils.

On the 15th of March, 1852, the mission was reinforced by the arrival of Rev. Daniel Vrooman and wife. Rev. Frederick Brewster and wife arrived at Canton, January, 1853, and on the 27th of the same month our beloved brother died of the small pox. His last words were, "Trusting in Jesus." The afflicted widow remains in the field. Early in 1852, Dr. Bridgman visited this country on account of his health, after an absence of about 23 years; and on the 11th of October, he re-embarked at New York for China. Dr. Bridgman is still at Shanghai, engaged in the revision of the Old Testament. On the 12th of September, 1853, the native helper, Tien Tsai, died in the hopes of the Gospel. Lai Sun, the other native helper, has left the mission. Mr. Williams, besides his other duties, has performed a valuable service to the cause in the preparation of the Easy Lessons in Chinese, and a Chinese and English Vocabulary of the Canton dialect. In May, 1853, with the concurrence of the mission, he left for Japan, as interpreter to Commodore Perry, and returned in August. Dr. Ball's health was feeble, but he was still engaged in the way of tours for tract distribution, trying to regain his strength, and to extend the savor of Christ's name; and Messrs. Bonney and Vrooman had made a tour up the river, 36 miles, for tract distribution, and were well received. Since 1846, 14,257,690 pages of tracts and scriptures, besides 225,120 volumes of religious matter, are reported as printed by this mission; and this probably falls much short of the entire amount of printing done by it during the past eight years. How much printed matter has been scattered far and near by the mission since its commencement in 1830, we have no means of determining. It must have been very great. In the religious movement connected with the present revolution, we are probably now seeing the effects both of the preaching of the Gospel at Canton, and the distribution of the printed page. By the grace of God this mission, in the midst of great difficulties and discouragements, has labored and has not fainted. A brighter day shall yet dawn on it from on high.

Amoy.—This mission began with the arrival at Amoy of Rev. David Abeel, in February, 1842, while the place was yet occupied by the English troops. Soon after his arrival he was joined by Dr. Cumming, a self-supporting missionary from this country, who continued in that field, devoting himself to hospital practice, combined with religious instruction, until his return to the United States, February 10th, 1847. In January, 1844, two honghs were rented in Amoy, one of which was used as a chapel, and the other for the in-door patients. The apartments above the chapel were occupied by Dr. Cumming. Mr. Abeel writes: Sabbath, January 28th, the first religious services were held in the new chapel, and about 70 united with us in worshipping the true God. On Mr. Pohlman's arrival in June following, from 60 to 100 daily attended the preaching of the Gospel in the hospital. On the 21st of March, a Bible class was commenced with 12 attendants. Mr. Abeel, besides his English services, labored assiduously and successfully among the Chinese in the way of preaching and tract distribution; and he is still remembered by the people in Amoy with affection. He exerted a salutary influence among the high officers. The governor of the province of Fukkien makes grateful mention of him as an assistant in the preparation of his valuable Geography. On the 22d of June, 1844, Rev. Messrs. Doty and Pohlman, from Borneo, joined the mission with their families, being obliged to reside for a time on the island of Koolongsoo, opposite Amoy. Their families suffered much from sickness, and a promising son of Mr. Doty, aged 6 years, was committed to the grave. Rev. Dr. Abeel visited Hong-Kong in August, 1844, for the benefit of his health.

In September following, Dr. Abeel returned to Amoy still feeble, and after a series of boat excursions in the vicinity of the city, for the double object of publishing the Gospel, and improving his health, he finally, as the only means of prolonging his life, embarked for the United States, and arrived at New York on the 3d of April, 1845, about 15 years from his original embarkation for the heathen world. He closed his valuable and eventful life at Albany, N. Y., September 4th, 1846. His remains repose in Greenwood Cemetery, beneath a tasteful monument, in a locality commanding a fine view of the sea, on whose bosom he had, for Christ's sake, so extensively journeyed. His works do follow him. Mrs. Pohlman died on the 30th of September, 1845, and Mrs. Doty, on the 5th of the following month. Both were faithful to Christ in life, happy in death, and each left behind her an afflicted husband and two children. Rev. Mr. Doty, with these motherless children, left Amoy, November 12th, 1845, and arrived at New York on the 6th of March, 1846.

December 16th, 1845, the first meeting for Chinese females was held at Rev. William Young's, when upwards of 40 adults were present. The missionaries were treated with marked politeness by the government. In December, 1845, a new chapel was opened for daily meetings, and on the 5th of January following the first Chinese monthly concert was held, being a union meeting of the Amoy Protestant missionaries. The morning of the day was devoted to prayer, and the afternoon to communicating missionary intelligence in Chinese.

In April, 1846, two aged men were baptized by Mr. Pohlman, being the first fruits of this mission. They received their first religious impressions from the preaching of Mr. Abeel. During the absence of Mr. Doty, Mr. Pohlman enjoyed the co-operating labors of brethren of the American Presbyterian Board, and of the London Missionary Society. Near the close of 1846, he and Rev. Mr. Brown visited 32 out of 136 villages situated on the island of Amoy. They were well received, and preached the word to large and attentive audiences, and distributed books and tracts to the old men, schoolmasters, and other influential persons. Rev. Mr. Doty and wife, and Rev. John Van-nest Talmage reached Amoy on the 19th of August, 1847. In March, 1848, Mr. Doty writes, "On the 5th instant, our regular communion season occurred, when two more from among this people, father and son, were admitted to the table of the Lord. It is about a year since the father first heard the truth from our evangelist. His attention seems soon to have been arrested, and what he learned he communicated to his son. The evangelist here mentioned was originally from the Kwangtung province, and about 1841 emigrated to Siam. There he was long employed by the writer as a teacher, and with him in social prayer, he learned to bow the knee to our Lord Jesus Christ, and by him was there baptized. After his conversion, he was employed by myself as an assistant in publishing among the Chinese the glorious Gospel. In August, 1846, he left with me for China, and at the desire of Rev. Mr. Pohlman, and in accordance with my own advice, he became connected with the Amoy mission, in March, 1847. He was commonly called U Sien, or the teacher U. Many other cheering facts are mentioned as to the state of feeling among the attendants on Christian worship, indicating the presence of the Holy Spirit.

In June, 1847, a promising day-school was opened by Rev. Mr. Peet, formerly with the writer in Siam, and subsequently his missionary associate in Fuhchau. Rev. Mr. Pohlman gives an interesting account of two excursions, of two days each, made in March and September, 1847, to Chiang-chau, where he was politely received, his preaching listened to by large and attentive assemblies, and books received with eagerness. Bundles of selected books were sent to the officers and literary men of the city. The walls of Chiang-chau are about 5 miles in circuit, and in good preservation, and this city, together with the valley, 10 miles wide and 15 long, in which it is situated, is supposed to contain about 1,000,000 of souls. Mr. Pohlman regarded it as a promising and inviting field. Bible class instruction, begun in Amoy in March, 1844, still continued. In July, 1847, the class in the New Testament numbered about 25. In 1846 a second Bible class was formed for the study of the Old Testament. On Tuesday afternoon was a meeting for Chinese women, which was punctually attended by many of the same persons. The church members, in their week-day meetings, were active in exhorting their benighted countrymen. A daily meeting was held by the teacher U, in a house standing on the site of the intended new place of worship. At times the room was crowded to overflowing, and a lively attention was given to his exhortations. On Thursday evening is a native prayer meeting; and a prayer-meeting preparatory to their monthly communion is held on the preceding Saturday.

On the 19th of December, 1848, Rev. Mr. Pohlman left Amoy to accompany his sister, then in feeble health, to Hong-Kong. His object having been accomplished, he embarked for Amoy, Jan. 2d, 1849, in the schooner Omega. On the morning of Jan. 5th, about 2 o'clock, she struck on Breaker's Point, about half way to Amoy. The sea rolled over her, and Mr. Pohlman and several others were drowned by the capsizing of the boat in which they hoped to reach shore. This is the first instance of the loss of life by shipwreck of any missionary of the Board. His death was an unexpected and heavy affliction to the mission, and the missionary cause. The health of Miss Pohlman, which had received a severe shock from her brother's sudden death, required the return of Mr. Talmage with her to America. They left Amoy, March 25, 1849, and arrived at New York on the 23d of August.

The mission chapel, the site for which had been secured by Mr. Pohlman, and in the building of which he had been active, was dedicated on Sabbath, Feb. 11, 1849. It is a neat brick edifice, one story high, with a flat roof, 36 feet wide and 68 long, including a verandah 10 feet wide, and will seat from 350 to 400 persons. On each side of the pulpit are apartments for females, where they may hear the Gospel without the violation of Chinese custom. Its completion was followed by a large increase of attendants upon the preached word.

July 29, 1849, a mother and her two sons, who, amid deep trials, had manifested great Christian steadfastness, were baptized and admitted to church-fellowship. The occasion was one of deep interest to God's people. Of the church members, Mr. Doty writes: "They appear to be praying, growing Christians, walking in the ways of the Lord, and experiencing the joy of the Holy Spirit's presence.

Rev. Mr. Talmage, with Mrs. Talmage, arrived at Amoy, on his return, July 16, 1850. On the 22d of December following, he preached his first regular sermon at the opening of a place of worship connected with his own house. The room, which will seat about 100, was crowded. The regular attendance here and in the chapel on the Sabbath, is from 150 to 200.

May 19, 1850, Mr. Doty baptized his infant son, and three children of native converts, being the first instance of the baptism of a child of a native Christian in connection with this mission. Two men and three women were received into the church on the last Sabbath of July, 1850, and on the last Sabbath of March, 1851, three others, a man and two women. The native evangelist was daily occupied in conversing with inquirers in the chapel, in holding meetings, and in occasional tours to other places. Another church member was acting as colporteur in the city, under the direction of Dr. Young, of the Free Church of Scotland. Early in 1850, the day-school was transferred by Mr. Doty to Dr. Young, owing to the pressure of more important duties. The Roman letters had begun to be used in preparing books for the native Christian females.

The attendance at the chapel was from 150 to perhaps 300. Weekly female prayer-meetings were held both by Mrs. Doty and Mrs. Talmage, with encouraging results. Including the three baptized in March, ten were added to the church in 1851, making with the native evangelist, 19 church members, one having died in May. The trials of the native Christians from poverty and other causes have been great; but they appear to be growing in grace. In 1852 two young men were admitted into the church, who were called to suffer for Christ's sake. Two others selected from a large number of inquirers, who had been examined during the preceding month, were received into the church. There was unusual evidence of the presence of the Holy Spirit. At the close of that year, the number of communicants was 21; and from the beginning, the whole number of admissions to the church had been thirty-three. During the year, 12 children of church members had been baptized and two Christian marriages celebrated. A monthly collection, originating among themselves, is taken up for the assistance of needy church members, amounting to about $40 a year. "The first we knew of it," says Mr. Doty, "was from being asked if we would not 'join in giving something.'" The mission pleads for additional laborers.

In May, 1853, the mission suffered a great loss in the death of U Sien, the native evangelist. He had been sent with a Christian colporteur to Chiang-chau to commence a new station. Arriving just before the insurrection broke out in that city, he was suspected of being associated with the insurgents, and was taken by the imperialists and beheaded. The colporteur narrowly escaped with his life. The writer saw U Sien for the last time in Dec. 1852. He trusts that one, in whose conversion he was an humble instrument, is now in heaven. He was much esteemed for his piety, good judgment, and Christian activity. Early in June, during one of those days when the blood of civil war profusely flowed in the neighborhood of the chapel, four young men were baptized and added to the little flock, making six added during the first half of 1853, and 26 the total number of surviving church members.

Fuhchau.—The mission at Fuhchau was commenced in 1847. In accordance with the earnest wishes and advice of the Canton mission, Rev. Stephen Johnson, formerly stationed in Siam, left Canton, Nov. 23, 1846, and proceeded by the way of Hong-kong and Amoy to Fuhchau, where he arrived January 2, 1847. His first work was the study of the local dialect. After about six months he commenced religious services in his own house, on the Sabbath, beside daily worship with his domestics, making the study of the Fuhchau dialect his main business. At his house he had frequent Chinese visitors, to whom he distributed tracts, and made known Christ crucified for sinners. In September, 1847, he was joined by Rev. Lyman B. Peet and wife, with whom it was his privilege to be associated in Siam. On the 7th of May, 1848, the mission was further reinforced by the arrival of Messrs. Seneca Cummings and Caleb C. Baldwin, and their wives, and Rev. William Richards, son of the distinguished missionary of that name, at the Sandwich Islands. For the first two brethren, houses in eligible situations were soon erected. For the first two years of their residence in Fuhchau, the study of the Chinese was necessarily the main business of the newly arrived brethren. The first three houses of the mission were on Tong-chieu, a small island in the Min, about three miles from the south gate of the city proper; and the fourth was on the south bank of the river, about a quarter of a mile from the island, on the main thoroughfare, with a commanding view. This is occupied by Mr. Cummings. In June, 1848, besides stated Sabbath worship in his house, with an intelligent audience of about thirty, Mr. Johnson opened a school and commenced preaching and tract distribution in a hired house, which he had fitted up for the purpose, standing in the midst of a dense population, on the south bank of the river, and about two miles from his residence. The audiences were at first so tumultuous, that the attempt to open or close the meetings with prayer was not deemed prudent. Gradually the people were more orderly and respectful, and the audiences numbered about sixty souls. For the accommodation of the laboring classes, evening meetings were frequently held, with apparently good effect. Mr. Peet secured a commodious chapel near the island and on the great thoroughfare, a part of which he appropriated to a Chinese school, which has generally numbered about twenty scholars. In the summer of 1849, Mr. Johnson's health compelled him to visit the northern ports. At Ningpo, on the 17th of September, he was married to Miss Caroline Silmer of Stockholm, Sweden. She was then an agent of the London Ladies' Society for the Education of Females in the East, and had been for about two years a teacher in Miss Mary Aldersey's Female Seminary, in that city. After visiting Shanghai, he returned with Mrs. J. to Fuhchau, on the 8th December, 1849. On the 31st of May, 1850, the mission was further reinforced by the arrival of Rev. Justus Doolittle and wife. Mr. Johnson, soon after his return, resumed his usual labors. His chapel was about a mile from his residence, on the way to the scene of his former labors. Messrs. Cummings, Baldwin and Richards were now making some efforts in the preaching of the word and the distribution of tracts. In September, 1850, Rev. Mr. Richards was attacked with hemorrhage of the lungs, and by advice of his brethren and physician, he soon after embarked for Canton. Physicians there recommending a long voyage, he embarked for the United States early in March, but was not allowed to reach this country. He calmly and cheerfully breathed out his life on the 5th of June, and his remains were committed to the deep, south of St. Helena. Mr. Richards had made great progress in the Chinese, considering the short time he had been in the field, and his prospects of future usefulness were bright. His heart was in his work, and he labored perhaps beyond his strength. Just before he was laid aside, he performed a valuable service to the mission in securing, after much labor, trial and patience, the building lot at Po-na-Sang, now occupied by Messrs. Baldwin and Doolittle. There the writer erected the house now occupied by Mr. Baldwin, and moved into it early in 1851. Mr. Doolittle preceded him. It is near the great thoroughfare leading from the island to the city, and nearly midway between the two places.

In November, 1850, Mr. Baldwin opened a school and chapel on the island, and with some interruption from ill-health, this continued to be the central point of his labors, till near the close of 1851. In April of that year, Mr. Cummings commenced public worship in Chinese, in the court of his house, with an encouraging attendance, and in May opened a day school for girls, which has since continued. Mr. Peet long had a Chinese service in the court of his residence, on Sabbath morning, which, with his Chinese school, has been transferred to the house on the island, once occupied by the writer. Some months after Mr.

Johnson's removal to Po-na-Sang, he secured an eligible site for a chapel near his house, and on the main street, and built a small and simple place of worship, large enough for about 180 hearers. There he opened a school, and continued the preaching of the Gospel, both in season and out of season, as his health would allow, up to the time of his return to this country, December 8, 1852. His school was not permanent. After its suspension, the school room was for a time occupied by a flourishing school, gathered by Mr. Doolittle, which also was dispersed by the alarm caused by the seizure and imprisonment of the Rev. Mr. Welton's school teachers, in April, 1852. In the spring of that year, Mr. Doolittle procured a site, and soon after erected a chapel on the main street, about a quarter of a mile nearer the city than that built by Mr. Johnson. These chapels need only to be opened and ordinarily there is a good number of hearers, sometimes more than a hundred. On the 27th of May, Mr. Doolittle commenced religious exercises in Chinese, in his chapel. During the first half of 1852, Mr. Cummings erected a chapel near his house, on the main street, and commenced Chinese services in it, with encouraging prospects. Mr. Baldwin occupies the chapel in which Mr. Johnson formerly ministered. Rev. Charles Hartwell and wife arrived at Fuhchau on the 19th of June, 1853. The four elder brethren now in this field, have each chapels in eligible positions for securing hearers, and without hindrance from the government or people, can give themselves on the Sabbath, and during the week, to the preaching of the Gospel, and the judicious distribution of books. By their exemplary lives and pure doctrines, a general and happy impression, favorable to Christianity, has been produced upon the popular mind. It is hoped that some knowledge of the fundamental truths of the Gospel has been extensively diffused, though none have yet come out decidedly on the Lord's side. Their religious meetings are becoming more orderly and solemn, and many of the youth have been carefully instructed in the Scriptures. Truth is operating like leaven, quietly among the masses, yet we trust powerfully. The brethren here have, during the insurrection, remained at their posts, and steadily prosecuted their work; and the missionaries are generally recognized as the teachers of a holy religion, blameless and harmless in their lives. The mission has four day schools, containing about 100 scholars. Books are extensively prepared in the vulgar language, using the Chinese characters, as symbols of its sounds, when necessary. In Fuhchau from the first, there has been great harmony and love among the missionaries of the different boards, being united in their English preaching on the Sabbath, in their communion services, the monthly concert, and in a weekly prayer meeting. To the writer, the recollection of these precious seasons is sweet, and he would rejoice again to participate in them, and in the work of preaching Christ to dying souls in Fuhchau, should Providence please to grant him this blessed privilege. May this mission, which he in weakness was permitted to commence, be abundantly blest as the instrument of salvation to the perishing.

TABULAR VIEW.

SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION—Canton.—

This mission, which has been subject to great changes, was commenced by Rev. I. J. Roberts, in May, 1844. Between his arrival in China in 1836, and the commencement of his labors in Canton, his efforts were mainly directed to the spiritual good of the Chinese in Macao and Hong-kong. Shortly after entering Canton, he gathered a church of 6 or 7 members, two or three of whom were afterwards useful, as assistants in publishing the Gospel. Early in 1845, Messrs. Shuck and Devan came to Canton. Mr. Shuck shortly after left with his children for home, and Mrs. Devan died in that city, Oct. 18, 1846, and Dr. Devan, after a temporary sojourn in Hong-kong, returned to America. Messrs. Percy and Clopton, with their wives, arrived at Canton, in Oct. 1846, and Mr. Clopton died July 7, 1847, and his widow, with her infant, soon after returned. Rev. Francis Johnson arrived July, 1847, but his health failing, he returned, and reached New York in December, 1849. Rev. B. W. Whilden and wife arrived at Canton early in 1849, where Mrs. Whilden died, Feb. 20, 1850, and Mr. Whilden the same year embarked for the United States. Rev. Mr. Percy and wife, by reason of ill-health, left this station for Shanghai in 1848. Thus, among all the missionaries of this society, with the exception of Mr. Roberts, none have been long enough in Canton to become able preachers in the local dialect. He has been a diligent laborer, and in his correspondence, eight persons are named as having received Christian baptism. In 1849, he visited the United States, where he was married; and in 1850, he resumed his work in Canton. In the Society's Report for 1853, his dismissal is announced. He, however, remains in Canton, prosecuting his work as usual. The insurgent chief is understood to have been for a time under his religious instruction, and to have recently desired a visit from him, which he attempted to make, but without success. Rev. Brayfield W. Whilden resumed his missionary labors in the city of Canton, in November, 1852, and returned finally to the United States in November, 1854. A Chinese school, containing 20 pupils, is mentioned, and Yong, a native, who was long employed by Rev. Mr. Shuck, was then laboring as an evangelist in Canton. The Report for 1854, speaks of serious embarrassments in this mission; but the missionaries speak hopefully of future prospects.

Shanghai.—Rev. J. L. Shuck and wife embarked for China in 1835, and Macao and Hong-kong became the scenes of his subsequent labors. In this latter settlement, Mrs. Shuck, a highly esteemed missionary, died Nov. 27, 1844, and Mr. Shuck, with his children, soon after returned home. He reached Shanghai, on his return to China with his second wife and younger daughter, in October, 1847, where they were welcomed by Rev. Messrs. Yates and Tobey, who had a little preceded them. From the arrival of these brethren dates the commencement of this mission. Dr. T. S. L. James and wife destined to Shanghai, were drowned in Hong-kong harbor, April 15, 1848, by the capsizing of the schooner Paradox, in which they had taken passage at Canton. Rev. Geo. Percy and wife, formerly at Canton, arrived at Shanghai Nov. 18, 1848, where they have since continued to labor. Like the brethren of other societies who had preceded them, they found Shanghai a promising field for Christian effort, and, with a knowledge of the local dialect, they found no difficulty in obtaining hearers. Besides the frequent ministry of the word in a smaller chapel within the walls, the brethren early made arrangements for the erection, within the city proper, of a substantial and spacious Christian edifice. This church was opened for worship on the 3d of March, 1850. The house is a brick edifice, with a belfry, and will accommodate upwards of 700 persons. Occasionally, it has been well filled, and usually some hundreds are present. In 1853, 6 schools are reported as under the care of the mission, containing between 70 and 80 scholars. There is one out-station, having a small chapel and a school-house. While the brethren much value Scripture and tract distribution, they devote themselves chiefly to the preaching of the Gospel in the city, and in the large and numerous villages in the surrounding country.

On the 2d of September, 1849, three Chinese were baptized. A recent letter states the interesting fact of the baptism of the son of an insurgent chief, a youth of 18, who was considered as giving uncommon evidence of piety. Mr. Tobey has returned to this country on account of ill-health. He arrived at New York, May 29, 1850. Rev. Mr. Shuck, having been suddenly bereaved of his wife, late in 1852, returned with his family to the United States. G. W. Burton, M.D., sailed from New York, Dec. 12, 1853, on his return to Shanghai, accompanied by Mrs. Burton. By the last accounts, the missionaries were much encouraged, though living amid the ravages of war. The report for 1854 says, with reference to this mission, "At no time in its former history, has the encouragement to persevere been stronger. The church at Shanghai have been permitted to receive into their fellowship an interesting young man, by the name of Asou, who gives satisfactory evidence of a change of heart. This young man was nearly related to the southern king, one of the insurgent chiefs, and was on his way to Nanking to join the army. Having found protection in the families of the missionaries, it was soon ascertained that he was a regular reader of the Scriptures, and daily worshiped God. He was more particularly instructed by them; and having professed faith in Christ, and a readiness to obey him, he was baptized and received into the church. Rev. Mr. Shuck has taken a dismissal, in order to enter into the service of the domestic Board, among the Chinese in California.

CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—Hong-kong.—This Society commenced operations in China in 1844, Rev. Messrs. Geo. Smith and T. McClatchie having arrived at Hong-kong on the 25th of Sept. of that year. In 1846, Mr. Smith returned to England; and having been appointed Bishop of Victoria, with the supervision of the missions in China, he again sailed for Hong-kong, Nov. 1849, accompanied by Rev. T. F. Gough, Wm. Welton, E. T. R. Moncrieff, L. L. D., and R. D. Jackson. The party arrived March 29, 1850. April 21, Mr. Jackson was ordained in the cathedral at Hong-kong, and soon after proceeded with Mr. Welton to Fuhchau. Rev. Mr. Gough joined Rev. Messrs. Cobbold and Russell at Ningpo. Rev. Dr. Moncrieff entered upon his duties in what is now called St. Paul's College. It then contained 30 pupils, three of whom had been members of the Morrison school. Chinese is the medium of instruction. At the end of the year there were only 17 students. As early as Jan., 1852, the new buildings at St. Paul's college were completed, in which were the residences of the bishop, the warden of the college, and a full staff of tutors and students. This institution originated in the missionary zeal of the Rev. Vincent Stanton, former chaplain at Hong-kong. About 60 persons reside in the college building. The number of Chinese pupils was about 30, between the ages of 12 and 18. In 1852, Dr. Moncrieff returned to England, and resigned his connection with the college. At the close of that year a new college building was opened. The number of the pupils was fluctuating.

Shanghai.—This station was commenced by Rev. T. McClatchie on his arrival, April 15, 1845. By diligent application to the study of the dialect, he was soon able to make himself understood by the people. Shortly after his arrival he secured a house within the city walls. In less than a year he commenced a Chinese service, and soon after was much encouraged by the interest manifested by his crowded audiences. As early as May 29, 1847, he had translated the Morning Service and the Collects into the Shanghai dialect, through the aid of Gutzlaff's translation of the Church Liturgy. On the 17th of April, 1848, he was joined by Rev. W. Farmer and his wife. Mr. Farmer was, however, soon obliged to quit the field, on account of his health, and he did not survive to reach his native country.

Early in 1850, the mission church, situated in the city proper, was completed. It will accommodate 300 persons. In the course of 1851, three members of Mr. McClatchie's blind class were baptised, having long been the subjects of Christian instruction. Rev. J. Hobson arrived in 1849, expecting to join this mission, but the sudden death by drowning of Rev. J. Lowder, the English chaplain, while bathing in the sea, led to his appointment to that office, in which his society concurred. Mr. McClatchie's residence is now near that of the American Episcopal establishment, about 3 miles below the city, on the river's bank. In the Report of the China mission for 1853, it is stated that, through the efforts of Rev. John Hobson, a commodious educational establishment, costing $5,416, contributed by the English congregation, had been erected and made over to the society. The school was opened in December, 1852, numbering 20 pupils, who had been some time under Mr. Hobson's instruction. Two ordained students have been appointed to this station, one of whom takes charge of the school. In July, 1852, two other members of the blind class had been baptised, one of them a woman. The class numbered 18 members. This class has been aided by Mr. McClatchie to the weekly amount of about 7 cents each. He gives them stated religious instruction.

Ningpo.—This station was commenced by Rev. Messrs. R. H. Cobbold and W. A. Russell on their arrival in May, 1848. After a short time, they obtained a house within the walls, the basement of which they fitted up as a temporary place of worship. On the first Sabbath in 1849, they commenced worship in Chinese. In the course of the year, a small chapel, with school-room and teachers'-room, was opened in a densely-populated portion of the city. The congregations were fluctuating at the new chapel, averaging about 80. Rev. T. F. Geagh joined the mission in 1850. In April, 1851, two persons of hopeful piety received Christian baptism. The Roman letters were employed in writing the vulgar tongue with apparent advantage. Early in 1852, Rev. Mr. Jackson, formerly at Fuhchau, was associated with this mission. This year was one of unusual religious interest among the people. Religious services were held at four places, the average attendance at the two chapels being about 200. The meetings were more orderly and solemn, and the Gospel and its teachers were treated with more respect. During the last half of 1852, five adults, of apparent piety, were baptised. This station was visited by Rt. Rev. Bishop Smith, in May, 1852, who speaks in the highest terms of the missionaries.

Fuhchau.—Rev. Messrs. William Welton and R. D. Jackson arrived in Fuhchau early in 1850, and through the assistance of the British Vice-Consul obtained a lease of a temple within the walls, near the consulate. The opposition of the literati constrained them soon after to exchange this place for another, also in the city. Mr. Welton has maintained his position amid much opposition from the local authorities. In the spring of 1852, two Chinese school teachers, with whom he had made an agreement, were seized, imprisoned, and treated with great inhumanity. A house which he had originally rented for a chapel and dispensary was pulled down. His humane and Christian efforts have been mostly restricted to his own house. Tract distribution and preaching are allowed in the city proper; but no premises can be rented for such purposes. Mr. Welton has made some efforts in preparing portions of the Scriptures in the local dialect, using the Chinese character as a symbol of its sounds. The opposition, it has been thought, is abating.

AMERICAN SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST SOCIETY.

Shanghai.—This mission was begun in 1847, by Rev. Messrs. S. Carpenter and N. Wardner, who with their families occupy a native house within the walls of the city, situated among family residences, near the small south gate. A large room on the mission premises has been fitted up as a chapel, which was opened for worship in January, 1849.

ENGLISH GENERAL BAPTIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—Ningpo.—This mission was commenced in 1845, by Rev. Messrs. T. H. Hudson and William Jarrom. It has been active in the preaching of the Gospel and the distribution of Christian books; and considerable has been done in the department of schools. Mr. Hudson has prepared a number of Christian tracts. He was early permitted to baptize his Chinese teacher on the profession of his faith in Christ. Mrs. Jarrom died in Ningpo, in February, 1848. Mr. Jarrom returned to England late in 1850. Mr. Hudson has suffered much from ill-health, but continues in the diligent prosecution of his work. His son, Mr. Joseph Hudson, who is a ready Chinese scholar, was for some time a valuable assistant in publishing the Gospel; but he was subsequently persuaded to connect himself with a mercantile house in Ningpo.

MISS ALDERSEY'S FEMALE SEMINARY, Ningpo.—This energetic and devoted Christian lady, though educated amid ease and affluence, has rejoiced, for Christ's sake, in the endurance of peculiar hardships and privations. At her own charge, near twenty years since, she entered on the missionary work, first toiling alone for some years in Sourabaya, several hundred miles east of Batavia. Since she left that place, a blessed work of grace has been wrought among the natives, several hundreds of whom have been hopefully converted, without the aid of any foreign missionary. During the war between China and England, she went to Chusan, and there commenced her labors for Chinese females. After the close of the war, she opened a female boarding-school at Ningpo, which has continued in operation to the present time. It has usually numbered about fifty girls, and her entire household about seventy persons. Several of her family have become hopefully pious. Her school is now within the city proper. Out of her school she has labored much for the spiritual good of Chinese females, by visiting and conversation.

SWEDISH MISSION, Fuhchau.—Though in the mysterious providence of God this interesting mission was early broken up, yet it deserves a brief notice. It was commenced early in 1850, by Rev. C. J. Fast, joined soon after by Rev. A. Elgquist. Both were young men of talent and piety, and during their brief sojourn in Fuhchau, made rapid progress in the Chinese. After much trouble they obtained the promise of a permanent residence, and in October, 1850, they visited a vessel at the mouth of the river to procure the funds necessary to fulfil the bargain, amounting to about $200. On entering the main river, on their return, they were waylaid by a piratical boat, and during the encounter, Mr. Fast was mortally wounded, and fell into the river, and Mr. Elgquist narrowly escaped to the shore with his life, with some slight wounds. One of the pirates, perhaps their leader, was mortally wounded by a pistol-shot from Mr. Fast. Their village was subsequently destroyed by the government. Mr. Elgquist's health suffered a severe shock from this disaster and previous robberies which they had endured while residing in a Buddhist temple; and early in 1851 he was advised to visit Hong-kong. His health not improving, in 1852 he embarked for Sweden. This was the first effort of the society to establish a Christian mission.

FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND, Amoy.—This mission was commenced in 1850, by James H. Young, M.D., who had previously spent several years in Hong-kong, as a medical practitioner. Rev. W. O. Burns, a devoted and successful minister of Christ, in his native land, offered himself to the Church as a missionary to China, and arrived in Hong-kong in November, 1847. After having spent three years and seven months in study and missionary labor in Hong-kong and Canton, he sailed for Amoy on the 26th of June, 1851. He soon so far mastered this new dialect as to be able to speak it with ease and correctness. June 6th, 1853, he announced the completion of the translation of the Pilgrim's Progress, which was published at a cost of about ten cents per copy. Dr. Young, soon after his arrival, opened a dispensary, and likewise took charge of a Chinese day school of 30 pupils, originally connected with the mission of the American Board in that city. Under his direction two pious Chinese were employed, as colporteurs. Upwards of twenty opium smokers were thought to have been cured of this vice. Another school of thirty pupils is superintended by Mr. Burns. He has been diligent in the preaching of the Gospel in Amoy, and in neighboring cities and villages. The mission was expected soon to be reinforced.

The preceding portion, together with the concluding part of this article was prepared by Rev. STEPHEN JOHNSON, late missionary of the A. B. C. F. M., at Fuhchau.

AMERICAN EPISCOPAL BOARD.—The Board of Missions of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States resolved, on the 13th of May, 1834, to establish a mission in China as soon as a suitable missionary could be found. On the 14th of July, Rev. Henry Lockwood was appointed; and in February following, Rev. Francis R. Hanson, Rector of Christ Church, Prince George's County, Md., offered himself, and was accepted. The mission excited so deep an interest, that the necessary funds were raised in a few weeks, in New York alone, and a free passage was given by a mercantile house in that city. The missionaries embarked June 2, and arrived at Canton October 29, 1835, and afterwards proceeded to Batavia. February 17, 1836, Mr. Lockwood was married to a daughter of Rev. W. H. Medhurst, and on the 9th of August following, Mrs. Lockwood was removed by death.

On July 8, 1837, Rev. W. J. Boone, who had received a medical as well as a theological education, with reference to the missionary work, sailed from Boston, with his wife, and reached Batavia on the 22d of October. Mr. Hanson's health had become so impaired, that he was compelled to return home.

The missionaries applied themselves to the study of the Chinese language, and in the mean time, endeavored to make themselves useful in holding an English service, distributing tracts, and establishing schools. Mr. Boone found his medical knowledge of great use to him. But the climate proved detrimental to their health, and Mr. Lockwood was compelled to return to the United States.

During their residence at Batavia, a boys' school was commenced; and finding it difficult to retain them long enough to accomplish much good, the expedient was resorted to of having them bound by writing by the parents for five years, the missionaries assuming all the expense; and the plan being found to work well, was continued after the removal of the mission to China. In August, 1839, Mr. Boone had received 16 boys on these terms, and scarce a week passed but he had to reject applications. Their improvement, in every respect, was highly gratifying. They were docile, studious, and affectionate.

In September, 1840, Mr. and Mrs. Boone visited Macao, on account of impaired health; and in February following, the mission was removed to that place. On the 20th of August, 1842, Mrs. Boone was attacked with a bilious remittant fever, and on the 30th, she died (at Amoy), with the dying declaration: "If there is a mercy in life for which I feel thankful, it is, that God has condescended to call me to be a missionary." In consequence of her death, Dr. Boone returned to this country with his children, hoping also to be able to secure a reinforcement to the mission.

In 1842, and before Dr. Boone's return to this country, the mission was removed from Macao to Koolongsoo, a small island half a mile from Amoy, which, in the opinion of Dr. Boone, presented a most inviting field for missionary labor. He had frequent opportunities of preaching on Sundays to stated congregations of Chinese, averaging from 60 to 70, besides an English service for the troops. The chief magistrate of Amoy interchanged visits with Dr. Boone, and invited him to reside at that place, where he would have an opportunity to preach to many more people, and where he (the magistrate) would have more frequent intercourse with him. He listened to Dr. B.'s declaration of the Gospel, and accepted a New Testament.

Dr. Boone's visit to this country was the means of exciting a greatly increased interest in the China mission; and in October, 1844, he was consecrated Missionary Bishop. On the 14th of December following, he embarked for Canton, accompanied by Rev. Messrs. Henry W. Woods, and Richardson Graham, and Mrs. Boone, Mrs. Woods, Mrs. Graham, and Misses Gillett, Jones, and Morse, missionary teachers. Rev. Mr. Syle and wife embarked on the 24th of May following.

Bishop Boone and his associates reached Hong-kong on the 24th of April, 1845; and after much inquiry and consultation, Shanghai was fixed upon as offering a most favorable prospect for missionary labor; and, as soon as suitable arrangements could be made, the mission families proceeded to that place, and established the mission there. The demeanor of the people towards the missionaries was highly encouraging. The magistrates were courteous, and the people exhibited none of the arrogance and dislike manifested by the inhabitants of Canton, but showed much kindness and good will. A school for boys was immediately opened, with ten pupils, on the same plan as that pursued first at Batavia, and the new missionaries applied themselves diligently to the study of the language. Public service was established by the Bishop, in a hall fitted up in the building occupied for a school, capable of holding 250 people, which was filled with an attentive audience. In 1846, one young man was baptized, who was looking forward to the ministry.

The failure of Rev. Mr. Graham's health rendered it necessary for him to return to this country, and Rev. Phineas D. Spalding was sent out to take his place. Bishop Boone, in his report, gives a high testimonial to the character and usefulness of the ladies attached to the mission.

In 1847, the Bishop began to be afflicted with serious illness, which has since followed him, in a greater or less degree, and proved a great hindrance to his labors. This year he succeeded in raising about $6000, and secured a lot outside of the city, for the purpose of erecting a suitable building for his schools. One of the earliest pupils of the school died, giving satisfactory evidence of piety. Previous to his death he was received into the church.

The controversy in regard to the proper word to be used for rendering God in Chinese, to which allusion has been made in a former part of this article, attracted the earliest attention of Bishop Boone, who expressed his firm conviction that Shin was the true word; and that it would be in vain to fight against polytheism, if they chose the term used by the Chinese as the proper name for their chief god. To this subject he devoted several months, and wrote and published a treatise upon it.

Funds were collected for the erection of a mission chapel ($1000 of which was received from a member of the Episcopal Church in the United States), and also a suitable dwelling for the missionaries.

In 1849, the mission was afflicted with the loss of Rev. Mr. Spalding, whose indefatigable diligence had given him a sufficient command of the language to enable him to preach to the Chinese in their own tongue. Over exertion, connected with a cold, brought on him a consumption; urged by his physicians, he embarked for his native land on board the ship Coquette, which was never heard of afterwards; and it is supposed that she foundered in the Chinese sea during a terrible gale, soon after his embarkation.

Bishop Boone and Rev. Mr. Syle, were contributing their share of labor to the work of a revision of a translation of the Scriptures into Chinese; and in connection with the Rev. Mr. McClatchie, of the Church Missionary Society, they had nearly completed the whole order for "Morning Prayer," in the local dialect of Shanghai.

On Easter, 1850, the Bishop baptized six persons; and, after witnessing the administration of the ordinance, the teacher of the day school came to Mr. Syle, and applied to be received as a candidate for baptism.

The greatest vigilance is exercised by the missionaries in the examination of candidates for baptism, none being admitted to the ordinance without a knowledge of Christian truth, and evidence of its gracious effects on their hearts and in their lives.

The following fact, related by Mr. Syle, will show the difficulty attending the translation of the Bible into Chinese: "After reading some chapters in the Gospel of Mark, which had been translated in the very concise, 'highly concentrated' style, which is sometimes called 'classical,' my old man, Soo-dong, made this remark: 'A lad who has been to school two or three years can read and understand the Scriptures written in the Foo-pah (common dialect); if he has read books for six or seven years, he can understand and explain the meaning of what is written in the style of Mr. Gutzlaff's version (which might be called the easy Mandarin;) but before he could extract the meaning out of this (referring to what he had just perused), he must have studied the books at least ten years!' And yet this is what he prefers, and would choose for translating the word of God."

The following fact, stated by the same missionary, and which he says is no unusual occurrence, shows that there must be much suffering from want among the Chinese: "As I stepped from the boat on the quay this morning, I saw some old mats spread over the bodies of such as had died of destitution during the night. I lifted one corner of the matting, and counted nine distinctly. I was told there were eleven, all killed with cold and hunger in one night in one place!"

Mr. Syle relates the case of a poor boy, thirteen years of age, whom they had taken in, who died in consequence of the habit he had acquired of smoking opium. Mr. S. thinks this drug is undermining the constitutions of one-third of the people of China.

In 1850, Bishop Boone published a defence of his former treatise on the translation of the word God, which had been reviewed by Dr. Medhurst, Sir George Stanton, and Dr. Legge. As an illustration of the danger of employing the term Shang-te, he relates that they had been teaching a catechism on the creed, in which this word was used. A man of some intelligence, who understood his own language well, applied for instruction, and was furnished with a copy of this catechism. He came regularly for ten days, and showed great interest. He read over with the missionary all the attributes of Shang-te, which we are accustomed to predicate of God, and appeared to understand thoroughly what he read. But when asked if he prayed to Shang-te every day, he replied that he visited his temple twice a day for this purpose. This was the name he had been accustomed to apply to the idol in the temple; and it is not to be wondered at that he understood the missionaries, as teaching the worship of the same idol, since they used the same name. The word was immediately erased from their catechism. There is an idol, the chief among the Taoists, called Neok Wong Shang-te, and, if you say Shang-te to them, they understand you as speaking of this idol.

The interesting event of the ordination of Chi-Wong, the first Chinese deacon, took place in Christ Church, Shanghai, on the 7th of September, 1851. He was questioned fully on the books of Scripture, and on the 39 articles, and answered very satisfactorily. He also read two sermons, written out in the dialect of his region. He gives promise of much usefulness. There were, at this time, three more candidates for orders: Mr. John F. Points, a member of the mission, and two natives, Soodong and Chu-kiung.

This year, a new building was erected for the female school, under the instruction of Miss Jones.

Bishop Boone having made arrangements for as efficient conduct of missionary operations as circumstances would admit, embarked for the United States, and arrived in New York, Jan. 30, 1853. Mr. Syle, who had been eight years in China, found it necessary this year also to return to this country.

The obstacle which the acquisition of the Chinese language has been supposed to present to the missionary work there, appears far less formidable than it once was. After seven months' study, the newly-arrived missionaries were able to read the service, and address the natives intelligibly in Chinese. And one of the ladies connected with the mission commenced the study of the language in August, and on the 31st of the following January, she had read through the Gospel of Matthew in Chinese characters, correctly and understandingly.

himself and most of the ship's company. After sailing four hundred miles in open boats, and encountering a severe gale at sea, they reached Luban, a small island near Manila, and Mr. Lowrie returned to Macao in October.

The termination of the war between the British and the Chinese in this year changed the whole question as to the stations to be occupied. These were not required to be henceforth at places many hundreds of miles distant from China ; five of the principal cities on the coast of the country were now open to the residence of missionaries, as well as of other foreigners. Accordingly it was deemed expedient for Mr. McBryde to occupy a station on Koolongsoo, a small island opposite the city of Amoy. To this island, in 1833, Dr. Hepburn removed from Singapore, after spending a few months at Macao while the question of his station was under consideration. In October, Mr. McBryde and his family returned to this country, on account of the failure of his health. In February, 1844, D. B. McCartee, M.D., and Mr. Richard Cole, a printer, and his wife, arrived at Macao ; in July the Rev. Richard O. Way and wife, first appointed to Siam ; in October, the Rev. Mr. M. Simpson Culbertson and Augustus W. Loomis, and their wives, and the Rev. Messrs. John Lloyd and Andrew P. Happer, M. D. ; and in May, 1845, the Rev. Hugh A. Brown. The number of brethren thus arriving in China showed that the churches were willing to respond to the call of Providence for enlarged missionary operations in this country. It was now practicable to form plans of missionary work on a wider scale, and after much consideration it was determined to form three missions—at Canton, Amoy, and Ningpo. Messrs. Happer and Cole were connected with the Canton mission ; Messrs. Lloyd, Brown, and Hepburn with the mission at Amoy ; and Messrs. Lowrie, Way, Loomis, Culbertson, and McCartee with the Ningpo mission.

An important auxiliary to these missions is the printing-press. A brief account of this deserves a place in these pages. Preliminary to this notice it should be stated, that in no other heathen country are there so many readers as in China, and that there the process of printing has long been in use. The Chinese method of printing, however, is a very imperfect one; the types are blocks of wood, on which each letter or character has been engraved by the hand of the artist, and the impressions are taken by means of a brush for the ink and a block for the press; the whole being an operation so slow, that only the patience of a Chinaman is equal to its demands. Our admiration, however, is due to the invention itself, and to the neatness and economy of the printing thus executed; but in this day of finished machinery, and of large stereotype editions of the Scriptures and other books, this imperfect process does not suit the exigencies of the Church in her missionary work. On the other hand, a serious and apparently insuperable difficulty in the way of printing, either by machinery or by the use of metallic types, was found in the large number of Chinese letters or characters. This number is estimated at 30,000; a common printing-office case contains but 56.

For a satisfactory statement of the "discovery," as it may well be called, of the method of printing this multitude of Chinese characters with a small number of metallic types, the reader may consult the Annual Report of the Western Foreign Missionary Society, May, 1837. It turns on the distinction between the formatives and primitives in the Chinese language, and between the divisible and indivisible characters. The divisible are reduced to their simplest elements, and being struck off as types, can be re-composed in different characters, so that a comparatively small number of types will serve to express most of the characters in common use. At the instance of the Corresponding Secretary of the Board, whose previous study of this language had prepared him to take a deep interest in this matter, the committee agreed in 1836, to order a set of the matrices for this new mode of printing Chinese. These matrices were made in Paris, at a cost of over $5,000. Types were cast from them in New York, by Mr. Cole; and at Macao both he and Mr. Lowrie gave much time and labor to perfecting the types, arranging the cases, and other things requisite to the practical application of this new invention. Many fears and some predictions of failure were happily disappointed, and its success may be regarded as an era in the history of this people. For several years this mode of printing has been in operation. Large editions of works are printed, from stereotype plates, on improved presses, such as are in use in our own country, which will be driven by steam-power when the Chinese become a Christian people. It is of interest to add, that but for the order given by the committee in 1836 for a set of these matrices, this great invention would probably not have been brought into use. So little confidence was felt in its practicability, that no other missionary institution would give it their patronage. Only one other order was received by the artist, and without at least two orders he could not proceed with the work.

In 1845 the printing-press was removed from Macao to Ningpo, and upwards of 3,500,000 pages were printed. A station was occupied at Chusan, an island not far distant from Ningpo, which was then in the possession of the British. This was an experiment to determine whether other places besides the cities opened under the treaty could be occupied by missionaries; but it was found that the authorities civilly but firmly opposed their permanent residence there, although the people of the island were friendly; and the station was relinquished soon after the island was restored by the British to the Chinese.

In 1846, Dr. and Mrs. Hepburn reached this country, being compelled to return by the state of Mrs. Hepburn's health. In December, the Rev. Messrs. William Speer and John B. French, and Mrs. Speer, arrived at Canton, and the Rev. John W. Quarterman joined the Ningpo mission. A church was organized at Ningpo in May; boarding-schools were opened at Canton and Ningpo; and most of the missionaries were now sufficiently acquainted with the Chinese language to conduct religious services in chapels, and to make known the Gospel by the way-side.

The year 1847 was marked by the death of Mrs. Speer on the 16th of April, and of Mr. Lowrie on the 19th of August—the latter under most afflicting circumstances, by the hands of Chinese pirates.* Mr. Cole's connection with the mission ceased, and Mr. Happer was married to a daughter of Dr. Ball, an American missionary at Canton.

In 1848, the Rev. Messrs. Joseph K. Wight and Henry V. Rankin, and their wives, arrived in China, to join the Ningpo mission. Mr. Brown was compelled to return to this country, by the state of his health, and on the 6th of December Mr. Lloyd was called to his rest. The station at Amoy has not since been occupied by the Board.

In 1849, Mr. Moses S. Coulter and his wife arrived in China—Mr. Coulter having been appointed to take charge of the press at Ningpo, while continuing his studies for the work of the ministry.

In 1850, the Rev. Messrs. Samuel N. and William P. Martin, and their wives, arrived at Ningpo. Mr. Loomis and his wife and Mr. Speer returned to this country, on account of their health. A new mission was formed at Shanghai, to which Mr. Wight and Mr. Culbertson were appointed—the latter with a special view to the work of translating the Scriptures.

In 1851, Mr. French was married to the second daughter of Dr. Ball, the sister of Mrs. Happer; and in 1852, the Rev. John Byers and his wife and Miss Juana M. Knight arrived in China, the latter to be associated with her sister, Mrs. Rankin in the female boarding-school at Ningpo, and Mr. Byers to be stationed at Shanghai. Mr. Coulter was called to his rest, on the 12th of December, and the health of Mr. Byers having given way shortly after reaching his station, he and his wife started on their voyage homewards, but he was also taken to his rest on the 8th of April, 1853. In August, the Rev. John Nevius and his wife

* See Memoirs of the Rev. Walter M. Lowrie: New-York, 1849. Robert Carter & Brothers. He was a member of a Convention of Missionaries at Shanghai, engaged in the translation of the Scriptures, and was returning to his station at Ningpo, when he was taken, as by a martyr's death, to his rest.

sailed for Ningpo, and in November the Rev. Charles F. Preston, and J. G. Kerr, M.D., and his wife, for Canton. In this year also, Dr. McCartee was married to Miss Knight.

In April, 1854, the Rev. Reuben Lowrie and his wife embarked for China, to be connected with the Shanghai mission.

This is but a slight sketch of the missions of the Board in China, yet it shows that an important work is in steady progress. Twelve ministers and two physicians, nearly all of whom are married men, are stationed at the cities of Canton, Shanghai, and Ningpo. The boarding-schools contain about sixty boys and thirty girls, and the day-schools about sixty boys. The church at Ningpo numbers twenty-three communicants. The printing-press at that city has sent forth upwards of 24,000,000 of pages of the Sacred Scriptures and other Christian publications, and is still in effective operation. The medico-missionary labors of Mr. Happer and Dr. McCartee have exerted a wide-spread influence in favor of the Christian religion, which is perceived to inspire its followers with benevolence, and to confer evident blessings on the poor and needy. Dr. McCartee's influence, as a Christian physician, is such as might well be envied by the most favored of his professional brethren in any of our own cities. Numerous chapels, most of them rooms hired for the purpose, are open for religious services, and at Ningpo a large and convenient church has been erected, in which public worship is regularly conducted. The Gospel has been frequently proclaimed, also, at the temples and other places of public concourse, and in the villages in the vicinity of Ningpo.

By means of these various labors, the heaven of divine truth has been extensively diffused, and is producing its appropriate influence. A signal example of this occurred during the last year, in connection with the Ningpo mission. A part of the sacred volume, received from a missionary, was carried by a Chinaman to his own village, at some distance in the interior of the country. It seems to have made no impression on the mind of him who first received it, but it fell into the hands of an aged man, who for fourscore years had been a worshiper of idols. His attention was awakened to consider this new religion, and he concluded to go in search of the giver of this strange book. He came to Ningpo, took up his abode on the premises of one of the missionaries, and spent his time in reading the sacred volume and attending to the instructions of his kind teacher,—often coming with the Bible in his hand to ask for explanations of difficult passages, and manifesting a teachable spirit. After some months thus employed, he gave pleasing evidence of being a subject of divine grace, and was received into the church of Christ by baptism, in the presence of a large congregation of his heathen countrymen.

Could anything more clearly attest that the Gospel is the power of God unto salvation? Commonly we indulge little hope of the conversion of very aged persons, even in Christian lands; but here, in the adorable exercise of God's sovereignty in grace, we see an aged idolator, living far distant from the ministrations of the sanctuary, brought into the communion of the saints! Such an example shows that nothing is too hard for the Almighty.

THE MISSION TO THE CHINESE IN CALIFORNIA properly follows the missions in China itself. The fame of the gold mines has drawn some thousands of this gain-seeking people to our shores. Thus far, they have nearly all come from the province of Canton, and speak the dialect of that province. The Rev. William Speer and his wife commenced their labors amongst them at San Francisco, in the autumn of 1852. Having been stationed at Canton in former years, his health being now restored, Mr. Speer could at once speak to them in their tongue, the wonderful works of God. Their civil relations to each other were now reversed; they are the foreigners, and their missionary could bid them welcome to his native land; accordingly, his visits were well received by them. He found several Chinese patients in the hospital, who were grateful for his instructions and aid; a school was opened, but the attendance was not regular. After some time, an eligible place of worship was secured for a few months, where services were conducted in the Chinese language, with a varying audience. Eventually the liberality of residents of San Francisco provided a suitable building for the use of the mission, in which it is designed to have a school and a chapel, with convenient apartments for the family of the missionary. Many of the Chinese gave handsome donations towards the purchase of this property.

Among the favorable incidents in the brief history of this mission, it may be noted that some of the former pupils in the mission schools in China were found in California. They were predisposed to give a hearty reception to one whose character and motives were at once understood by them. Another favorable providence was the return to China of an influential man, whose influence would have been strongly arrayed against the mission, and the choice as his successor, to be the head of a company or association of Chinese, of a man who looked with a friendly eye upon these efforts for the benefit of his people. Afterwards a few Christians were found, who had been received into the church by missionaries in their native land. Their conduct appears to have been worthy of their profession; they rested from work on the Sabbath, even at the mines, and met together for religious worship; but their wandering life prevented their forming a regular congregation. In the early part of the year 1854, Mr. Speer was permitted to organize a church at San Francisco, with four Chinese communicants, one of whom was ordained as a ruling elder. Thus an auspicious beginning has been made.

The future influence of this mission will of course depend to a considerable extent on the number of Chinese who may seek a temporary or a permanent home in our land. There are causes which render it not unlikely that large numbers of them will come to this country. Some of these have been already referred to ; others need not be here specified. On the other hand, their emigration may be checked, as indeed it was for a time, by the harsh and un-American treatment which they met with from some of our countrymen—or more likely from some of the reprobate foreigners. The impositions to which they are subject at the mines will go far to deter them from remaining, and to prevent others from coming. These oppressions are disgraceful to those who are guilty of them ; but with a better tone of morals at the mines, every thing of this kind must cease. It seems quite clear that our countrymen should encourage and not repel the immigration of the Chinese. They will form a most valuable class of laborers, being industrious, peaceable, and frugal. It may easily come to pass that the Chinese will to a large extent supplant the Negroes, in the cultivation of rice, cotton, and sugar-cane. They will be found to be a superior class of laborers, and every way less expensive. Their employment in this country, not merely in the mines of California, nor in the slave States of the South, but in many avocations in all the States, may become obviously desirable and quite expedient to our own citizens, while it will afford a comfortable subsistence to myriads of our now half-starving fellow-creatures in China. Above all, it will bring them within the reach of Christian instruction and example, and result in the salvation of multitudes of them in our own day and in ages to come. The wonderful ordering of Providence that has already brought so many of them to our shores should awaken attention to their condition, and to the claims on the missionary efforts of the churches of the great nation whom they represent.—Lowrie's Manual of Missions.

AMERICAN BAPTIST MISSIONARY UNION.—The earliest missionaries appointed by this Society for the Chinese were settled at Bangkok, in Siam, and also at Macao. Their labors are given in full in the sketch of the Baptist Mission in that country. These labors were undertaken at a period when China itself was comparatively inaccessible to the missionary or to any foreign residents, and were established at Bangkok and Macao on account of the multitudes of Chinese who are found either permanently residing or frequently visiting those cities. They remained there until the close of the late war between Great Britain and China, when by the treaty, which terminated the war in 1842, the island of Hong-kong, having been ceded to the British Government, the five ports of Canton, Amoy, Fuh-chan, Ningpo, and Shanghai, having been opened to British commerce, Rev. Issachar T. Roberts, Rev. J. L. Shuck, and Rev. Wm. Dean, removed to Hong-kong, the two former from Macao, the latter from Bangkok. Messrs. Dean and Shuck, with their families, established themselves at Victoria, the capital of the island, and Mr. Johnson at Chek-chu, a smaller town on its southern shore. These missionaries had already acquired the language of China, and were familiar with the character and manners of its people. They were fully prepared to commence the work on which they were sent. They were received in Hong-kong with kindness and favor from the British officers and residents, especially from Sir Henry Pottinger, the English ambassador, who had negotiated the treaty. With their assistance, a lot was obtained from the government on which a mission-house was erected, and two commodious chapels were also built to be used alike for public worship and for schools. A church of five native members was organized, and placed under the care of Mr. Shuck, to which four others were added by baptism during the year 1842. At Chek-chu a chapel was also erected, in which Mr. Roberts conducted service both in Chinese and English. He also established a school, which was taught principally by one of the Chinese converts, who had come up from Siam. In this manner, in the summer of 1842 were commenced the first missions of the American Baptists in China. The three missionaries by whom they were planted, had long been waiting at their distant outposts, but they were now for the first time established in China. They were indebted to the protection of the English flag for the opportunities they enjoyed; but they saw the whole empire, with its almost numberless population, opening, as it were, before them. The barriers of ages had at length begun to give way. The day was evidently at hand when the Gospel was to be preached to the millions of China.

In 1843, the mission was bereft of Mrs. Dean, an English lady, who had come to the East, under the auspices of a society of her countrywomen, for "Promoting Female Education." She had married Mr. Dean during his residence in Siam, and both there and in Hong-kong had proved herself a faithful and efficient missionary. At about the same time also Mr. Dean was obliged by ill-health to suspend his labors and for a time to change the climate. In the spring of the same year the mission was reinforced by the arrival of Dr. D. J. Macgowan. He, however, soon repaired to Canton, for the purpose of consulting with Dr. Parker, one of the missionary physicians of the American Board, and at length decided to settle at Ningpo, and there to commence a new mission. In connection with Dr. Macartee, of the American Presbyterian mission, he founded a missionary hospital. The mission had from the beginning been regarded with special favor by many of the English officers, residents in Hong-kong, who had given it their countenance, and contributed liberally to its support. It began with the most gratifying auspices, and a second church was soon established at Victoria. The people heard the Gospel preached by the missionaries in the several dialects of their own tongue. In the summer of 1844 a treaty was concluded between Mr. Cushing, Commissioner of the United States, and an imperial commissioner of China, by the terms of which all the advantages hitherto granted to the English by the treaty of 1842 were guaranteed to citizens of this country, and, in addition, provision was made for the erection of chapels, hospitals, and cemeteries, at each one of the five ports. From this time American missionaries and other American residents began to enjoy many privileges which before they had procured only in consequence of their connection with the English. This provision in the treaty has distinctly recognized the missions as among the national interests in China which the American government designs to protect.

But these prospects of the mission were soon to be shaded by afflicting events, which for a time retarded its progress. In November, 1844, Mrs. Shuck died at Victoria, after a brief illness. She was a native of Virginia, and had sailed from the United States with her husband in 1835. They had resided at Macao until the opening of China to the English in 1842, and she was now cut off at the most interesting epoch in the history of the mission. Mr. Dean, also, at nearly the same time, was obliged to sail for the United States, in order to recruit his health; and was thus withdrawn from his appropriate labors for upwards of two years. In the autumn of 1844, Dr. Devan, a missionary physician, with his wife, arrived at Hong-kong. They subsequently removed to Canton, where a mission-house was purchased and several assistants were employed. But their connection with the mission was of short duration. Mrs. Devan died, much lamented, at Canton, in October, 1846, and her husband, finding himself unable to reside permanently within the tropics, returned to the United States. Mr. Shuck had already returned in 1845, and on the organization of the Southern Baptist Convention, he was transferred to the service of that body, by whom the mission buildings at Canton were purchased.

These changes, however, did not entirely suppress the energies of the missionaries, who remained behind, or prevent the progress and growth of the mission. Hong-kong seemed at that time to offer many advantages, in consequence of the presence of the English, but more especially on account of the superior character of the people who inhabit the island; and many sanguine hopes were then indulged, which have been but imperfectly realized, in the years that have since elapsed. In 1847, Rev. E. C. Lord and his wife were added to the mission at Ningpo, and in 1848, Rev. John Johnson and his wife were added to that at Hong-kong, though Mrs. Johnson was almost immediately removed by death. About the same period, Mr. Goddard removed from Bangkok, where he had, for several years, been engaged in the Chinese department of the mission, and established himself at Ningpo, where, with occasional interruptions, he has since continued to reside. His health had not admitted of regular preaching, and though not without frequent preaching, he has been for the most part engaged in the translation of the Scriptures. This work, at all times, and in all circumstances, is sufficiently difficult and responsible; but the translation into Chinese is attended with peculiar difficulties and embarrassments. In 1843, a plan was formed among the missionaries then in China, of the various denominations from England and America, designed to establish a standard by which the translation of the Scriptures should be regulated and determined. The American Baptist Missionaries appear at first to have thought favorably of the plan; but they afterwards, with the approbation of the Board of Managers, decided not to adopt it, but to complete the translation of their own, which had already been begun. To this work Rev. Messrs. Dean and Goddard have since been devoting their almost constant labors. The New Testament is now nearly all translated; the translation is undergoing the careful revision of both these missionaries, while each one has made a beginning with certain books of the Old Testament.

In 1851, Mr. and Mrs. Lord returned to the United States, in consequence of the declining health of the latter—she has since ceased from her labors. The two stations of the original mission, in Hong-kong and in Ningpo, have been organized as separate missions, though the number of missionaries attached to each remains the same. On the island of Hong-kong, in addition to the principal station at Victoria, there are also four out-stations at which schools and preaching are maintained by as many native assistants and teachers, who are under the immediate supervision of the missionaries. The church connected with this mission numbers, at the present time, about 30 members, who make annual contributions for the support of the native assistants, and for the promotion of the Gospel among their countrymen. The missionaries at Hong-kong are Rev. Messrs. Dean and Johnson, who also employ four assistants and three school teachers. The mission at Ningpo has no out-stations. It has had from the beginning a medical establishment, which has given to Dr. Macgowan unusual facilities in becoming acquainted with the people, and presenting to them the claims of the Gospel. The church here contains ten members. The missionaries now belonging to the mission are, Rev. Messrs. Lord, Goddard, and Knowlton, and Dr. Macgowan. At both these missions, the agencies hitherto employed are substantially the same. They consist in preaching the Gospel and conversation with the people, the circulation of the Scriptures, and of religious books, and the teaching of schools. The results of these agencies, which have now been sustained for upwards of ten years, do not, it is true, realize the hopes with which the missionaries first entered China, on the opening of the five ports in 1842. But these hopes were undoubtedly the offspring of inexperience. It has since been found that it is one thing to have access to the people of a country, and quite another to convert them to the Gospel of Christ. The missionaries, instructed by experience, are still at work, with hopes chastened by the lapse of time. Great changes are taking place in the manners and policy of the people among whom they are dwelling; but still greater changes are preparing through the agencies which Christian missions have established, and will develop themselves in the ages of the future.

Two Missions in China—Statistics in 1854.—Hong-kong mission, 1 station, 4 outstations, 2 missionaries, 1 female assistant, 4 native preachers and assistants, 1 church, six day schools, 75 pupils.

Ningpo mission, 1 station, 4 missionaries, 4 female assistants, 2 native assistants, 1 church, 14 members, 3 day schools, 36 pupils.—PROF. W. GAMMELL.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.—It is now eight years since the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States commenced the missionary work in China. The first missionaries were the Rev. Messrs. Moses C. White and Judson D. Collins, the latter of whom, with the wife of the former, have died in the work. This mission has suffered much in common with all other missions in China, from the agitations growing out of the progress of the revolution going on in that empire. Previous to 1846, the idea of founding a mission in the Empire of China, was often discussed in the periodicals of the Methodist Episcopal Church; and many generous contributions were offered for the object. In conjunction with the General Missionary Committee, the Board in 1847 resolved on its establishment, and the Providence of God soon supplied the men to undertake it. They arrived in Hong-kong in August, 1847, and were kindly received by missionary brethren of all the other denominations. After remaining at Hong-kong a few days, they sailed for their destination, at Fuhchau. Here they soon obtained a residence and gave themselves up to the study of the language, Mr. White, meanwhile, practicing medicine; and by the distribution of books and tracts, they endeavored to make themselves useful among the half-million of people composing the population of the city.

The Rev. H. Hickok and Rev. Robert C. Maclay were sent out in October, 1847, but Mr. Hickok was soon obliged, by failure of his health, to return to the United States. The three brethren who remained went daily into the crowded streets and preached, as well as they were able, "Jesus Christ and him crucified," to the groups who stopped to listen to their voice. They distributed tracts, and the scriptures printed under their own supervision, and found the people eager to receive them. One of the brethren having had the advantage of a partial course of medical study, opened a dispensary, in which he was enabled to treat many cases of disease, giving at the same time, to the patients and their friends, religious instruction and Christian books

Each of the missionaries had under his personal supervision a day school, taught by a Chinese master. In the three schools, they had in 1849, 64 scholars, with an average attendance of 50. Though the labors devoted to this mission thus far, chiefly contemplated prospective results, yet the laborers employed were not without some measure of present encouragement. They perceived a yielding of inveterate prejudices, and a willingness to allow them to occupy portions of the city, in which at first they could get no foothold. And as they became more familiar with the language and customs of the people, they saw greater openings for usefulness. They long and earnestly intreated for reinforcements, and for means to establish a boarding school for the youth of both sexes. The report of the Superintendent of the mission for 1851, gives the following account of their mode of labor: "The only mission chapel we occupy at present, is on the street, not far from the mission residences south of the river. It is small, having in fact been rented rather as a room for the distribution of tracts, than as a regular preaching place. It will seat perhaps fifty persons; and as it is not upon a thronged street it answers very well for addressing such congregations as come in. The preacher, when he goes into the desk here, finds himself in circumstances very different from those which surround him at home. Here come in street passengers, few or many, as the case may be; some will have the poles on which they carry burdens; some packages which they have been buying, or are going to sell; some will be empty handed. They stand or sit, gazing listlessly about, noticing the room and its inmates, especially the stranger. It may be the speaker is going on with his remarks. The incomer expresses aloud to his neighbor, his surprise and delight, that the stranger can speak their language—wonders aloud how long the man has been in the country, or how old he is. Those who are listening to the missionary, probably repeat the words as they fall from his lips—look to those about them, and express their approbation of the truths declared. They may be the most solemn teachings of God's word he thus endorses; and perhaps the next sentence will be to inquire how many thicknesses of clothes the preacher wears, or what viands he eats with his rice. Thus it is, a sense of the solemnity of eternal truths is to be inculcated as well as those truths themselves. Some seem more serious. We are glad of a hearing—are encouraged by a little attention. We scatter the seed, and look forward to the time when he that soweth and he that reapeth shall rejoice together.

"We have distributed a great many tracts. At certain times and in certain places, the people seem beside themselves, in their anxiety to get possession of them. They crowd around, they call out, they push each other, and abuse each other, in order to come at the books. They take without asking, they grasp them and will not let go their hold. Books are seldom destroyed by the Chinese; if not read at once, they are carefully laid aside, and may be read at another time. Sometimes we may go gently on with the distribution; at the same time making remarks. Books distributed from shop to shop are thankfully received, and almost invariably read. Printing is very cheap here, and at a small cost we have published and circulated more than half a million of pages. We have not at present any copies of the Scriptures on hand; we need them, and hope that ere long the questions in regard to the different versions will be so far settled as to allow us to publish an edition."

In 1852, Dr. and Mrs. Wiley, Mr. and Mrs. Colder, and Miss Seely arrived at Fuhchan. Their entrance upon their field of labor was very favorable. Messrs. White and Maclay had each a small chapel erected, when the attendance was good, and an increased attention to the preached word was quite perceptible. Wayside preaching and the distribution of the Scriptures and tracts were prosecuted with diligence: thus sowing the seed of divine truth beside all waters, and humbly looking up to God to give the increase. In their efforts for printing and circulating the Word of God, the missionaries make grateful mention of the kind help they received from the American Bible Society. They are endeavoring to prepare to do their part in the work to which it would seem that God will call the Protestant Church in China, when all the results of the strange revolution now in progress there shall have been developed. Nov. 3d 1853, Mrs. Wiley, wife of Rev. Dr. Wiley, departed this life in the triumphs of faith. She was cut down in the midst of her years and usefulness, far from the land of her birth, and buried among the tombs of idolators; but the cause in which she rendered up her life will never die, but move onward till it covers the wide domains of the Celestial Empire.

The fruits of the mission to China, as the fruits of all missions in old and consolidated heathen states, appear slowly. Perhaps the most valuable and extensive results of such missions do not appear for ages. Confidence in the old religion must be destroyed; conviction in favor of the new must be produced; and when this is done, old habits, as well as the native enmity of the human heart, must be overcome and changed, and new forms of thought and feeling are to be introduced and incorporated into society. It will require centuries to obtain these results.—Annual Reports and Missionary Advocate.—REV. W. BUTLER.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH.—The missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, began its operations in China, in 1848. The first missionaries sent out were the Rev. Charles Taylor, M.D., and Rev. Benj.

Jenkins, D.D., who, with their families, sailed from Boston for Shanghai, April 24, 1848. Dr. Taylor's medical knowledge fitted him for usefulness in that respect also, and his colleague, Dr. Jenkins, possessed extra advantages, being one of the best linguists in the country. To a knowledge of Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, he added an acquaintance with the French, German, and Spanish languages. He is besides, a practical printer, and will be able on that account also, to enlarge his field of usefulness in the Celestial Empire. Both of these brethren engaged to remain in China at least ten years; and, being in the vigor of life, are not so young as to be novices, nor too old to acquire a difficult language, and adapt themselves to the peculiar habits and manners of the Chinese people. On their arrival they devoted themselves to the acquisition of the Chinese language, and meanwhile made themselves useful through the medium of interpreters. The church at home nobly and liberally sustained the mission, and sent the Rev. G. W. E. Cunningham to their help, in 1852. They turned part of their house into a chapel, and soon had an attentive and interesting congregation, and a few souls became deeply concerned for their salvation; one of whom, in particular, has begun to be useful. Accompanied by this native preacher, Liew-seen-sang, they also established regular preaching in the open air, at the principal place of resort in the city. Their school had 34 names on its roll. But the brethren earnestly desire the establishment of two boarding-schools, one for boys, and another for girls. Measures were also in operation for building a church, and setting up a printing-press. But the health of Mrs. Taylor became feeble, and she, with her children, returned to the United States. Shortly after, Mrs. Jenkins's health became prostrate; and in the hope of saving her life, Dr. J. left with her for America. But she continued to sink, and was taken to her eternal rest before she could reach her native land, leaving a bereaved husband and six little ones. Soon after Dr. Jenkins left, and before Shanghai had fallen into the hands of the insurgents, Dr. Taylor set his heart upon penetrating as far as the insurgent camp at Chin-kiang-foo, in order to ascertain what were the real sentiments of the invaders in reference to Christianity, and what would be the result, as to Christian missions, of their triumph. This was a bold and dangerous project, as the city was then besieged by the imperialists, both by land and water; and should he even succeed in evading their vigilance, he knew not what reception he might expect at the hands of the insurgents. But he resolved to make the attempt notwithstanding, and God preserved him in safety. Some account of this expedition will be found under the head of the Chinese Revolution, near the close of this article.

The health of Mrs. Taylor having failed, she was under the necessity of returning to the United States, in the hope of recruiting it. Dr. Taylor, several months afterward, followed her; and he, with Dr. Jenkins, itinerated through the Southern church for some time, bringing the cause of China before them, and arousing a deeper sympathy on its behalf. Shortly after Mr. Taylor left Shanghai (in October, 1853), the city was taken, and for some time the only remaining missionary, Mr. Cunningham, was very much circumscribed in his efforts to do good. But notwithstanding the blockade by the Imperialists, matters have become more settled, and he, with the native local preacher, Liew, is again at his regular work.

The Board of Missions of the Methodist E. Church South feel an increased interest in this field of Christian activity, and at their late annual meeting the sum of $30,000 was appropriated for the support of this mission, the purchase of a printing-press, the erection of a church and a building for a school. They have also strongly reinforced its staff of agents, and by the time these sheets are before our readers, the Rev. Drs. Taylor and Jenkins, accompanied by the Rev. Messrs. Kelly, Belton, and Lambeth, will be on their way to China, or perhaps actually arrived there.—Annual Reports and Missionary Advocate.—REV. W. BUTLER.

WESLEYAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY. — Just about the time that China was thrown open to missionary effort, this society had been making extraordinary exertions for Africa, the West Indies, and the South Seas. After the emancipation of the slaves, the missionaries were largely increased in the West Indies; the new and costly mission to the Gold Coast and Ashantee was established, and the cry from Feejee was responded to; with, at the same time, considerable extension in New Zealand, South Africa, Australia, and India. In 1844, the society had increased the number of its missionaries within ten years, by 123. This rapid extension caused a corresponding outlay, which greatly exceeded the additional income, and debts accumulated upon the committee, which, notwithstanding many instances of truly Christian liberality, have, up to the present time, hindered extension beyond the necessity of keeping what had already been gained; yet the missionaries of the society are this year one hundred and one more than in 1844. Many felt that the call of the society was rather to reinforce missions already begun, than to enter upon a new undertaking, so formidable as China. Yet many yearned for that land. One and another made offerings for the enterprise; one valued branch society held a meeting and raised a considerable sum. Yet with their existing burdens the committee could not proceed; but a sub-committee was appointed, with a view to obtain all desirable information, and make such arrangements as might facilitate a movement when the way seemed to open. But in the autumn of 1850, God selected his own instrument for the commencement of this work. George Piercy, a simple-hearted but interesting young man, in Yorkshire, having been truly converted to God, felt his soul yearning for the salvation of the heathen world. The Spirit of God found him, like Elisha, at the plough, and threw over him the commission of Heaven for the evangelization of China. Without any hesitation he sacrificed the secular pursuits of life, and proceeded to seek direction how he should find his way to that field of labor to which God had called him. About thirty miles from his residence there was a Christian friend of his, Mr. Henry Reed, whom he consulted in reference to his impression that it was his duty to go and labor in China. Mr. Reed did all he could to dissuade him, urging the great difficulty of acquiring the language and the obstacles that he would have to encounter on his arrival, and tried to direct his attention to some other missionary field, that presented less difficulties. But to every argument his reply was: "I believe, sir, that God has called me to labor in China, but I have no such impression that I have a call to any other part of the mission field." At length, however, the young man was persuaded for the time to abandon the idea. But, in about six months he waited upon Mr. Reed again, and stated that the impression upon his mind not only continued, but increased in strength. His friend, satisfied that he was determined to follow up what he believed to be a religious conviction, gave him a letter of introduction to Rev. William Arthur, one of the general secretaries of the society. For reasons already stated, he was not recognized by the committee; but nothing discouraged by their inability to employ him, from his own limited means he paid his passage, and the next information which his friend received was a letter, in which he stated that he was then on his way to that great empire. On his arrival there, the facility with which he acquired the language was amazing, and the openings that he found for labor were equally remarkable.

Mr. Piercy arrived at Hong-kong, January 30, 1851, expecting to find a pious sergeant at the head of a small class of soldiers. The following is his own account of his entrance upon the field, in a letter to the Secretaries of the Society: "Stepping ashore, a stranger in a strange land, with my heart beating hard in my bosom—for I hoped speedily to find Sergeant Ross, and with him and his praying few to tell of the goodness of our common Lord, I walked on towards the barracks. The first I met I addressed, inquiring where I might find Ross. 'He is dead,' was the startling reply. I felt, I knew not how, for a few moments—the loneliness, the utter loneliness of my situation seemed almost to unnerve me. With a faltering tongue, I inquired further, and the particulars of his death were told in tones solemn as my own. The young man evidently felt much as he told of his comrade's sickness and death. I soon inquired as to his circumstances and name. Corporal, now Sergeant D——, was the individual with whom I was conversing. This was most providential, and soon, in a great measure, relieved the feelings which had thus suddenly come into my soul. I soon learned all about Ross and Methodism in Hong-kong. He, to use D——'s words, was a young man, but an old Christian, and had been the centre of a little band, who sought to save their souls, six or seven in number. They had often met in his room; but he fell, and they fell, some with him, a prey to death, and others into the indifference of the world; and D—— stood lonely as I had been myself, upon the deep. He had oft, he said, longed and prayed for a companion, and he thanked God for thus giving him one. In a few minutes we were brothers beloved, thanks be to a God of providence for this direction of his hand!"

Having thus experienced the goodness of a guiding Providence, he soon received a proof of the catholicity of missionary affection, honorable both to Dr. Legge and the London Missionary Society. Mr. Piercy says: "We thought it best to go to Dr. Legge, as he has a good name for a catholic spirit. He was not at home; but we soon found him in the Chinese Chapel, and I heard the Gospel in a strange tongue, utterly strange; though I had tried to learn all the way as I came, a word now and then was all that I could make out. After the service, the young corporal introduced me to the Doctor, and he most kindly offered me a bed in his house for the night, saying, the morning would bring leisure to consider further. I found Dr. Legge a man of God, and soon disclosed all my heart to him. He advised me to do nothing rashly, but look around, and make inquiries, and watch prayerfully for the moving of the cloud of Providence. 'After ten or twelve days, perhaps you will see your way; in the mean time you are welcome to a bed, and the room you have been in, in this house.' This was kind. I thanked God, and took courage."

After residing about three weeks under the hospitable roof of Dr. Legge, Mr. Piercy hired rooms, one of which, capable of containing about sixty persons, he turned into a preaching-place for the English soldiery. He, at the same time, commenced visiting the sick soldiers in the hospital; and, under the kind direction of Dr. Herschberg, of the London Missionary Society, applied himself to the acquisition of some knowledge of medicine, with a view to using it for missionary purposes. The Lord blessed his labors among the soldiers and their wives, and about twenty were soon formed into a society, of whose sincerity he had good hope. Those among whom he had labored showed a disposition to contribute to his support; and, though his own funds were expended much sooner than he expected, what they raised, coupled with small sums sent by friends in England, enabled him to devote all his time to mission work, without taking any secular employment, as, when going out, he had anticipated that he might be obliged to do.

From the first, he looked upon his stay in Hong-kong as but temporary, and was making inquiries, with a view to select a station on the Chinese mainland. After months of useful labor among the soldiery at Hong-kong, he decided on placing himself at Canton, and there he received from Dr. Hobson, also of the London Missionary Society, the same brotherly kindness which he had previously received from Dr. Legge. He gives this account of the prospects: "As to the field before me, I need not say that it is large. I am a temporary resident in a house not far from the factories, close to the river, and to a ferry which 9,000 persons frequently pass in a day. It is a little way into the western suburbs, over which, from a lofty veranda, I have an extensive view. I can look two miles to the west, and two and a half to the north, and in this small space are crowded the abodes and persons of 400,000, if not 500,000 human beings. Through every street of this given space I can pass unmolested, in many places enter shops, and leave a tract or speak a few minutes with the people. I think I perceive a difference in the treatment of foreigners since November last. The free intercourse of the missionary families with the people has had a very beneficial effect. Freedom of movement in the streets and lanes of this suburb is now a settled point. As to the people themselves, there is a moral and mental apathy respecting the truth, which is a great discouragement to the missionary. This must be stated. Yet still, numbers are willing and some desirous, to receive Christian books and tracts. They come into the preaching-rooms, and, in many instances, pay close attention to the speaker. Spiritual apathy and death are stamped deep in the soul. Few ask questions, unless you enter into conversation with them; and a sincere inquirer after God is seldom met with. Their thoughts seem to be: 'This doctrine is good for foreigners, but it is of no use to us: we have our own sages, whose wisdom is undoubted. Jesus is a sage of the West; let the foreigners follow him.' The idolatry and temple rites have no hold of their hearts, but as seasons of show and mirth, of amusement and relaxation from business. In this field are found rich and poor, learned and unlearned in vast numbers. If a Chinese is of equal value with any other human being, what a number of islands and large tracts of territory elsewhere will even this city outweigh!"

After a short residence in Canton, Mr. Piercy offered himself to this society as an agent; and, taking from "Grindrod's Compendium" the questions usually put to a candidate for the ministry at a district meeting, gave written answers; asking that, under the peculiarities of the case, this should be accepted as an examination. The following is his account of his mode of labor: "As to what I am doing here, I wish I could say I am able to do much, but not so; my work is nearly all preparatory, yet I will give you an idea of my daily engagements. Rising early, the first hour is spent in prayer and reading the Scriptures; then, till eight o'clock, I read or write in English, and answer a letter, if pressing. The forenoon is mainly spent in the study of the Chinese colloquial dialect. At twelve service is held in a room below this. Here, though I have not yet commenced to deliver consecutive addresses, I seek to be useful, after an address by the native teacher, who labors here. I try to engage some of the people on the subject of discourse, and make inquiries as to the various statements the preacher has made. Our congregations are not very large. Yet, day by day, they are encouraging and attentive. Tracts are given to all that desire them. After service, I generally return to my room, and study the book language, the classics, &c., and get new words. Part of the afternoon I spend in itinerating through the city. From six to seven, Dr. Hobson's teacher assists me. Then I spend an hour till eight in instructing my boy, and talking with my old teacher on the practical truths of God's word. Afterward, for another hour, I read some spirit-stirring book in English; then self-examination, review of my labors, and prayer to God for mercy to pardon and grace to keep me, close the duties of the day. Often I have found this quiet hour, when all the bustle of this great city is hushed, a season of hallowed enjoyment. Such is the general routine. Nothing breaks it except a visit to a temple, or to see an idolatrous procession, which is a good opportunity to distribute some tracts; perhaps a visit to one of the missionary families. Dr. Hobson has kindly lent me the second part of Dr. Morrison's Dictionary, which is a great help. He, together with Mrs. Hobson, manifests a most affectionate interest towards me, and they are even anxious that my personal piety should not droop."

While these communications were on their way from China, a friend in England was also urging the Committee on. One missionary student at Richmond was so desirous of going out to join Mr. Piercy, that he would gladly have done so, without promise of sustenance, in the hope of finding some situation whereby to support himself. Another young minister had for years his heart set upon China. Just before the time Mr. Piercy's communications reached the Secretaries, urgent requests to be sent came from both these brethren. At the same time, also, the Treasurer of the Society, Mr. Farmer, who had previously offered a thousand pounds for this mission in ten annual instalments, when six had been paid, said that the day two missionaries sailed to join Mr. Piercy, he would complete the payment of the whole sum, and would thenceforth give one hundred per annum for the Chinese mission. Other no less praiseworthy instances of Christian liberality, helped to show the Committee that, in undertaking the responsibility of a mission to China, they would have with them a large amount of practical sympathy from the lovers of the souls of men. The Committee felt that a providential call was now plainly made upon them, and though deeply regretting their inability to do justice to other needy fields, saw that to withhold aid any longer from China would not increase their ability to strengthen old missions. They therefore resolved, in dependence on the bounty of God, to place China on the list of their stations, adopting Mr. Piercy as a missionary, and sending out two brethren, Messrs. William R. Beach and Josiah Cox, with Miss Wannop, a trained teacher from the Westminster Normal Institution. They sailed on the 20th of January, 1852, and arrived safely at Canton, and have entered upon the duties of the mission. For the present, they are mainly occupied in learning the Chinese language.

They relieve their arduous toil by the distribution of tracts, and seek, in all such ways as may open to them, to spread the knowledge and influence of divine truth. Mr. Piercy has commenced preaching in a room in his own house, which was opened as a chapel in June last, and the continual kindness of Dr. Hobson has allowed him the occasional service of Leang Afa, the first convert of Protestant missionaries in China. This venerable man, who was baptized by Dr. Milne, in 1816, preaches once on the Lord's day in the Methodist Chapel. Mr. Piercy takes the other service. A school for boys has also been commenced during the past year, and Mrs. Piercy will probably do something on behalf of the females when she is better acquainted with the colloquial dialect of Canton. Mr. Piercy has translated the first catechism and part of the second, for the use of the mission schools; and some portions of the Scripture narratives have been printed under his direction, to be used as tracts. The missionaries have engaged to distribute ten thousand copies each of the New Testament, to be supplied by the "Million Testament Fund," if spared, during the coming year.

The instrumentality by which this great work was commenced was humble, and to the eye of human wisdom unpromising. The brethren to whom the solemn charge is committed, are young, and the measure of support that can be bestowed upon the enterprize is but small; but in all these points of natural weakness, we see cause for both seeking and expecting the strength that is above nature. Their labors, if they receive grace to be faithful, will do something toward the conversion of the most populous country in existence. The strength of the Wesleyan mission in China, at the close of 1853, was three missionaries, one catechist, one preaching place, and sixteen church members.—Annual Reports, Missionary Notices, and London Watchman.—REV. W. BUTLER.

RHENISH MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—This society sent out Mr. Gutzlaff, about the year 1830, who displayed extraordinary activity, soon became perfectly master of the language, and then made frequent journeys through the coast countries of China, sometimes several leagues up the rivers. The Christian Scriptures, which he was most intent on circulating, were everywhere received with the most intense eagerness. He availed himself of every method, even during the war, for putting or conveying copies of the Christian Scriptures into the hands of the Chinese. The Chinese plenipotentiaries themselves, who had to treat with the English, received, after the war, copies of the Scriptures from his hands.

This society now have a mission in the Quang-tung province, which has about eighty converts, and occupies five preaching places,—six native evangelists being employed. It is stated that the brethren at this post have access to about a million and a half of people. Another German missionary in the same province states, that he has access to about NINETY TOWNS AND VILLAGES, some of which contain ten thousand souls.

CANTON BAPTIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—This society was composed chiefly of native Christians, and supported Rev. Mr. Roberts, who first went out by himself in 1835, and was subsequently supported by the Baptist Board, but has since been separated from it. He had a number of native assistants. Two small chapels were opened in 1845, where preaching was kept up on the Sabbath. In another hired house, about two miles below the foreign factories, a room was fitted up, to accommodate 80 or 90, where preaching was also maintained. Here the missionary and his principal assistant resided Jan. 19, 1845, Wun, a Chinaman, was baptized, after several months' instruction, and a theological class of eight or ten was maintained. This society, however, never was of much account.

BASLE MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—This society have a mission at Hong-kong, with three missionaries, five native catechists, and ninety communicants; but we have not been able to obtain any particular history of its operations.

THE CHINESE REVOLUTION.— One of the most wonderful political and moral movements in national history is the revolution now in progress in China. It is wonderful both in its origin and in its progress. The leader of the insurgents, known as TIEN-TEH, TAE PING WONG, and HUNG SOW CHUEN, according to the accounts that have been published, received his first ideas of Christianity from a tract handed him by Leang-Afa, at the triennial examination at Canton, in 1834. About fourteen years later he placed himself under the religious instruction of Rev. I. J. Roberts, missionary at Canton, and at one time desired baptism, but subsequently he tacitly withdrew his request for reasons unknown. Mr. Roberts regarded him as visionary in his religious views. From Canton he returned into the Kwang-si province, and there proclaimed his views of Christianity. There he met with those who sympathized with him in abhorrence of the popular idolatry and attachment to Christianity, and he and his friends soon became the objects of persecution by the government. They were imprisoned and subjected to such cruelties that one or more of them died. The survivors were driven to arms in self-defence. They issued a proclamation exposing the corruptions of the government, and calling on the people to unite with them in defence of their rights. The oppressed flocked to their standard, and Providence crowned their arms with success. Army after army was sent to crush the infant rebellion, but under God the infant was too strong for the Imperial legions. The Im-perialists were frequently routed, not only in Kwang-si, but by the advancing insurgents in Hupoh and Honan ; and ultimately Nanking, Ching kiang-foo, and other important cities, fell into their hands. No mercy is shown to the Tartars, but men, women and children are indiscriminately slaughtered. By the last accounts they were advancing upon Peking. Though we cannot as yet predict the final result, yet judging from the past, and from their rigid discipline, and the great self-denials to which the revolutionary soldiers cheerfully submit, it would seem probable that victory must ultimately crown their efforts, and that the present idolatrous dynasty must soon fall. If the primary object of this movement had been of a political nature, it seems hardly probable that the insurgents would have ventured on attacking the popular superstitions by the destruction of the idols. They appear, the rather, to have been impelled to this bold and fearless measure by strong religious feeling. They seem to have partaken of the genuine Puritan spirit. At all events, they are true Iconoclasts, the legitimate successors of the renowned Claude of Turin.

Their religious views could not have been received from the Romanists. They are of a decidedly Protestant type. Nor can we reasonably suppose that the religious element of this revolution was derived from any one individual or body of men ; it is rather the consequence of the joint influence of the various Protestant missions in China, and on its borders. The leaven of Christianity has been diffusing itself for years in the popular mind, preparing the way for the revolution which now threatens the very existence of the present corrupt, idolatrous and oppressive dynasty, and promises to open the door to the preaching of the true Gospel throughout China. It is not strange that amid this moral fermentation much of error in opinion and irregularity in practice should be evolved, especially considering the state of the popular mind. It is rather a wonder that in the principles and practice of the insurgents there should be so much to admire and heartily approve. The One Living and true God is their only object of religious worship, and to his aid they attribute all their success, looking to Him for victory. God is daily and unitedly worshiped in the camp and the Sabbath is strictly observed. The ten commandments they regard as their rule of life; and the Christian Trinity, the vicarious atonement of Christ, repentance, and faith in Him, are prominent articles of their faith. Opium and tobacco are rigorously prohibited. They have begun to print the Word of God, and to publish religious tracts.

Rev. Dr. Taylor, whose name has been mentioned in connection with the mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, visited the camp of the revolutionists, while he was at Shanghai. He succeeded, after great exposures, in reaching the city of Ching-kiang-foo, which was then their head-quarters. He threw himself at once upon the mercy of the insurgents, who demanded of him the object of his visit. This he refused to disclose till he was conducted into the presence of the chief. "On my way," he says, "as I passed along, I frequently heard the sound of people chanting; and inquiring of my attendants what was the meaning of these sounds, I was told that the people were worshipping God, and that it was the hour of morning worship. I saw idols thrown down in all directions as I passed through the streets, and I was frequently saluted by the term 'brother.' This was perfectly new, for at Canton the appellation is 'foreign devil;' and while walking in the suburbs of Canton, you will hear this perhaps a hundred times. I at last arrived at the head-quarters, and after passing through a number of gateways, on either side of which were curtains of yellow silk, and a great deal of embroidered drapery of various kinds, for a distance of upwards of 300 or 400 yards from the street, I came at last to the inner recess, and there I was requested to sit. Again I was interrogated as to my object, but I said I must communicate with the chief. He presently made his appearance, but, owing to the simplicity of his dress, I for some time doubted whether he was the chief. In order to remove my doubts, he took his seat in the middle of the hall, and his attendants arrayed him in his robes. And when I was persuaded he was the man, I opened my carpet-bag, spread before him the Gospels, the Acts, and the Tracts, and told him the object of my visit, which was to give him a complete knowledge of the doctrines of Christianity. He seemed grateful for the books, and entertained me hospitably. The hour of breakfast was approaching, and they had morning prayer before breakfast. He and his attendants were seated in this large hall, on cushioned chairs; one individual read a portion of Scripture, and then they chanted some hymns, which the leader probably had composed. At the close of these hymns, I noticed that they chanted a literal translation of the Doxology. After this they all took their cushions, placed them on the pavement, knelt on them, closing their eyes, and lifting up their faces towards heaven, while the secretary of the chief (I think it was,) read a prayer. At the close of this we proceeded to breakfast in the adjoining hall. As a guest it would have been etiquette to have commenced with my "chop sticks" first; but I waited, thinking they would ask a blessing. This I told them, when they informed me it was their custom, but it had been included in the previous prayer. I explained to them that it was not exactly our course, and asked to be allowed to do so; which they requested me to do, and I did it accordingly in Chinese."

Mr. Taylor became fully acquainted with the military resources and ability of the insurgent army, and entertains a strong conviction of their ultimate success. He says:

"I ascertained that these people were sincere worshipers of the one true God; that they had sworn the extermination of idolatry in every form; that they were exceedingly friendly to foreigners, and expressed themselves desirous of becoming more instructed in Christianity, only the difficulties at present were so great, that they thought I had better wait for some months. This movement has for its object the overthrow of the Tartar dynasty, and the establishment of the old Chinese Government. Therefore it is strictly a patriotic movement; and we are in the habit, in China, rather of calling them 'patriots' than 'insurgents.'"

As Christians, we cannot but regard this remarkable movement with the deepest interest; and in view of its developments hitherto, we are compelled to acknowledge that it is the finger of God. We hope and pray that China's redemption from the thralldom of sin and Satan is near at hand. The Lord will hasten his work in his time.

CONCLUDING REMARKS.—In view of the few conversions connected with the labors of Protestant missionaries in China, it may seem as if little had yet been accomplished. But such would not be a fair conclusion, considering the short time that has elapsed since China was opened to Christian missions. With the exception of that at Canton, no Protestant mission was commenced in China previous to 1842. In such a field as China, where idolatry is very strongly fortified, and where cur toms and opinions are sanctified and made venerable by antiquity, much preparatory work must be performed before any very perceptible results appear. Much preparatory work has been performed, and some fruit has already appeared. They have sown in tears, others shall reap in joy, and ultimately both sower and reaper shall rejoice together. It is no small thing that already several translations of the Scriptures have been made, generally intelligible and faithful: a work which the Catholics have not done after centuries of missionary labor, and the professed conversion of hundreds of thousands of souls. The preparation and wide circulation of a great number of valuable works, religious and scientific, is a work not to be despised, to say nothing of the helps to the acquisition of the Chinese which have been furnished. It is something that valuable missionary locations at the several posts have been secured, and numerous chapels built in these cities, in which the Gospel is steadily preached to many thousands of souls. It is impossible to calculate the influence which has already gone out from these humble Christian sanctuaries. The name of Christ, the Christian Sabbath, and the essential doctrines of the Gospel are already somewhat extensively known, if not revered, where a few years since, no ray of Gospel light had penetrated. Many children have learned to lip the name of Jesus; and besides living native Christians, some pious Chinese are now, as we hope, with Christ in heaven. We might point to the present revolution, as in its religious character the fruit of Protestant missionary labor, the ultimate influence of which, no finite mind can predict. But if not an individual soul had been converted nor any perceptible influence exerted upon the public mind by all the efforts of missionaries in China and its neighborhood, we should be under no less obligation to pray and labor and suffer for the salvation of its benighted and perishing millions. The command is to preach the Gospel to every creature, and the greater the obstacles to the accomplishment of this work, the greater should be our efforts till this dark land shall be illumined with its precious light. Upon it a few saving drops of mercy have already fallen, which may be regarded as an earnest of the rich and abundant spiritual blessings yet to be poured upon the land of Sinim.

CHINESE EVANGELICAL SOCIETY: The principal object of this society is to send out Christian medical men to China. Rev. W. Lobscheid and wife have sailed during the past year; and they are expected to labor at Sai-heong. Two young men are in training for the missionary work; and the society has agreed to support three Chinese boys and a young Malay in the school of the Rev. J. G. Bausun; at Pinang, with a view to their becoming evangelists. Christians of different denominations unite in sustaining this missionary organization. It is located in London.

CHINESE EVANGELIZATION SOCIETY: In addition to European agents, six colporteurs are employed in distributing the Scriptures and tracts; and in many places they have been kindly received. The society has also assisted the Rev. I. J. Roberts to prosecute his labors. Before the end of the year, the society hopes to be able to print the entire Scriptures in Chinese. (London.)

CHINESE SOCIETY for Furthering the Promulgation of the Gospel in China and the Adjacent Countries, by means of Native Evangelists.—This society was formed recently at London, during the visit of Dr. Gutzlaff to England. Its object is to incite to prayer for China, to diffuse information in regard to the evangelization of that great empire, and to aid those who enter that field. It is altogether "unsectarian."

CHINTADREPETTAH: a station of the American Board, belonging to the Madras mission, in eastern Hindostan.

CHINSURAH: A town in the province of Bengal, on the west side of the Hoogly river, eighteen miles north of Calcutta. Population about 30,000. It became a station of the London Missionary Society in 1813.

CHITTAGONG: Capital of a district of the same name, at the southern extremity of Bengal, with the Burman empire on the east, and the sea on the west. It is 340 miles east of Calcutta, and is much resorted to by Europeans in Bengal, on account of the beneficial effects of the climate, seas, and salt-water bathing. Here the two idolatrous systems of Brahma and Budha come in contact, and the influence of caste is feeble.

CHUMMORAH: A Karen village in British Burmah, 60 miles from Maulmain, and an out-station of the Maulmain mission of the American Baptist Missionary Union.

CHUNAR: In the north of Hindostan, near Benares, and a station of the Church of England Mission.

CHUPRA: a station of Gosner's Missionary Society, in India, 30 miles W. N. W. of Patna, in the province of Bahar, on the north side of the Ganges.

CHUNDICULLY: A station of the Church Missionary Society in the Jaffna district, Ceylon, being a suburb of the town of Jaffna.

CHUMIE: Station of the United Scotch Presbyterian Church in Kaffraria, South Africa, one missionary.

CHURCH OF ROME: The Roman Catholic Church, or that which recognises the primacy of the Bishop of Rome, at one time embraced all, or nearly all, Christendom. Several of the eastern churches, at various times, adopted ideas which were condemned as heretical or schismatical, by the bishop of Rome, and those who embraced them were cut off from the Roman communion. These formed the mass of those who followed the Greek, Armenian, Chal- daic, and Syrian rites. A portion, however, of each rite never broke off their connection with Rome, or soon returned to it, and are called by Catholic writers "United." In the West, the greatest secession, that of the Refor- mation, took place in the 15th century, and in several countries of northern Europe new sym- bols were introduced, and the belie' and prac- tices of the Church of Rome proscribed by se- vere penalties ; under this state of things many, either voluntarily or involuntarily, embraced the doctrines of the various Reformed Churches.

At present the Roman Catholic Church is considered as embracing the Latin, Slavonic, Greek, Armenian, Syro-Chaldaic, and Coptic rites, which differ only in the language and incidentals of their liturgy, and in some points of discipline : the greatest difference being the celibacy of the clergy and communion under one kind, which are almost exclusively confined to the followers of the Latin rite, never having obtained in the East.

These various rites are jealously guarded as ancient forms, in many cases of apostolical origin, and persons are not without great diffi- culty allowed to pass from one to another or even communicate, although they may worship in churches of other rites. It accordingly hap- pens in some parts that there will be bishops of different rites in the same city, and in Lem- berg, in Austrian Poland, there are three, the Latin, United Greek, and United Armenian.

The doctrines held by all these churches are the same, and their form of church government is identical. The superior clergy consists of priests, bishops, and archbishops, some few of the latter being styled Patriarchs. The inferior clergy, or those in minor orders, consist of the deacons, and some subordinate grades, which differ in number and name in the different rites, and have apparently differed at times in the same rite. In most churches these orders are merely used as steps to the priesthood, and are no longer real offices in practice.

The Bishop of Rome, commonly called the Pope, is Patriarch of the Latins, and as suc- cessor of St. Peter, Primate or Supreme Pon- tiff of the various rites. In the government of the church, his immediate Council is the Col- lege of Cardinals, whose number is limited to seventy, and in whom resides the elective power on the demise of a Pope.

The statistics of the Church of Rome are not easily estimated. The following will perhaps be not far from the truth :

Latin Rite.—Western Europe and Colonies....	164,000,000
Greek Rite.—United Greeks in Greece, Turkey, Russia, and Poland	15,000,000
Slavonic Rite.—Illyria, Dalmatia, Poland....
Armenian Rite.—United Armenians in Turkey, Poland, India, Persia
Syro-Chaldaic Rite.—Maronites, Chaldees, Uni- ted Copts, &c.....	5,000,000
	184,000,000

The Latin Catholics are by far the most numerous. In Italy, Austria, Bavaria, Bel- gium, France, Spain, and Portugal, as well as Spanish and Portuguese America, the Roman Catholic is the religion of the people, in some places established by law, and supported by the government, in others, as Spain, France, Sardinia, Austria, New Grenada, Hayti, more or less fettered by civil laws, which hamper the freedom of the clergy in the exercise of their functions.

In the British Isles, Holland, the Protestant states in Germany, Switzerland, Norway, Swe- den, Denmark, and the Russian Dominions, members of the Church of Rome are subject to disabilities more or less severe, and the pre- sence of their clergy rather connived at than recognized by the state. In all, the church is regularly organized, and governed by bishops, sometimes titular, and thus forming a regular hierarchy, as in Ireland, England, Switzerland, and Germany, at others simply vicars apostolic missionary bishops, commonly called bishops in partibus infidelium, as the see of which they bear the title is now in some Mohammedan or heathen country. In the United States, mem- bers of the Roman Catholic Church are in some states deprived of certain rights, but the exercise of their religion is not fettered by any law.

Support of the Clergy.—Prior to the Refor- mation, the Catholic clergy possessed large estates and received tithes in all parts of Europe. In the reign of Edward VI. the Regents seized much of the church property in England, and in the reign of Elizabeth, the residue, with the tithes, was transferred to the now established church. Since then, the Catholic clergy in England and Ireland, as well as in Scotland, depend on the voluntary contributions of their flocks. The same is the case in Holland, Protestant Germany, and the Scandinavian kingdoms, in the last of which the Catholic religion has been most carefully watched and crushed.

In France the revolution of 1789 swept from the Catholic clergy all their property and tithes; and, on the re-establishment of Christianity by Napoleon, a regular pay was established for all clergy, whether Catholic, Protestant, or Jewish, which still subsists. In 1834 a similar step was taken in Spain, and all church property was seized by the State, which professes to give a salary to each clergyman. In Italy, Canada, and parts of Germany, the tithe system still prevails, but will, in all probability, soon be set aside, and other provision made.

The clergy are commonly spoken of as secular or regular. By secular are meant those living in the world (saeculo), the parish priests, chaplains, &c.: by regulars, those who live according to a certain rule (regula),—that is, members of the various religious orders. These orders consist of men who bind themselves (religare) by the three vows of poverty, chastity and obedience, to the rules of the particular institute which they enter. These vows are called vows of religion, themselves religious, and their state of life religion. These associations have in view, first, the sanctification of the members by retirement, mortification and prayer; secondly, the service of their neighbor, spiritually or corporally. The houses of religious are governed by superiors, sometimes elected by the members, at others appointed by the head of the order, who is generally elected for life.

The members of the orders are generally divided into choir religious, being priests or persons intended for the priesthood, and lay brothers, who never become priests. The religious orders may be divided into the following classes, viz.:

Monks living in Monasteries governed by Abbots, Priors, &c.

Friars living in Convents, governed by Provincials, Commissaries, Wardens, &c.

Regular Clerks living in Colleges, houses, and governed by Provincials, Superiors, &c.

Besides these orders, and analogous to them, are certain Congregations, the members of which are sometimes bound by vows, but which have never been recognized as religious orders by the head of the church. The number and variety of these orders and congregations is very great, and many no longer exist, having been created to meet exigencies that have passed. In the Greek Church, the Basilian Monks are almost the only order, as that of St. Nerses among the Armenians. In the Latin Church the most wide-spread and best known are:

MONASTIC ORDERS.—Purely Contemplative.—Carthusian, Cistercian, including Trappists, Vallumbrosa. Contemplative Mixed.—Benedictine, Camaldulensian, devoted to education, literature, &c.

FRIARS.—Franciscan or Greyfriars, (including Recollects, Observantines, Capuchins, Conventuals), Dominicans or Black Friars, Augustinians or White Friars, Carmelites, Servites, Minims, all devoted to Home and Foreign Missions. Trinitarians, Mercedarians, devoted originally to the redemption of captives from the Turks.

REGULAR CLERKS.—Society of Jesus, Barnabites, devoted to education, home and foreign missions, Regular Clerks of the Pious Schools, and the Ministers of the Sick.

CONGREGATIONS.

Lazarists or Priests of the Mission, devoted to Home and Foreign Missions.

Priests of the Foreign Missions, devoted to Home and Foreign Missions.

Oblates, devoted to Home and Foreign Missions.

Marists, or Society of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary, devoted to Negro Missions.

Picpusians, devoted to Home and Foreign Missions.

Priests of the Holy Cross, devoted to Instruction.

Sulpicians and Eudists, devoted to Theological Seminaries.

Redemptorists, Passionists, Order of Charity, Oratorians, Pretiosissimi Sanguinis, devoted to Home Missions.

BROTHERHOODS (NOT PRIESTS).

Brothers of the Christian Schools, devoted to Instruction.

Brothers of St. Joseph, devoted to Instruction.

Brothers of the Society of Mary, devoted to Instruction.

Brothers of St. John, of God, and of Camillus, devoted to Hospitals.

Besides these orders of men, which embrace many in priests' orders, there are religious orders and congregations of women, bound by the three vows of religion, and living under particular rules. There are Benedictine, Dominican, Franciscan, and Carmelite nuns, all of whom are contemplative. Augustinian nuns, devoted to the sick as the Hospital nuns, or to education as the Ursulines, the Presentation, Visitation, and others, devoted to education. The Congregations are more extended, and the vows are generally made for a single year, or some definite period, after which the member is free to retire. Among them are

The Ladies of the Sacred Heart, and the Sisters of the Congregation, devoted to education.

Sisters of Charity, devoted to education, hospitals, asylums, &c.

Sisters of Mercy, devoted to education, the poor and sick.

Sisters of the Good Shepherd, devoted to the care of Magdalen Asylums.

The Little Sisters of the Poor, devoted to the care of the poor and infirm.

The Sisters of Providence, (black), devoted to the education of colored girls.

JOHN G. SHEA, Esq

CHURCH OF ROME, MISSIONS OF :

The principles on which the missions of the Church of Rome are founded, lie in her claim to apostolic succession, and an unbroken chain of title in her clergy to preach the Gospel and administer the sacraments. The missionaries whom she sends out bear the liturgy of their church, its dogmas and practices, which have left their impression on the language and customs of nations. Before the separation of the Eastern Churches from Rome, the Chaldeans had extended their labors to India and Tartary, and continued their missions long after embracing the doctrines of Nestorius. The Greeks evangelized much of Poland and Russia; and on the final rupture between the Greeks and Latins, the churches in those countries generally adhered to the patriarch of Constantinople. The missions of the Latin church were far more varied and extensive. Under the Roman empire, all Italy, Spain, France, and Britain, were converted, and embraced the Latin rite. When these countries were overrun by the barbarians, Rome again sent her missionaries gradually from country to country, the Celts in Ireland and Scotland, the Franks in France, Goths in Spain and Italy, all embraced her forms. The Saxons in England were converted by Augustine and other Benedictine monks from Italy; then Irish and English monks carried the faith to Germany, Scandinavia, and Iceland, founding churches, which, in their development, extended to Greenland and the coast of North America. By the twelfth century the mass was chanted in Latin from Narraganset Bay to the Baltic and Adriatic. This was chiefly the work of missionaries of the orders of St. Columbanus and St. Benedict. The Crusades and the establishment of the orders of Friars gave a new impulse to the missions. Franciscans and Dominicans carried the faith to India, Tartary, and China, in the 13th century, and throughout Asia planted their convents beside the Nestorian churches. Undeterred by the fanaticism of Islam, they entered the various Mohammedan countries in Asia and Africa, hoping to restore religion on a soil where it had once flourished; and at the same time struggled successfully with Paganism, which still lingered near the shores of the Baltic. The last missions soon triumphed; those in central Asia gradually sunk, as wars made it impossible to keep up communication with Europe. In Mohammedan countries the missionaries have, down to the present time, labored almost in vain, no considerable number of the followers of the prophet having ever been at any one period won to the truth.

The close of the fifteenth century opened to the view of Europe a new world, and a new and free path to India. Spain and Portugal began their career of conquest in both Indies; missionary zeal was excited, and apostolic men from the various orders, and from the ranks of the secular clergy, hastened to attempt the conversion of the natives of the newly discovered regions. In the East, missions were founded in Hindostan, the East India Islands, Japan, China, Tonquin, Abyssinia; in America, the half civilized natives of Peru and Mexico were converted, and their descendants now form the mass of the people, and the Church of Rome has enrolled two of Indian blood among her canonized saints. The nomadic tribes from Labrador to Cape Horn were visited; many were completely gained, in other parts reductions were formed, and such as could be persuaded to enter were instructed alike in the truths of Christianity and the usages of civilized life. Close on these discoveries came the religious feuds of the sixteenth century and the defection of nearly every prince in Northern Europe from the Roman See. State churches were formed in many of the German States, the Scandinavian kingdoms, Holland, England, and Scotland, based on the doctrines of Luther and Calvin. To compel conformity to these, severe laws were passed, and all who adhered to the See of Rome subjected to heavy penalties. The Catholic clergy were outlawed, and every attempt made to prevent any educational establishments which might continue the Catholic feeling or a succession of clergy. This led to a new species of mission: colleges were established in Catholic countries for the education of their fellow believers in the northern countries, and the training of such as wished to enter the priesthood; and from these seminaries, missionaries proceeded to their native country to minister to their brethren, and to gain back such as seemed to repent the late change. Many suffered the penalty of death, but this, as usually happens, only raised up others to fill their places. From this period the Catholic missions are either Home missions for instructing the ignorant and neglected in Catholic countries, or those in which the exercise of religion is permitted: Missions in Protestant countries to supply clergy for the Catholic portion: Missions among schismatics to reunite them to Rome: Missions to Pagan nations. There are no missions intended to operate directly on Protestants of any denomination or Mohammedans, from the fact that any such attempt jeopardized the Catholic body in those countries where penal laws prevail. These missions became at last so important a part of the church government, that Gregory XV. (1621—23) instituted the Congregation De Propaganda Fide, which gave a new impulse to the zeal and fervor of missionaries and all interested in the missionary cause. This congregation or department consisted of thirteen cardinals, two priests, a religious, and a secretary; and to it exclusively was committed the direction of missions and church matters in mission countries. Considerable sums were bestowed by public and private munificence on this department, and under Urban VIII.

the active reformer, a college, usually styled the Urban college, or the Propaganda, was erected and richly endowed. Here candidates for the priesthood and the missions, are received from all quarters of the globe, and a printing-press issues devotional works in a great number of languages.

Besides this college, there soon rose the Armenian College at Venice; the Germanic, English, Irish, and Scotch colleges at Rome, the English college at Rheims and Douay, the Irish and Scotch at Paris, the Irish college at Louvain and Valladolid, and some others, all intended to train the missionaries for their own countries; and at a later date, the Chinese college at Naples was founded in the same view, and of late years, a missionary college has arisen at Drumcondra. Convents and religious houses of various orders were also founded on the continent for natives of the British Isles, and from these also missionaries annually set out for the missions in the English dominions. Most of these latter have, however, since disappeared, swept away by the French revolution, or transferred to England or the United States.

II. Missionary Societies.—There are, properly speaking, no missionary societies in the Catholic church similar to those among Protestants. Three societies, of quite recent origin, the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, centering at Lyons, the Leopoldine Society at Vienna, and the Society of the Holy Childhood in France, raise funds by a small weekly contribution, which the directors distribute to various missions, as they think proper, but over the missionaries and stations they exercise no control. The various missions are conducted entirely independent of this aid, relying, in default of it, on other resources. The last named society is made up of children, and has a special object, the raising of money to save and baptize children exposed to death by their unnatural parents in China and Annam. Besides the aid thus given, some missions have funds established before the present century, and formerly French, Spanish, and Portuguese missionaries received a regular stipend from the government. The great mass of the missions at present are individual efforts, supported by the zeal and sacrifices of the bishops and clergy employed on them.

MISSIONARY STATIONS.

EUROPE.—1. Among the Protestant States of Europe, the only countries where the Catholic church is still a mere mission, are Denmark, Norway, and Sweden. Here the number of Catholics is very small, and no details are published, as many severe civil penalties are still enforced against members, and especially converts of the Roman church. The whole number does not probably exceed 150,000.

2. Turkey.—The United Armenians have an archbishop at Constantinople; the Latins several bishops and vicars apostolic; the distinct missions are those of the Franciscans in Moldavia, Jesuits in Herzegovine, and Lazarists at Constantinople and Salonica, the latter aided in their labors by the Sisters of Charity. The whole number of Latin Christians is estimated at 613,000, and is constantly on the increase.

3. Greece.—In this kingdom there are constant accessions to the Latin and United Greek Churches, especially at Athens, Piræus, Patras, Nauplia, Navarino, and Heraclia. There are, in this kingdom, and the Ionian republic flourishing missions of the Capuchins and Jesuits.

ASIA.—1. Turkey in Asia.—The Franciscans have had missions in the Holy Land since the Crusades, which, more or less active at times, are now pushed with energy. The Jesuits have since their origin had missions among the eastern Christians, won many back to Rome, established schools, and raised the standard of clerical instruction. At Antioch, there are Maronite, United Greek, and Syrian patriarchs, and elsewhere an Armenian and a Chaldean patriarch, all in communion with Rome; and the number of Christians who acknowledge the supremacy of Pius IX., is about a million.

2. Persia.—In this country there is a mission directed by the Lazarists, and protected by France, as well as a United Armenian church well established and tolerated.

3. India.—The Hindoo mission dates back to the conquest of Goa, by the Portuguese, in 1510, and was at first conducted by the Franciscans, Dominicans, and zealous secular priests. Its progress was, however, slow, till the arrival of St. Francis Xavier, in 1542. By his labors, and those of other Fathers of the Society of Jesus, numbers were converted on the Fishery coast, the Islands of Manar and Ceylon, and Travancore, while the former missionaries renewed their efforts in other parts, and gained to Rome all the Chaldaic Christians who had fallen into Nestorianism. The Jesuit mission is, however, the most celebrated, and after Xavier, owed its chief progress to Robert de Nobili nephew to Pope Marcellus II., who originated the plan of having missionaries for each caste, adopting the life of each. He himself became a Brahmin-samassi. The Blessed John de Brito, converted the Maravas, Aquaviva, at Delhi, won Akbar to the Christian religion, and Goes traversed Thibet and Tartary to Peking. These missions were affected by the overthrow of the Portuguese and French power in India, by the persecution of the Danes, by the disputes as to the Malabar rites, by the suppression of the Jesuits, and by the troubles of the French revolution. A large number of converts had, however, been made, and their descendants remained faithful. During the Dutch rule in Ceylon, Catholicity was maintained there by the labors of the Portuguese Oratorians. All Hindostan is now divided into Vicariates apostolic, for European and native Christians; the most extensive Hindoo missions being those of Madura, conducted by the Jesuits; of Mysore, conducted by the priests of the Foreign Missions; and of Ceylon, by the priests of the Oratory; all of which are rapidly gaining the ground lost in darker days.

Hindostan contains 15 vicariates, 16 bishops, a large number of priests, including 500 native clergymen, and nearly four million of Latin and Chaldee Christians. Ceylon contains 2 vicariates, 3 bishops, 150,000 Catholics.

4. Farther India.—The Tonquin mission was founded by the Jesuit Alexander Rhodes, who labored in that field from about 1624 to 1648, and gathered a church of 30,000 Christians. Driven at last from the country, he originated at Paris the Seminary of the Foreign Missions, founded in 1663, and induced the Holy See to appoint bishops to Tonquin. Since then, the priests of the Foreign Missions have had the chief direction of the mission in Annam and the neighboring province of Su Tchuén, in China. The Jesuits also continued their mission, and by the labors of both, many native clergy were formed. The Cochin China mission was founded about the same time by F. Rossi, and passed also to the Foreign Missions. Both churches have undergone terrible persecutions, even of late years, under the Emperor Minh-Menh, but have steadily increased. Tonquin contains six vicariates apostolic, governed by 12 bishops. One of these vicariates (Retord's), in 1847, contained 10 European, 91 native priests, 200 catechists, and about 200,000 Christians. Another (Gauthier's), 2 bishops, 3 European, 43 native priests, 60 catechists, 70,000 Christians. Cochin China contains 3 vicariates apostolic, all directed by clergy of the Seminary of the Foreign Missions and native priests.

Siam, Laos, and Cambodia.—These missions are also directed by the priests of the Foreign Missions and native clergymen. They have been subjected to repeated persecutions, but are now at peace. Ava, Pegu, and Malacca are vicariates, with two bishops and about 10,000 Catholics.

5. China.—The Chinese mission was attempted in the thirteenth century, by John de Montecorvino, who founded a metropolitan See at Peking, which subsisted for over a century. Xavier attempted to restore it in 1552, but died near Canton. After several other attempts, the Jesuits Ruggieri and Pazio, founded a mission, which, under the great Matthew Ricci (1584–1610), obtained a permanent footing in the empire. The early Jesuits adopted the dress of literati, and thus secured the esteem of the Emperors, and would probably have gained them to Christ, but for the Tartar invasion. After that change, persecutions began, and as differences arose between the Jesuits on the one side, and the Dominicans in Fokien, and the priests of Foreign Missions in Suchuen on the other, as to the use of certain ceremonies, these dissensions formed a pretext for very severe edicts. For many years the blood of the Chinese Christians and their missionaries flowed in torrents. At present the church enjoys peace, although the insurgents are decidedly hostile to the Chinese Catholics, and treat them with great severity.

Among the celebrated Chinese missionaries, may be named Ricci, Schall, and Verbiest, mathematicians; Marin, an American, who attempted a mission in 1556; Lopez, a native Chinese priest and bishop; Denis de la Cruz, another Chinese, who died at Carthagena, in South America; Navarrette, Amiot, Sanz, Perboyre, a recent martyr. The suppression of the Jesuits, and the French revolution, seriously affected these missions, by cutting off a supply of learned and adventurous missionaries. Since the restoration of peace in Europe, and especially since the establishment of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, the mission has recovered much of its former extent. At the present time, China contains 15 sees or vicariates, 16 bishops, 84 European priests, 135 native priests, many convents and houses of religious women, and a population of 400,000 Catholics. The great mass of the old Jesuit missions are directed by the French Lazarists; the missions in Suchuen, Yunnan, Quaychoo, and Leaotong, by the priests of the Foreign Missions; those in Chansi, Chensi, and Houquang, by Italian Franciscans; those in Fokien, by Spanish Dominicans; and those in Chantong and Kiangnan, by French Jesuits, who have recently returned.

6. Corea.—Christianity was introduced here from China about 1632, and has since grown amid persecution of the severest kind. The history of the Corean Church is written in blood. Her first neophyte was a martyr; her first Chinese apostle, a martyr; her first native priest, a martyr; her first European missionaries, all martyrs. The number of Catholics is about 12,000, directed by a bishop, two European priests, if still alive, and some native clergy. This mission is entrusted to the Seminary of the Foreign Missions.

7. Mongol Tartary.—This is a Lazarist mission, directed by a bishop, 3 European, 10 native priests, a college seminary, 8 schools, and 5,000 Christians.

8. Manchuria.—A mission under the priests of the Foreign Missions, with a bishop and some European clergymen.

9. Thibet.—Missions were attempted here in the 13th and 14th centuries, by St. Hyacinth of Poland, and Oderic of Friuli; in the 17th century, by the Jesuits and Capuchins; but in the interval Buddhism had grown up and expelled all but the traces of Christianity. The mission was restored in 1846, by the Lazarists, Huc and Gabet. Others have followed, and a bishop has lately been appointed.

East India Islands.—Missions exist on some of these of ancient date, but the data are not very full or recent.

10. Japan.—Christianity was introduced into this empire in 1549, by St. Francis Xavier, who had converted a Japanese at Goa. During a stay of two years he visited several kingdoms, and founded missions which he confided to zealous priests of his order. The faith spread rapidly. In 1562, the Prince of Omura and soon after the Kings of Bungo and Arima, embraced Christianity, and sent a splendid embassy to Pope Gregory XIII. Soon after Taycosoma, a powerful general, usurped the throne, and in 1586 issued a law against Christianity, which his predecessor, Nabunanga, had greatly favored. The number of Christians increased with the persecution, and in 1638, they rose in arms, in Arima, but were crushed by Dutch aid. Since then the faith has been almost entirely extinguished. The number of Christians put to death has been estimated at nearly two millions, and the annals of the Jesuits, Franciscans, and Dominicans are filled with narratives of the deaths of members of their orders, in Japan. Besides Xavier, the greatest missionaries were Valignani, Father John Baptist, a Spanish Franciscan, Philip of Jesus, a Mexican Franciscan, both crucified at Nangasacki, Father Charles Spinola, &c.

The last Catholic priest who entered Japan was M. Sedotti, who, in 1709, found means to land, but he was never again heard of. Within a few years great efforts have been made to reach the forsaken Christians, still said to exist in Japan; and a bishop appointed to the mission has already founded stations on the Lew-Chew islands.

AFRICA.—1. Congo.—The earliest missions were those of Congo, begun by the Dominicans, Franciscans, and Jesuits. From 1500 to about 1560 the success was great; the king and many of his people were converted, native priests ordained, and one raised to the episcopacy. Catholicity flourished here for many years, but insensibly declined for want of priests. The Carmelites established missions in Guinea, the Jesuits in Angola and Loango; and on these chiefly the Catholics of Congo depended, as late as 1622. In 1645, the Capuchins undertook the mission, headed by Fray Francisco de Pampeluna, once a military officer of high rank. This body and their successors continued the mission till about 1700, when Cistercians took their place. About the middle of the last century, the priests of the Foreign Missions established stations in Loango, and converted many. These missions still exist in several parts.

2. Barbary.—Missions have from the earliest times been conducted here by Franciscans, Dominicans, Trinitarians, and Mercedarians, still later by the Jesuits and Lazarists. The number of Christians is, however, very small, and the clergy do not number a score.

3. Egypt.—The Latin mission here is due chiefly to the Jesuits, of whom Father Sicard was the leader. Many Copts were recalled to the Latin Church, and are now directed by Lazarist missionaries, aided by Brothers of the Christian School.

4. Abyssinia.—The Portuguese, about 1530, attempted to convert the schismatics of Abyssinia, and revive morality and learning; but the efforts and the zeal of the Jesuits failed; the missionaries were excluded, after a long persecution. In 1839, the mission was revived by the Lazarists, and a bishop appointed, while the Galla country was allotted to the Capuchins, in 1846. (See Abyssinia.)

5. Madagascar.—The first missions among the Malagasies, was begun by the Lazarists, in 1648, and continued till 1674, when Louis XIV. forbid French vessels to stop at the island. The mission was revived in 1837, by Mr. Dalmond, who founded the station of Nossibe, in 1840. Since 1845, this mission has been confided to the Jesuits, who have made rapid progress.

6. Other parts.—Missions have been founded at different spots on the eastern and western coast, which have been discontinued, or are not yet firmly established. That of Guinea, is the most thriving. A bishop was at first selected for it from among the Catholic clergy in the United States; but on the failure of his health, the mission was transferred to the Society of the Sacred Heart of Jesus and Mary, who still administer it.

OCEANICA.—The first Catholic mission in Oceanica was that of Messrs. Bachelot, Armand, and Short, of the "Congregation of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary," at the Sandwich Islands. They began it in 1826, and continued it till their expulsion by the government in 1832. In the following year Vicars apostolic were appointed, and missions begun at Gambier, Tahiti, and for a second time at the Sandwich Islands. These missions are chiefly directed by priests of the society of Picpry and the Marists. Other stations were begun in New Zealand, at Futuna, in the Marquesas, Nukahwa, and elsewhere. These missions extended so rapidly that several new vicariates were formed, and in spite of martyrdom, disease and shipwreck, they are still advancing. Oceanica now contains 8 bishops, 10 vicariates, and 300 missionaries.

AMERICA. 1. Spanish Missions.—Missions were established in all Spanish America, and great numbers were converted, especially in Mexico and Peru, where their descendants are still, the majority mingled with the Spanish race. Even in Cuba the Spanish blood is much mixed with Indian blood.

The missions among the wild tribes were of a different character. The most celebrated are those of the Jesuits in Paraguay and California, the missions among the Moxos, Abipones, in Chili and New Grenada. Few of these are now properly missions, and are matter for a history rather than a gazetteer.

2. Portuguese Missions.—The missions of Brazil were chiefly conducted by Portuguese Jesuits, who converted several tribes, although their numbers were diminished by the cruelty of the savages on land and pirates at sea. Several of these missions still subsist, but details are not easily accessible as to their numbers and extent.

3. United States and Canada.—The early Catholic Missions in New Mexico, Florida, and California, were Spanish. The natives of New Mexico were converted, and being now Christians, are not considered a mission. In Florida, while a Spanish province, the Indians were converted by Franciscans, and formed villages on the Apalachicola and around the city of St. Augustine. The English drove these Indians from their villages, and their descendants, now called Seminoles or wanderers, have lost all traces of Christianity. The Upper California missions were conducted by Franciscans, and till a recent period were in a very flourishing state, but are now destroyed. The Canada missions were begun by French Jesuits, in Nova Scotia and Maine, about 1612. The Recollects followed, succeeded again by the Jesuits. This mission converted the Abenakis of Maine, now forming two villages in the state of Maine and two in Canada; the Hurons of Upper Canada, a part of whom are Catholics, still at Lorette, near Quebec; a part of the Iroquois or Five nations, who form the three Catholic villages at Caughnawaga, St. Regis and the Lake of the two Mountains; the Algonquins, who form a mission village, with the last-named band of Iroquois; the Micmacs of Nova Scotia, now attended by the secular clergy; the Montagnais, at Chicoutimi and Red River, under a bishop and missionaries; the Ottawas of Lake Superior, who with the Ojibwas and Menomonees are now under the care of Canadian clergy on the north, and on the south, of Bishop Baraga, a philologist, whose talents have been acknowledged by government; the Illinois and Miamis, whose descendants are now on Indian Territory and in Louisiana; the Arkansas, whose descendants, under the name of Kappas, are also there.

The Catholics of Maryland began missions among the neighboring tribes, but tribe and mission have long since disappeared. Since the revolution and the establishment of a Catholic hierarchy in the United States, attention has been gradually turned to the Indian missions; two vicariates are devoted to them alone. That of Upper Michigan contains one bishop, five priests, five schools, and a large number of Catholic Ottawas and Ojibwas; that of Indian territory with a bishop, eight clergymen, four schools, 5,300 Catholics of the Pottawotamies, Osages, Miamis, Illinois, Kansas, and Kappas. Besides these, there are in the diocese of Milwaukee a Menomonee and an Ojibwa mission; in that of St. Paul's, Minnesota, a Sioux, a Winnebago, and three Ojibwa missions; and in Oregon there are missions among the Waskos, Cayusus, Pointed Hearts and Flatheads,—the Indian Catholics of the territory numbering 3,400. Besides these, a few hundred converted Indians are to be found in California.

Among the celebrated missionaries in America may be named Anchieta, Barceze, Las Casas, Bertrand, Solano, Gand, Motolinia, Brebeuf, Druilletes, Chaumonot, Jogues, and in later times Marcoux, De Smet, Point, Belcour.

This is an outline of the widely-extended and much diversified Catholic missions. As to their history, the recent work of Henrion, "Histoire Generale des Missions Catholiques," and the Annals of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith will give a general idea; but the sources are the accounts of the various religious bodies engaged on the several missions, voluminous works which would alone form a library.—JOHN G. SHEA, Esq.

CHURCH HILL: A station of the Church Missionary Society, on the Island of Jamaica, W. I.

CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY: This Society was formed in the year 1800. The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, and that for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, had long existed, and received the benefactions from the Church of England. But as they both confined themselves chiefly to foreign parts, where Christianity was already embraced, there was, in the view of the friends of Foreign Missions, still room left for a Society which should consider the heathen as its principal care.

This Society was organized on the principle of making a specified contribution the condition of membership. Seven governors and a treasurer are elected by the members; also a general committee, consisting of these officers and twenty-five other members, for the general direction of its affairs.

The constitution and practice of this Society are regarded by its members and managers as in strict conformity with ecclesiastical principles, as they are recognized in the constitution and practice of the Church of England. It exercises no spiritual or ecclesiastical functions; but is an "institution for discharging the temporal and lay offices necessary for the preaching of the Gospel among the heathen.

The Society was originally designed to operate in Africa and the East, and this is incorporated in its name, "The Church Missionary Society for Africa and the East." But it has extended its operations beyond these bounds. It now has missions in Africa, India, the Mediterranean, the West Indies, Australasia, and North-west America. The missions of this Society, particularly in Africa, India, and New Zealand, have been among the most successful of Protestant missions. Its missionaries have generally been devoted men of God; and the Holy Spirit has been poured out in a wonderful manner upon several of its missions, producing the most surprising changes in a brief period of time. The state of the missions of this Society in the year 1852 will appear from the following

Income.—The following table shows the receipts of the Society, from its commencement, in periods of four years, with the average annual receipts of each period; from which it appears that the average annual receipts have been regularly and steadily advancing, with occasional slight depressions, from £321 to £123,000, which may be regarded as a fair index of the missionary spirit in the Church of England. And, it is to be especially noticed here, as in other societies, that, beyond a certain point, they begin to receive back a revenue from the churches they have planted In 1853, the Church Missionary Society received from its missions £10,783, being about one-tenth of its whole income.

CISTERCIAN : A reformed Benedictine monk.

CLARKSON : Station of the United Brethren, on the Zitzekamma rivers, in South Africa, among the Fingoes.

CLEAR-WATER: Once a station of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Oregon.

CLOUDY-BAY: A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society in New Zealand, on the north-eastern side of the middle island.

CLOISTER: A monastery or nunnery; a house where monks or nuns reside.

COCHIN: The chief city of a principality of the same name, extending along the western coast of Southern India, between Malabar and Travancore, and under the nominal government of a native rajah. A station of the Church of Scotland Mission to the Jews.

COIMBATOUR: The capital of a district of the same name, in the Madras presidency, South India, 270 miles south-west of Madras. The London Missionary Society commenced operations here in 1830.

COLOMBO: A seaport town of Ceylon, the modern capital of the island and seat of government, situated on the west coast. The fort contains the residences of the governor and most of the British inhabitants. The pettah, or inner town, has a mixed population of Dutch, Portuguese, and their descendants. The native Ceylonese reside chiefly in the suburbs. The town within the walls is regularly laid out, and built very much in the European style. Colombo is situated in the centre of the cinnamon country, and is the depot for nearly all the foreign trade of the island, and has a somewhat extensive trade by means of internal navigation. Its climate is healthy, though destructive of books, clothing, &c. This is the residence of the Bishop of the Church of England for the Bishopric of Ceylon, and the missionaries of the Church Missionary Society and of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, are under his jurisdiction. The Baptists and Wesleyans have each their missionary stations at Colombo.

COLESBERG: Station of the London and Wesleyan Missionary Societies, in South Africa, in the district of Colesberg, near the Cradock river.

COMBACONUM: A station of the London Missionary Society, on the eastern coast of southern Hindostan, 25 miles from Tanjore. It was formerly the capital of the Cholas, one of the most ancient Hindoo dynasties in the south of India of which any traces have been discovered, and who gave their name to the whole coast of Cholanundul, or Coromandel. The population is about 40,000.

CONSTANTINOPLE: The first and largest station of the American Board among the Armenians and Jews of Turkey, and where the Free Church of Scotland and London Jews' Society have missions to the Jews. Lat. 41° N., long. 29° E. This magnificent city, the capital of the Turkish empire, has a population according to the best estimates, of about 500,000 in the city proper, and of about as much more in the suburbs on the north side of the harbor, and on the Bosphorus. Taking the whole together, it may be divided as follows: Turks and other Mohammedans, 500,000; Greeks, (including all of the Greek church) 200,000; Armenians, 160,000; Jews, 80,000; Franks (foreigners not subject to the Porte, and who wear the hat instead of other head-dresses,) 40,000; and 20,000 not included under the other heads. (See Armenians and Oriental Christians.)

COPTS: A name given to the descendants of the ancient Egyptians, who profess the Christian faith according to the sect of the Jacobites or Eutychians, called Monophysites, from their distinguishing tenet. They differ in many points of doctrine and practice from the Greeks and Latins; but the principal ground of their separation from other Christians lies in their belief in relation to the nature of Christ. They maintain that the divine and human natures so coalesce as to become one, and therefore they reject the council of Chalcedon and the epistle of Leo the Great. Their government is episcopal; and they have a patriarch or metropolitan, at Alexandria, who is head of the whole church, and is said to have 140 bishoprics in Egypt, Syria, Nubia, and other countries, besides the Abuna of Abyssinia, who is also nominated and consecrated by him.

Eutychius, Patriarch of Alexandria, was the first who maintained the Monophysite doctrine, for which he was excommunicated, and died in exile. But his party, with Dioscorus at their head, shortly after, called a council at Ephesus, in opposition to that of Chalcedon, which had condemned Eutychius, and in their turn excommunicated the Pope and all the bishops who adhered to him. This is the origin of the breach between the Latin and Alexandrian churches, which all the efforts of Rome, for centuries, have failed to heal. Dioscorus was, however, anathematized and banished; but his successor, who was nominated by the court at Constantinople, was assassinated by the Monophysites. After this, there were two patriarchs; and the Greek party being favored by the government, obtained the ascendancy. But on the invasion by the Turks, the Monophysites joined the invaders, and thus obtained the confirmation of all their privileges, and ascendancy over their rivals. They practice both circumcision and baptism. Confession is observed, but instead of being private and particular, it is public and general. They are strict in their fasts, and loose in their morals. Divorce is allowed on easy terms.

The Patriarch of Alexandria is chosen by the bishops of the Coptic church. He is obliged to preach once a year to his clergy, while their province is, on set days, to read homilies and legends to the laity. The priests and inferior ministers are allowed to marry before ordination. None but the lowest classes become ecclesiastics, who are excessively ignorant, yet held in reverence by the people. Mo.

nastic life is held in high esteem, those who devote themselves to it living in great austerity, in deserts, sleeping in their clothes on the ground, and every evening prostrating themselves 150 times with their face and breast on the ground. But they are all of the lowest class of people, and live on alms. The present condition of the Copts may be learned from the following extract of a letter written in 1840, to the Christian Knowledge Society, by Rev. H. Tattam: "I have just returned from visiting the Coptic Christians in every part of Egypt; and during my stay in the country, I entered most of their convents. They are in a very low state, as regards pure Christianity, having only its name and form, without the influence of Christian principle upon the heart and life. The Christian religion is now fully tolerated, and all its professors, of every denomination, receive protection, and enjoy equal privileges with the Mohammedans. Although learning is at a low ebb among the Copts, yet they recognize the right of the people to possess the Scriptures. They are accessible, and will read any publications presented them by English Christians. They have a poor translation of the Old Testament, in Arabic manuscript, and a better one of the New."—Edinburgh Encyclopedia; Mosheim; Buck; Missionary Guide Book. For missions see EGYPT and ABYSSINIA.

COPAY: A station of the Church Missionary Society, five miles from the town of Jaffna, Ceylon.

CORISCO: A small island on the western coast of Africa, 55 miles north of the equator, and 15 to 20 miles from the mainland, in the Bay of Corisco, having a population of about 4,000. The Presbyterian Board have a station here.

CORFU: One of the Ionian islands, and capital of the Ionian Republic, for some time the principal residence of the American Baptist missionaries in Greece, and still the seat of the only school in their mission.

COTTAYAM: A station of the Church Missionary Society in Southern India.

COTTA: A populous district in Ceylon, within a few miles of Colombo, a principal station of the Church Missionary Society. Its situation is peculiarly beautiful, being on the verge of vast gardens of cinnamon, and surrounded with natural forests, interspersed with gardens of spices, and groves of cocoanut and palm.

CRADOCK: Station of the London and Wesleyan Missionary Societies in South Africa, in the district of Cradock, north-east of Graaf-Reinet.

CRUDA: A village in Arracan, and an out-station of the Arracan Mission of the American Baptist Missionary Union.

CUDDALORE: A maritime town in the Carnatic, India, extensive and populous. One of the early stations of the Christian Knowledge Society, and now a station of the Gospel Propagation Society.

CUDDAPAH: A station of the London Missionary Society, directly west of Nellore, and some 50 miles north-west of Madras. The province of Cuddapah is about 170 by 120 miles in extent, and contains a population of over a million.

CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, BOARD OF MISSIONS: The General Assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church have a Board of Foreign and Domestic Missions, which resolved at its annual meeting in 1853, to establish two foreign missions in the course of the year. Previous to that, for several years they had cultivated the spirit of domestic missions, by calling on the churches to aid in establishing new churches and sustaining preachers at Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Louisville, St. Louis, and Alton; and also in Keokuk, Ia. Several brethren were sent out to Oregon, California, and Texas. The Board of Missions, have employed special agents to travel through the churches, and take up collections, besides using their numerous papers and the pulpit, to wake a deep and lasting missionary spirit throughout the 100,000 members now composing their church. They have a great amount of wealth among their people, and with their new Theological Seminary, and more than half a dozen colleges, containing a large number looking forward to the ministry, what may we not expect when the fact is known, that the destitute thousands of a new country, just reclaimed from the savages, called their body into existence?—REV. S. WELLS.

CUTTACK: A town in Eastern Hindostan, on the coast of the Bay of Bengal, 250 miles S. W. from Calcutta, and 770 miles north-east from Madras. The population of the town is supposed to be about 40,000. There are 7000 houses, built mostly of mud walls, thatched with a long coarse grass. A few are built of stone and brick. The town contains a number of idol temples, but none of them much celebrated. The English General Baptists established a mission at Cuttack in 1822.

DACCA: A large town in Bengal, 190 miles N.E. from Calcutta. Population about 300,000. Occupied by the English Baptists in 1816.

DAMARA COUNTRY: The country of the Damara, Namaqualand, South Africa, occupied by the Wesleyans.

DANISH AKRA: See Akra.

DARJEELING: A station of Gossner's Missionary Society in Hindostan.

DARLISTON: A station of the Gospel Propagation Society in Jamaica, W. I.

DAVYTON: A station of the London Missionary Society in Jamaica, W. I.

DEDGAUM: A station of the Am. Board in Hindostan, belonging to the Ahmednuggur Mission.

DELAWARE: The chief town of the Delaware tribe, in the Indian territory, and the seat of the Delaware mission of the American Baptist Missionary Union.

DELHI: A celebrated city in the presidency of Bengal, capital of a province of the same name, and the ancient metropolis of the Palan and Mogul empires. It is situated on the Jumna, 830 miles N. W. of Calcutta—traveling distance, 960. Population about 200,000. In its period of splendor, Delhi was a city of vast extent, as is evinced by its ruins, which are supposed to cover nearly as large a surface as London, Westminster, and Southwark. The present city is about seven miles in circuit, and, although it bears no comparison with the ancient city, which is said to have contained two millions of inhabitants; yet there are few, if any, of the ancient cities of Hindostan, which, at the present time, will be found to rival modern Delhi in the wealth of its bazars, or in the activity and enterprize of its population. The ruins of old Delhi cover the plains for an extent of nearly eight miles to the south of the modern city, and connect it with the village of Cuttuh, exhibiting, throughout this vast tract, one of the most striking scenes of desolation to be met with in the whole world. It has not been the scene of much important missionary labor, except by the English Baptists, who commenced their operations here in 1818.

DEMARARA: See West Indies.

DHARWAR: A fortified town in the province of Bejapoor, India, and capital of a district of the same name. Population of the district, 600,000. A station of the German Missionary Society.

DIEP RIVER: A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society in Little Namaqualand, South Africa.

DINDIGUL: A station of the American Board in Southern Hindostan, connected with the Madura Mission.

DINAJPOOR: Capital of a district of the same name in India, about 260 miles north of Calcutta. Population, 20,000. A station of the Baptist Missionary Society.

DOHNAVOOR: A station of the Church Missionary Society, in the Tinnevely district, Hindostan.

DOMINICA: See West Indies.

DONG-YAHN: A Karen village, 33 miles from Maulmain, in Burmah, and an out-station of the Maulmain Mission of the American Baptist Missionary Union.

DRY HARBOR: A station of the London Missionary Society in Jamaica, W. I.

DRY RIVER: A station of the Wesleyans in Trinidad, W. I.

DUKE TOWN: Station of the United Presbyterian Synod of Scotland, about 50 miles from the mouth of the Old Calabar river, in West Africa.

D'URBAN: A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society among the Fingoes, in Kaffraria, S. A. Also, a station of the same Society in the Natal district, same as Port Natal.

DWIGHT: A station of the American Board among the Cherokee Indians.

DYSALSDORP: Station of the London Missionary Society in South Africa, 45 miles north of Pocaltsdorp, commenced in 1838. This station presents a very extensive field for missionary operations. In the neighborhood, there is a tract of country, the Congo, very densely populated.

EARLY CHRISTIAN MISSIONS: Christianity is essentially missionary. Its Great Author announced it to the world as the only true religion; and it has ever been aggressive in its character. The missionary enterprize is but Christianity in action, carrying out the design of its Founder, to subdue the whole world to himself. This was the spirit that animated the apostles after the wonderful impulse which they received on the day of Pentecost, as they went everywhere, in obedience to Christ's last command, to preach the Gospel to every creature. PAUL, who received his commission directly from Christ, after His ascension, was the first foreign missionary, having been appointed as the apostle to the Gentiles; and the graphic record of his labors and successes, contained in the Acts of the Apostles, shows how well he fulfilled his commission, and presents him, for all time to come, as the MODEL MISSIONARY. Respecting the labors of the other apostles, we possess but slender information. A few brief notices in the Acts, and some vague and uncertain accounts from ecclesiastical history, are all that have reached us. Yet these, taken in connection with the established fact, that in the course of a single generation, the Gospel was propagated throughout the then known world, are sufficient to show that their lives must have been devoted to the missionary work. PETER appears to have directed his labors chiefly to the dispersed Jews, to whom his epistles are directed. Christian antiquity ascribes to him a settlement in Antioch; and afterwards in Parthia; but he appears to have extended his missionary tours as far as Babylon, where his first epistle is dated, and which is supposed by some to have been the metropolis of the eastern dispersion of the Jews. Eusebius states that he was brought to Rome by the providence of God, to oppose the heretical schemes of Simon Magnus; and this statement seems to be confirmed by the recently discovered work of Hippolytus. And tradition makes him to have suffered crucifixion at that place, being placed on the cross at his own request, with his head downwards, deeming himself unworthy to suffer after the manner of his Master. But the whole statement as to his ever having been at Rome is of questionable authority.

JAMES, the son of Zebedee, is represented as having labored among the Jews who were scattered abroad in Asia Minor, and the neighboring countries; but as he resided several years at Jerusalem, and finally fell a sacrifice to the cruelty of Herod, it is not probable that his travels were either frequent or extensive. ANDREW seems to have chosen Scythia and the adjacent countries as the scene of his missionary exertions. He passed along the shore of the Euxine Sea, and returned to Byzantium, now called Constantinople, where he labored in word and doctrine with considerable success. He afterwards traveled through Thrace, Macedonia, Thessaly, Achaia, and Epirus, preaching repentance and forgiveness of sins in the name of Jesus Christ. PHILIP is considered as the apostle of Upper Asia, and is supposed, in conjunction with Andrew, to have sown the seed of Divine truth among the inhabitants of Scythia. In the latter part of his life he preached at Hierapolis, in Phrygia, where he sealed his mission with his blood. BARTHOLOMEW, who is supposed to be the same with Nathaniel, extended his travels as far as India, on this side the Ganges, where he instructed the inhabitants in the revelation of Divine truth, and at his departure presented them a copy of the Gospel of Matthew. He is also said to have preached in Lycaonia. THOMAS, according to the testimony of Jerome, was a very active and useful missionary, who labored among the Medes, Persians, Parthians, Bactrians, Carmanians, Hyrcanians, and Magians. The Portuguese, when they visited India in the sixteenth century, discovered traditions and ancient monuments, which they regarded as evidence that this apostle had preached there. The Chaldean Christians throughout all Asia regard Thomas as their apostle; and the Syrian Christians of India, on the Coromandel and Malabar coasts, to the number of 200,000, hold, with a constant and uniform tradition, that this apostle was the founder of their churches. He is said also to have visited Ceylon. These existing traditions are corroborated by ancient writers.

MATTHEW, or LEVI, the son of Alphaeus, is said to have remained for some time in Judæa, declaring the glad tidings of salvation; and there to have written his Gospel, about the time that the apostles Peter and Paul suffered martyrdom at Rome. He then went as a missionary into Ethiopia, Persia, Parthia, and India; and, either in the latter of these places, or in Abyssinia, he suffered martyrdom. SIMON, called Zelotes, appears to have traveled through Egypt, Cyrene, Asia, Libya, and Mauritania. Nicephorus asserts that he introduced the Gospel to Britain, where he preached, and wrought many miracles. Others, however, are of opinion that he directed his route toward Persia, where he labored till he received the crown of martyrdom.

JOHN, the beloved disciple, called John the Divine, shared, for some time, with Peter, in preaching, working miracles, and enduring severe persecution at Jerusalem; and in Samaritan the Holy Ghost was given by imposition of their hands. About A. D. 52, this apostle continued as "a pillar" of the Christian Church in Judæa; and, after that period, he is said to have carried the word of life to the inhabitants of Parthia and India; but it is more evident that he labored for some time in Asia Minor. In the persecution which raged under Domitian, about A. D. 95, he was banished to the isle of Patmos, where he was providentially preserved, and favored with a series of the most important visions. Under the reign of the emperor Nerva, he was recalled from exile, and returned to Ephesus, where he continued to preach the Gospel of Christ, till, at length, he peacefully breathed out his soul into the hands of his Redeemer, in the ninety-ninth year of his age.

JUDE, or Judas, not Iscariot, commenced his missionary labors in Judæa, Galilee, Samaritan, and Idumea; and afterwards extended his travels to Mesopotamia, Persia, Armenia, and Libya; and, either in the latter place or in Persia, the faithfulness of his preaching was rewarded by a cruel death. JAMES THE LESS does not seem to have extended his labors beyond the Jewish metropolis, where he met his death at the hands of the Jews.

For a fuller account of the labors of each of the apostles, see a summary in Fabricius Lux Evang. cap. 5, pp. 95-114; Lardner XVII. p. 239; Prof. Burton's Eccles. Hist. I. 281.

From highly respectable authorities, it would appear that the Gospel was preached in Britain in the first century. Bishop Stillingfleet is decidedly of opinion that a Christian church was planted in this island, in the time of the apostles; as Eusebius distinctly states that some of them had "passed over the ocean, and preached in the British isles:" and Theodoret mentions the Britons among the nations whom the "fishermen, publicans, and tentmakers," as he styles them, had induced to embrace the religion of the crucified Jesus. Gildas, the earliest of our British historians, speaking of the memorable revolt and overthrow of the Britons under Boadicea, about A. D. 60, gives us to understand that the Gospel then began to be successfully published in the country; and the correctness of his statement is supported by those ancient Cambrian records, called the Friades. In these it is stated that the celebrated Caractacus, who, after a war of nine years, was betrayed to the Romans, was, together with his father, Brennius, and the whole family, carried prisoners to Rome, about the year 53, where they remained for a period of seven years. At this time the word of life was preached in the imperial city; and Brennius, with others of his family, became professed members of the Christian church. At the expiration of seven years they were permitted to return, and were thus furnished with a favorable opportunity of introducing the Gospel into their own country. It is also said that three Christians, one an Israelite, and the other two Gentiles, with whom they had been in the habit of associating, accompanied them from Rome, and became instrumental, as preachers, in reclaiming many of the Britons from their ancient superstitions, and instructing them in "the truth, as it is in Jesus."

It does not appear that Caractacus himself embraced the faith of Christ at Rome; but his son Cyllin, and his daughter Eigar, are both ranked among the British saints. That son is represented as the grandfather of King Lucius, who made great exertions for the promotion of Christianity in Siluria, the country of his ancestors; and even the celebrated King Arthur seems to have been a descendant of this family. Eigar, the daughter of Caractacus, is said to have bestowed her hand on a British chieftain, whose domain, called Caer Sarlog, is now known by the name of Old Sarum; and Claudia, one of her sisters, is supposed to have become the wife of a Roman senator, named Pudens.

Within little more than one hundred years from our Saviour's passion, Justin Martyr places Christians in every country known to the Romans, which must have included Britain. Irenæus also asserts, that our holy religion was propagated to earth's utmost bounds by the Apostles and their disciples. Again he mentions the Celts among the nations then enlightened, the Celtic race being then seated in the British Isles. Tertullian speaks of British districts inaccessible to Roman arms, but subdued by Christ. Dr. Adam Clarke sums up at length the evidence relating to this subject; and to his argument the curious reader is referred. It appears evident, however, not only that there was Christianity in Britain at a very early period, but that there was a regulated Church, with its bishops, who were summoned to foreign councils, where matters of vital importance were discussed and determined, long before Augustine was sent by Gregory the Great, to convert the British Isles to Rome.

Most faithfully did the first preachers of Christianity fulfil their commission; for by them the Gospel was preached, not only to Jews, Greeks, and Romans, but also to Britons, Gauls, Spaniards, Hindoos, Arabians, Persians, and Scythians. Others were sent out by them who emulated their fidelity. An oriental writer relates that all Persia, all parts of Assyria, Armenia, and Media, the regions about Babylon, Huz, and Gala, to the borders of India, received the Gospel and its institutions, from the hands of Agheus, the silk-weaver, the disciple of the Apostle Haddens or Thaddeus. This took place about fifteen years after the ascension of our Lord.—See Yeates's Indian Church History, pp. 27, 29.

CENTURY II.—In the second century, the march of divine truth was steady and triumphant. Eusebius informs us that the followers of the Apostles imitated their example, in distributing their worldly goods among the necessitous believers; and quitting their own country, went forth into distant lands to propagate the Gospel. Among them were Andronicus, Aristarchus, Crescens, Marcus, Sylvanus, and Trophimus; and to these were afterwards added Pantænus, who traveled into India; and Irenæus and Pothinus, who came from Smyrna and settled in France. Tradition relates that Irenæus was sent by Polycarp into Gaul, (circ. A.D. 160.) It is added also, that Pothinus received a similar commission. (Greg. Turon. History France, I. p. 27; and Cave's Lives Fathers, p. 162.) Pantænus, master of a school of philosophy, in Alexandria, was sent by Demetrius, bishop of that city, to India, where he remained several years; and on his return, is said to have brought with him a copy of the Gospel of Matthew in Hebrew, which had been left by Bartholomew. Athenagoras, who, towards the end of this century wrote an apology for the Christian religion, says, "The Christians made small account of the present life, but were intent only on contemplating God, and the divine Word, who is from him; what union the Son has with the Father; what communion the Father has with the Son; what the Spirit is; and what are the union and distinction subsisting between the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit." Bardasanes, of Mesopotamia, in alluding to the influence of the Gospel on its professors, says, "In Parthia, polygamy is allowed and practiced; but the Christians of that country practice it not. In Persia, the same may be said with regard to incest. And in Bactria and Gaul, where the rites of matrimony are defiled with impunity, the Christians act not thus. In fact wherever they reside, their practice triumphs over the worst of customs, and the worst of laws." While the doctrines of the cross were progressively spreading, through the labors of devoted missionaries; while the lives and deportment of the converts illustrated the divine origin and beneficial effects of those doctrines; the great work of translating the Holy Scriptures occupied the hearts and hands of many others. Latin versions of the oracles of truth were multiplied. That which was styled the Italic version was considered decidedly the best. The Syriac, Ethiopian, and Egyptian versions appeared at no great distance of time; but their dates cannot now be ascertained with precision. The blessed truths, however, which they contained, were so powerfully owned and blessed of God, that wherever they circulated, like a fertilizing stream, they transformed the moral desert into the garden of the Lord.—Smith, I. p. 26.

CENTURY III.—In the third century, the progress of Christianity in the world was very considerable, though, with respect to the particular countries into which it was introduced, the same degree of uncertainty prevails, as was noticed in the second. Origen having been invited from Alexandria by an Arabian prince, succeeded in converting a tribe of wandering Arabs to the Christian faith. The fierce and war-like nation of the Goths, who, inhabiting the countries of Mœsia and Thrace, made perpetual incursions into the neighboring provinces, and some likewise of the adjoining tribes of Sarmatia, received the knowledge of the Gospel by means of several bishops, who were either sent thither from Asia or had become their captives. These venerable teachers, by the power of their doctrine, and the sanctity of their lives, became the instruments of converting great numbers, and in time, of softening and civilizing this rude and barbarous people. Fabian, Bishop of Rome, sent Dionysius and six other missionaries into Gaul; and during the reign of the Emperor Decius (A. D. 250), and in the midst of his persecutions, the Christian churches, which had hitherto been chiefly confined to the neighborhood of Lyons and Vienne, were considerably increased. By the labors of many pious and zealous men, among whom was Saturninus, the first bishop of Toulouse, churches were founded at Paris, Tours, Arles, Narbonne, and several other places. From these sources, the knowledge of the Gospel spread, in a short time, through the whole country.

In the course of this century Christianity flourished in Germany, particularly in those parts which border upon France. Maternus, Clemens, and others, founded, in particular, the churches Cologne, Treves, and Mentz. No positive account has been transmitted respecting the progress of Christianity in the British Isles during the third century. The historians of Scotland contended, indeed, that the Gospel then first visited that country; and there is reason to believe that their account may be true. (See Usher and Stillingfleet Antiq. et Orig. Eccl. Britt.)

In this century, the clemency and mildness of several of the Roman Emperors, and the encouragement which some of them gave to Christianity, tended materially to augment its influence. The piety and charity of the Christian disciples continued to excite the notice and admiration of the heathen, and the zealous labors of Origen and others in the translation and dispersion of the New Testament, and in the composition of different works in the defence and illustration of Christianity, contributed to increase the number of Christians, and to extend the boundaries of the church. (Pearson's Historic View of the Progress of the Gospel, p. 15.) Origen observes, "that so desirous were the Christians of propagating their religion throughout the world, that some of them had undertaken to travel, not only to cities, but to towns and villages, to convert the Heathen."

In the third century, Christianity had become so extensive, that, about the year 245, the emperor Philip, though evidently a worldly-minded character, and but little influenced by the spirit of the Gospel, was induced to make a profession of the new religion, and openly to patronize its friends and adherents. About the same time, the light of divine truth was greatly extended both in France and Germany. And (though the power of religion seemed to decline both among the pastors and professors in Africa and Asia, which, from the inroads of barbarians, became a scene of miserable confusion,) yet the wisdom and power of God so over-ruled events, that the invaders, by carrying away with them several Christian ministers, forced these persons to become missionaries, contrary to their own intentions, and rendered them instrumental in the conversion of many.

CENTURY IV.—The first Christian missionaries to Ireland were Kieran, Aibe, Declan, and Ibar, all from the British Churches in Scotland and Wales, faithful and self-denying missionaries of the Christian Faith, and but little sullied from its original lustre. The period of their arrival is very likely to have been the early part of this century, when British Christians may have sought refuge in Ireland from the fury of the Diocletian persecution, then raging throughout all the provinces of the Roman empire; for, as Ireland was beyond the boundary of the emperor's dominions, it was almost the only place that could afford an asylum to the Christians, until the return of peace and security. Christianity was for a long time confined to the southern portion of the island; but even here its progress was slow. A few families and solitary hermits constituted the infant Church. Kieran is commonly regarded as the first bishop of Ossory.

In the fourth century Chrysostom, archbishop of Constantinople, maintained many presbyters and others in Phœnicia, partly at his own charge, and partly by the assistance of pious and well disposed persons, whose only work it was to instruct the inhabitants in the truths of Christianity. During the same century, Constantine, surnamed the great, was raised to the imperial sceptre; and, in his person, Christianity ascended the throne of the Cæsars. Unfortunately, Constantine preferred coercive measures for the establishment of religion, and deemed the sword a more efficient instrument in the destruction of idolatry, than the milder endeavors of missionary instruction. But the order issued by him for the transcribing of fifty copies of the Sacred Scriptures, to be placed in the different churches of the empire, was a more legitimate missionary work. It was about the same period that the Gospel, having been carried to the Goths, by some Christian prisoners, Ulphilas, who had been appointed their pastor or bishop, undertook to form an alphabet, and to translate the Scriptures into the Gothic language. Fragments of this version are still in existence, from which transcripts have been made and published by Dr. Barrett, of Dublin, and M. Maio, of Rome.

Christianity was introduced into Georgia by Nino, a pious female who was carried captive into that country, and by her exhortations and prayers, prevailed upon the Cyarmerian to embrace the religion she professed; but some suppose she voluntarily left Rome to visit Jerusalem, and from thence proceeded into the ancient Iberia, accompanied by Sidonia and Abrata, and succeeded in establishing the Christian religion. (Letters from the Caucasus and Georgia; translated from the French, p. 107. Lond., 1823, 8vo.)

(For the introduction of the Gospel into Abyssinia, in this century, see Abyssinia.)

Many of the monks, at this early period, are said to have engaged in the missionary work, and to have been very instrumental in extending the Christian faith, particularly among the Persians and Saracens. A monk named Abraham labored with success among the idolatrous inhabitants in the vicinity of Edessa, until a church was formed, and pastors from among themselves placed over them. (See Smith, Vol. I. page 32; and Jowett's Christian Researches. Vol. I. p. 171.)

In this century, Armenia, into which Christianity had before been introduced, was completely Christianized, through the labors of Gregory "the Enlightener." The Gospel was also further propagated, during this century, in Persia.

During the reign of the emperor Valens, a large body of the Goths, who had remained attached to their ancient superstitions, were permitted by that prince to pass the Danube and to inhabit Dacia, Moesia, and Thrace, on condition of living subject to the Roman laws, and of embracing Christianity, which condition was accepted by their king, Fritigem. And Ulphilas, bishop of those Goths, who dwelt in Moesia, translated the four Gospels into the Gothic language.

Notwithstanding the utmost efforts of the Christian bishops in the European provinces of the empire, great numbers of Pagans still remained. In Gaul, however, the labors of the venerable Martin of Tours were so successful in the destruction of idolatry and superstition, and the propagation of Christianity, that he justly acquired the title of the Apostle of the Gauls.

In respect to the rapidity and extent of the propagation of Christianity in these early ages, besides the evidence furnished by the brief narrative of Luke, and the incidental allusions of the Epistles, the Christian Fathers have left abundant testimony. Clement, who was a co-temporary with Paul, says of the labors of that Apostle, "He preached both in the East and in the West, leaving behind him the glorious report of his faith; and so, having taught the whole world righteousness, and for that end, traveled even unto the utmost bounds of the West, he at last suffered martyrdom," &c. (Clem. Ad. Cor. C. V. VI.)

Justin Martyr, who wrote about one hundred and six years after the ascension, has these remarkable words: "There is not a nation, either of Greek or barbarian, or of any other name, even those who wander in tribes, and live in tents, amongst whom prayers and thanksgivings are not offered to the Father and Creator of the universe, by the name of the crucified Jesus."

Irenæus, who died A. D. 202, speaks of the Christians of his time living in the Court of Rome: "But how is it those who are in the regal halls are faithful? Does not each one of those who have charge of Cæsar's utensils, and those who have not, stand forth preëminent according to his merit?"

Tertullian, who comes about fifty years after Justin Martyr, refers very frequently to the success of the first missionaries of the cross. He says, "We, so great a multitude of men, almost a majority of every state, pass our lives in serenity and quietude." (Tertullian to Scapulus.) "If we desired to deal with open enemies and not with hidden foes, we should not lack the power of numbers, and the influence of ample resources. Doubtless the Moors, and the Germanic race, and the Parthians themselves, or any nations, however great, are more numerous, yet dwelling in one locality, and circumscribed by their own limits, rather than diffused through the whole world. But we, though of yesterday, have filled every sphere of life: cities, castles, islands, towns, the exchange, the very camps, the plebeian populace, the seats of judges, the imperial palace, the senate and the forum. They (the heathen adversaries of Christianity) lament that every sex, age, and condition, and persons of every rank also, are converts to that name." "We have been able, though unarmed and not seditious, but only differing in opinion, to contend against you by the odium of separation only; for if we, such a vast company of men, should withdraw from you and retire to some remote corner of the world, assuredly the loss of so many citizens irrespective of their character, would overspread your dominion, and at last would bring upon you the retribution of desertation itself. Without doubt you would be greatly terrified at your solitude, the stillness of things, and a species of stupor as of a dead city. You would search for subjects in those places in which you might have held the sceptre." (Tertullian's Apology, Chap. 37.)

Chrysostom, who wrote towards the close of the fourth century, attests, that at that time, the Christian faith had become almost univer sally diffused; he says: "But consider and think within yourself, in how short a time the whole world became filled with so many churches, and such populous nations converted to the faith; people persuaded to abrogate their country's laws, rooting out their old habits and customs, and everywhere overturning the heathen altars in the regions of the Romans, Persians, Scythians, Maurians, and the Hindoos, to the world's end."

And to these may be added the testimony of ancient Pagan writers. Tacitus, in giving an account of the fire which happened at Rome about thirty years after the ascension, asserts that Nero, in order to suppress the rumors of having been himself the author of the mischief, had the Christians accused of the crime. Speaking of this event, he writes: "They only were apprehended who confessed themselves of that sect; afterwards a vast multitude were discovered by them." This was about six years after Paul wrote his Epistle to the Romans, and something more than two after his arrival in Rome himself. Pliny the younger, the governor of Pontus and Bithynia, on applying to the emperor Trajan for directions as to the treatment of Christians, says: "Suspending all judicial proceedings, I have recourse to you for advice; for it has appeared to me a matter highly deserving, especially on account of the great numbers of persons who are in danger of suffering: for many of all ages, and of every rank, of both sexes, likewise, are accused and will be accused. Nor has the contagion of this superstition seized cities only, but the lesser towns also, and the open country. Nevertheless it seemed to me that it might be restrained and corrected. It is certain that the temples, which were almost forsaken, begin to be more frequented; and the sacred solemnities, after a long intermission, are revived. Victims, likewise, are everywhere bought up; whereas, for some time there were few to purchase them. Whence it is easy to imagine that numbers of men might be reclaimed, if pardon were granted to those that shall repent." We need not pursue these testimonies farther. Nothing can be more satisfactory as evidence of the progress which Christianity achieved in the hands of its first missionaries.

CENTURY V.—At the beginning of the fifth century the Roman empire was divided into two distinct sovereignties, under the dominion of Arcadius in the East, and of Honorius in the West. The confusions and calamities which about this period attended the incursions of the Goths, the temporary possession of Italy by Odoacer, and the subsequent establishment of the Ostrogoths, were prejudicial to the progress of Christianity. The zeal of the Christian emperors, more especially of those who reigned in the east, was, notwithstanding, successfully exerted in extirpating the remains of the Gentile superstitions, and the Church continued daily to gain ground on the idolatrous nations in the empire. In the East, the inhabitants of Mount Libanus and Antilibanus were induced by the persuasions of Simeon the Stylite, to embrace the Christian religion. By his influence also, it was introduced into a certain district of Arabia. In the West, the German nations, who had destroyed that division of the empire, gradually embraced the religion of the conquered people. Some of them had been converted to the Christian faith before their incursions upon the empire; and such, among others, was the case of the Goths. It is uncertain, however, at what time and by whose labors the Vandals, Sueves, and Alans were evangelized. The Burgundians, who inhabited the banks of the Rhine, and passed from thence into Gaul, received the Gospel, hoping to be preserved by its Divine Author from the ravages of the Huns. But in general these fierce and barbarous nations were induced to embrace Christianity, by the desire of living in greater security amidst a people who, for the most part professed it, and from a persuasion that the doctrines of the majority must be best. This conformity, of course, must have been chiefly outward and formal.—(Pearson's brief Historic View of the Progress of the Gospel, p. 19.)

Pope Celestine the First sent Palladius to Ireland, where he arrived A.D. 431. The mission was unattended with success, which gave rise to a proverb among the Irish, that "Not to Palladius but to Patrick did the Lord grant the conversion of Ireland." St. Patrick, whose original name was Succath, was next appointed. The place of his birth was Bonnaven, which lay between the Scottish towns Dumbarton and Glasgow, and was then reckoned to the province of Britain. This village, in memory of Patricus, received the name of Kil-Patrick, or Kirk-Patrick. His father, a deacon in the village church, gave him a careful education; he was instructed indeed in the doctrines of Christianity, but he did not come to know what he possessed in this knowledge until the experience of great trials brought him to the consciousness of it. At the age of sixteen he was carried off, with many others of his countrymen, by Scottish pirates, to the northern part of the island Hibernia (Ireland).—(Neander's History of the Christian Religion, Vol. II. p. 122.) He was sold to a chieftain of the people, who made him the overseer of his flocks. Here he remained six years, during which time he received the renewing grace of God. At length he recovered his liberty, but was again recaptured. But in a short time, however, he was allowed to return home, and not long after he gave himself up to the work of the ministry. After his ordination in Gaul he was sent in company with several others, as a missionary to Ireland. The party landed at the place now occupied by the town of Wicklow, either in the year 432 or 441. After preaching in different parts of the country, St. Patrick visited Tara, or Temora, the royal residence of the monarchs; and here, notwithstanding the opposition of the pagan priests, his preaching was most successful. He gained over to the Gospel several zealous converts. In an epistle addressed to Caradoc, or Coroticus, prince of certain districts in Wales, after stating that he had been seized by a predatory band, and carried captive to Ireland, he notices the success which had attended his endeavors to bring over the natives "to the obedience of the faith." He thus offers his reason for subsequently becoming a missionary: "Dwelling among barbarians, a Christian and an exile, urged by my love and zeal for God and the truth of Christ, I wished, although rudely and in an unpolished manner, to declare those things from my mouth; for the love of my neighbors and my children in the Lord aroused me, and compelled me to give up my country, my parents, and even my life also, if I should be thought worthy to teach the truth to the nations."—(See Sir William Betham's Irish Antiquarian Researches, Vol. II. p. 433.) In the course of St. Patrick's missionary journeyings he visited also the south of Ireland. Angus, the king of Cashel, received him courteously, listened to his preaching, and became a convert; but the earlier Christians of the country, especially the bishops Ailbe, Declan, Kearan, and Ibar, did not give him so glad a welcome; they either had not been acquainted with the extent of his labors among their pagan countrymen, or they had some fears lest the object of his visit might be to claim supremacy over them. It is expressly stated that Ibar would on no account submit to him, because he did not wish a foreigner to be the patron of Ireland. At length, however, their differences were made up, and they were persuaded to coöperate with each other in a more cordial spirit. St. Patrick, after this, returned to the north, where we next find him engaged in the foundation of the See of Armagh, the date of which event is assigned to the year 455. From this time he appears to have ceased in a measure from more arduous labors, and to have employed himself in holding synods for the settlement of the church. Several of the canons enacted in these councils are still in existence, and they serve to elucidate many of the doctrines and customs of the early Irish church. Whatever time St. Patrick could spare from these important avocations, was passed in retirement at Saul, where, in prayer and meditation he ended his days. He lived to an advanced age, and was buried near the site of the present cathedral of Down.—(Todd's Ancient Church in Ireland, p. 14.)

The efforts to evangelize the world, were not, however, restricted to individual attempts. In the fifth and several succeeding centuries, the Nestorians became the most missionary body at that time existing, as well as the most numerous. (For an account of the origin and missions of this body, see Nestorians and China.)

Most writers agree that the Christian religion was early planted in Arabia, from the great number of Jews dispersed among these tribes, who claim their descent from Abraham and Ishmael. Some have maintained that several tribes among the Arabians had received the Christian religion long before the time of Mohammed. An able writer mentions one Phylarchus, and a whole tribe of Arabians, who in the fifth century made profession of the Christian religion. "Even the Arabians themselves own that the Christians were very numerous in Arabia, long before the time of Mohammed, as appears from numerous passages in the Koran, where both Christians and Jews are mentioned, as well as in their own common histories, cited by Pocock and other Orientalists. The principal tribes that embraced Christianity were Hamger, and, according to others, the whole kingdom of the Homerites, Ghassan, Rabia, Taghlah, Bahra, Tonuch, part of the tribes of Tay and Kodaa, the inhabitants of Najaram and the Arabs of Hira." (See Mr. Sale's Prelim. Discourses, p. 29.)

It does not appear, however, that the Holy Scriptures had been translated into their tongue, which will account for the subsequent extinction of their churches. All nations that have had the Scriptures in their own language have stood, either in whole or in part, against the seductions of Mohammedanism; such are the Greeks, Syrians, Armenians, Abyssinians, Coptics, and some others. (See Yeates's Indian Church, p. 41.)

In the same century, the conversion of the southern or lowland Picts is said to have been effected through the instrumentality of a British bishop named Ninias; and though they were soon after reduced by the northern Picts, their heathen conquerors permitted them to retain the profession of Christianity. The baptism of Clovis, king of the Franks, took place about the year 496; and it has been justly remarked, that, "notwithstanding he was an ungodly man, he became an instrument in the hand of Providence to promote a cause of which he knew not the value." Through the influence of his queen Clotilda, who was a zealous Christian, he was induced to profess the faith of the Gospel, and was baptized at Rheims, together with his sister, and three thousand of his troops. (See Smith's Origin of Missionary Societies, Vol. I. p. 23.)

In Britain, Christianity was almost extinguished by the predatory incursions of the Scots and Picts, and, afterwards, by the persecutions of the Saxons.

CENTURY VI.—This century was distinguished by some further advances of Christianity, both in the East and West. The bishops of Constantinople, under the influence and protection of the Grecian emperors, succeeded in converting some barbarous nations, inhabiting the coast of the Euxine Sea, among whom were the Abasgi, whose country lay between the shores of that sea and Mount Caucasus; the Heruli, who dwelt beyond the Danube; the Alani, Lani, and Zani, together with other uncivilized nations, whose precise situation cannot now be accurately ascertained, were converted about the same time, during the reign of Justinian. In the West, Remigius, bishop of Rheims, was remarkably successful in Gaul, where the example of Clovis continued to be followed by great numbers of his subjects.

Britain was abandoned by the Romans in the fifth century, and then became subject to the Saxons, who forthwith established their pagan religion. The Roman language, customs, and manners, with all the Christianity that existed, were at once swept away from the largest and finest portions of the island, by the Saxon invasion. The Britons were divided into a great number of petty kingdoms, and their princes animated with as much hostility against each other as against the invaders. But they were generally too high-minded to brook that forced and ignominious incorporation to which the Gauls, and Spaniards, and Italians had submitted, and gradually retiring to the western peninsula, to the land of lakes, and to the highlands of Scotland, their language ceased to be spoken in that great division of the island, which now obtained the name of England, from its Anglican conquerors.

It is, however, to Wales and Cornwall that we are to look for the progress of Christianity in Britain during this period. Fuller says: "The entire body of the British Church at this time was in Wales, where Bangor on the north, and Caerleon (on the Usk, in Monmouthshire), on the south, were the two eyes thereof for learning and religion. The latter had in it the court of King Arthur, the see of an archbishop, a college of 200 philosophers, who therein studied astronomy; and was a populous place of great extent." There is reason to believe that Bangor, near Chester, was of equal eminence with Caerleon for men of learning and piety. It is said that the monastery at this place contained 2,100 monks, divided into seven courses, of 300 each.

The Anglo-Saxon people sprang from three piratical tribes of Gothic origin. Two of these were seated in what is now called Jutland, and in three adjacent islands. The emigration of the Jutes does not seem to have been extensive, its British settlements being confined to Kent, the Isle of Wight, and the southern part of Hampshire. The Angles, whose home lay in Sleswick and Holstein, as now called, emigrated entirely, and spreading over the north-eastern, midland, and northern counties of south Britain, eventually gave name to the whole country. The Saxons, nearest neighbors of these, found new abodes in Essex, Middlesex, and those counties west of Kent which lie between the Thames and the Channel. The earlier years of their settlement in Britain were little favorable to their reception of the Christian religion. The people, indeed, whose fair possessions had lured them from their Scandinavian abodes, had risen into importance and wealth under an abandonment of paganism. The Britons, aroused into a long course of sanguinary conflict with their treacherous invaders, were little likely to think of their conversion. It is therefore probable that the native clergy made no attempt to humanize these ferocious pagans, by communicating to them a knowledge of the Gospel. The pagan warriors, moreover, were likely to derive new prejudices against Christianity, from the success which usually waited upon their own arms. Britain's trust in the cross had not secured her fortunes from constant declension. Reliance upon Woden had been encouraged unceasingly by victory. A people unacquainted with true religion would naturally infer that its own deities were more powerful than those of its opponents. A considerable change must be wrought in the whole frame of a society like this before it could be gained over to calm reflection upon the religion of a people prostrate under its assaults. Providence, however, effected such a change. England's principal monarch then was Ethelbert, King of Kent. He appears to have ascended his father's throne about the year 560; and, probably, ten years afterwards he married Bertha, daughter of Cherebert, King of Paris. This princess coming of a Christian family, was not allowed to pass over into Kent until ample stipulations had been made for the free profession of her religion. She came accordingly, attended by Luidhard, a Frank bishop, and for her accommodation a British church was erected, in honor of St. Martin, on the eastern side of Canterbury. A Christian congregation was formed in the principal seat of Anglo-Saxon power. As its leading member was the most illustrious female in the island, we may reasonably suppose that it did not long fail of making converts. Hence it became understood at Rome, that among Englishmen an anxious desire prevailed for admission to the church. Gregory the Great, as he is termed, Bishop of Rome, intimated to Bertha by letter that she ought early to have inclined her husband favorably towards her own religion. The venerable Bede gives the following account of the manner in which Gregory's attention was first directed to Britain as a missionary field, which, Dr. Clarke says, is taken from the Saxon Homily of Ælfric, written more than nine hundred years ago: "While yet a private clergyman, Gregory, passing through a slave market in his native city, found his eyes forcibly arrested by some light-haired, fair-complexioned youths, who stood exposed for sale. 'Whence come these lads?' he asked. 'From Britain,' was the answer. 'Are the people Christians there?' he then inquired. 'No, pagans,' he was told. 'Alas!' he said, 'how grievous it is that faces fair as these should own subjection to the swarthy devil!' His next question was, 'What do you call the tribe from which these young people spring?' 'Angles,' said the dealer. 'Ah! that is well,' Gregory rejoined; 'Angels they are in countenance, and choirs of angels they ought to be. Where in Britain do their kindred live?' 'In Deúra,' was the reply. 'Well again,' Gregory said; 'it is our duty to deliver them from God's ire. Pray, who is king of the land so significantly named?' 'Ella,' replied the slave-merchant. 'Ah!' the pious inquirer added, 'Hallelujah must be sung in that man's country.'" Gregory resolved upon undertaking a mission into Anglia. Nor did the Pope discourage his intention, but the Roman people would not allow him to enter upon a labor so remote and perilous. However, after Gregory's elevation to the See of Rome, A. D. 592, he selected Austin, or Augustine, Prior of the Monastery of St. Martin, in Rome, to lead a devoted band upon the mission. Austin, having engaged several monks as partners in his toil, left Rome, but halting among the monastic recluses of Lerins, these devotees, to whom the difficulties of his undertaking were necessarily better known than they could have been at Rome, utterly discouraged him from the attempt. He applied for Gregory's leave to withdraw from the enterprise. But the pontiff would hear nothing of despondence; he rebuked the missionary's pusillanimity, refused to cancel his obligation, and commanded him to lose no time in reaching Britain. Austin now rallied his spirits, proceeded northwards, and providing himself with interpreters in Gaul, set sail for the chalky cliffs of Kent. He landed in the island of Thanet, and thence dispatched a messenger to Ethelbert, informing him of his arrival, and declaring that he had come thus far in hope of showing him the way to heaven. By the Kentish prince, however well the message might have pleased him, it was cautiously received. He gave no permission to his Roman guests for a further advance into the country, until he had gone himself and made observations. Austin and his companions met him in procession, one of them bearing a silver cross, another a picture of the Saviour, while the remainder chanted litanies. The prior disclaimed any other object than to guide the king and all his people to everlasting joys above. 'Fair words and promises,' Ethelbert replied, 'but still, new and uncertain. I cannot relinquish for them what my countrymen have long and universally professed. Your distant pilgrimage, however, and charitable purpose of offering us a boon so highly valued by yourselves, justly claim our hospitality. I shall, therefore, provide you with a residence and means of living. Nor do I restrain you from endeavors to spread your opinions among my people.' The residence provided was at Canterbury, and the missionaries entered that city to take possession of it, with imposing solemnities.

Austin's views were now directed to the consolidation and extension of his authority; and he repaired to the confines of Wales, and sought an interview with the native prelacy of Britain. The place rendered memorable by this meeting seems to have been under the shade of some noble tree, afterwards known as Augustine's Oak, situated, probably within the modern county of Worcester. The prelates and monks in Wales, wishing to retain their independence of the See of Rome, and the integrity of their own doctrines, naturally resisted the claims of Augustine. Violent altercations ensued; the Kentish prince was engaged in the quarrel; and the unfortunate Cambrians, whose only crime consisted in their conscientious resistance to a foreign yoke, were doomed to suffer the invasion of their territories, and in some instances, the loss of their lives. And there is reason to believe, that the supremacy of the Pope had as much to do with the origin of this mission as the love of souls. But from whatever motive it was undertaken, it was the point of the papal wedge which, first insinuated into the ecclesiastical hierarchy of England, by Gregory I., was speedily driven deeper; until, by the authority of Innocent III. it completely destroyed the independence of the British Church, and laid her prostrate at the feet of the Pope. It was, therefore, the policy of Augustine to undermine the simplicity of religious worship among the Britons, and to operate upon the imagination and superstition of the Saxons, by means of sensual doctrines, and a gaudy ritual, which he had imported from Italy. Image worship, purgatorial inflictions, the efficacy of good works, and the virtue of old bones, designated relics, were all ready and at hand. "The wily monk," says a modern writer, "assumed such austerity of manner, and sanctity of deportment, that he effectually secured the veneration of the deluded multitude; and by his pretended miracles, which any juggler of the present day could surpass, very easily imposed on their credulity." Gregory was transported with joy, on hearing the continued prosperity of the mission; and in a letter to Ethelbert, exhorted him "to assist Augustine in the good work by all the expedients of exhortation, terror, and correction!" The whole of this affair is highly monitory. England had once more become the land of paganism; but by the labors of foreign missionaries, Christianity was again established. The process was precisely the reverse of that by which the Roman empire had been brought under the influence of the Christian faith. There it had begun with the poor, and had made its way up, unassisted by any human power, or any worldly or interested motives. But here the missionaries came with the imposing rank of ambassadors on a religious errand; they addressed themselves to the kings of those petty states into which England was divided; and having succeeded with them, the nominal conversion of their subjects followed as a matter of obedience. The kings had an obvious political motive for professing a religion, which enabled them to connect themselves by intermarriages with the princes of the Continent; prepared a refuge for them in case of expulsion from their own dominions; and placed them in communication with the more civilized parts of the world.—Fuller's Church History of Britain; Smith's Religion of Ancient Britain, p. 277; Dr. Southey and Kingsmill.

To Augustine's mission, as well as many other missionary efforts of that period, the judicious remarks of Dr. Mosheim will apply. "The conversions and sacred exploits of this age will lose much of their importance in the esteem of such as examine with attention the accounts which have been given of them by writers of this and the succeeding ages; for by these accounts, it appears that the converted nations retained a great part of their former impiety, superstition, and licentiousness; and that, attached to Christ by a mere outward and nominal profession, they, in effect, renounced the purity of his doctrine, and the authority of his Gospel, by their flagitious lives, and the superstitious and idolatrous rites and institutions which they continued to observe. If credit is to be given to the writers of this century, the conversion of these uncivilized nations to Christianity was principally effected by the prodigies and miracles which the heralds of the Gospel were enabled to work in its behalf. But, in abandoning their ancient superstition, the greatest part of these people were more influenced by the example and authority of their princes, than by force of argument, or the power of a rational conviction. The missionaries required nothing of these barbarous people that was difficult to be performed, or that laid any remarkable restraint upon their appetites and passions. The principal injunctions they imposed upon these rude proselytes were, that they should commit to memory certain summaries of doctrine, and pay to the image of Christ and the saints, the same religious service which they had formerly offered to the statues of the gods. Nor were they at all delicate or scrupulous in choosing the means of establishing their credit; for they deemed it lawful, and even meritorious, to deceive an ignorant and inattentive multitude, by representing as prodigies, things that were merely natural events, as we learn from the most authentic records of these times."

It was in this century that Columba, or Colombanus, passed over into the western parts of Scotland, and promulgated the Gospel among northern Picts. The Scots of Argyle, among whom he resided, embraced Christianity in Ireland, when the hostilities of their neighbors compelled them to seek a temporary refuge in that country. The little island named I-colmkill, after this missionary, was the seat of a mission seminary, which he conducted for a period of more than thirty years, besides retaining the charge of several other institutions, which he had founded in Ireland. Columba had the happiness of baptizing the British sovereign; and the neighboring Scots and Britons held his character and person in such high estimation, that it was no uncommon thing for them to refer to him as the final umpire in the adjustment of their differences. Of royal extraction; superior talents and accomplishments; fervent in spirit; indefatigable in his exertions; unbounded in his beneficence; unmoved by injuries, and undaunted by danger; he literally "overcame evil with good," and was made the honored instrument of subduing the prejudices, and winning the affections of the most violent enemies of the Gospel. He expired in the act of transcribing the Holy Scriptures.

The monastery of Iona, in the Hebrides, founded by Columba, might justly be called a missionary college, as the great object of the institution was to prepare the residents for missionary enterprise, by previous discipline, and transcription of the Scriptures. From thence went forth several of those blessed men, by whom many parts of Germany, and the Low Countries, were first brought to the knowledge of the truth. Three ancient manuscripts, in the Irish character, probably written in this monastery or college, are still preserved. (See Sir William Betham's Irish Antiquities.)

Such was the missionary zeal of the monks of Iona, that they are said to have frequently undertaken expeditions, the object of which was to discover any land which the Gospel had not yet reached, that they might preach to its inhabitants the glad tidings of salvation. The Norwegians found Irish monks in Iceland, when they first discovered it, about the year 900. The followers of Columba obtained the name of Culdees, from certain terms implying, "The family or servants of God," and are distinguished by it, from those societies, or monastic institutions, founded by Papal authority. "From this nest of Columba," says one of his biographers, speaking of Iona, "these sacred doves took their flight to all quarters. Wherever they went they disseminated learning and true religion, and seem to have done more towards the revival of both, than any other society at that time in Europe. In fact, Iona, or I-colmkill, was, in the early ages, a seminary of all kinds of learning, and a nursery of divines for planting churches." (See Smith's Life of Columba.) His disciples were remarkable for the exemplary holiness of their lives, and through the medium of their missionary labors, the northern Picts, the Anglo-Saxons of Mercia and Northumberland, and several of the northern nations of Europe, were converted, at least to the name and profession of Christianity. (See Life of Colomba, published by the Mass. Sab. School Society.)

To the sixth century have also been referred the conversion of the Abasgi, a people of Scythia, and the Hevuli, who resided on the banks of the Danube; together with that of Zathus, a prince of the Colchiaes; and Almundurus, a prince of the Saracens. About the same period the Paulicans arose in the East, and were so denominated from their making Paul's Epistles the chief rule of their lives. They were proverbial for their endeavors to spread the Gospel, in opposition to the errors of the Greek and Romish churches; and such was the rapid multiplication of this people, and so numerous were they become in the reign of the Greek Empress Theodora, in the ninth century, that 100,000 lost their lives during the persecution of that Empress, by fire, sword, the gibbet, impalement, and other cruelties.

CENTURY VII.—Cheerless, indeed, was the commencement of the seventh century, and gloomy the scene on which the first Gregory closed his eyes, the barbarous hosts still pressing the Roman empire on the north, and the Arabian impostor breaking forth from his sultry sands, as the avenger of the Lord, scattering the flock from field to field, and obliterating the once flourishing churches in the East, and along the African coast. But it does not appear that any of those nations who possessed the written word of God relapsed into the Mohammedan imposture. According to Yeates, there were no early translations of the Bible into Arabic.

During this century the spirit of missionary enterprise arose chiefly from the North. From the monasteries of Great Britain and Ireland, men went forth glowing with the desire of bringing the Gothic tribes within the fold of Christ. Along the banks of the Rhine, in the Black Forest, in Bavaria, and Thuringia, the church extended itself by the labors of men thus devoted, among whom shine the names of Fridolin, Gall, Rupert, Eustasius, Willibrod, and above all, Boniface, as apostles of the German nations.

CENTURY VIII.—At the commencement of the eighth century, when a considerable part of Germany was buried in the darkness of pagan superstition, Winfred, a Benedictine monk, born in England of illustrious parents, and afterwards known by the name of Boniface, attended by two companions, went over into Friesland, to water the churches which Willibrod had planted. He afterwards removed to Bavaria and Thuringia; and throughout the greater part of Hesse, even to the frontiers of Saxony, he published the word; and in the year 719 Gregory the second made him bishop of the new German churches. In his mission from England, he obtained several assistants, who dispersed themselves in the villages; and in a circular letter which he addressed to the British prelates and people, he earnestly solicited their prayers for his success. He continued his missionary labors with unabated ardor till the age of seventy-five; when going to confirm some converts in the plain of Dockum, he was attacked and killed, with the whole of his company, amounting to fifty-two persons, by a troop of ferocious Pagans armed with shields and lances. The German Christians who had considered Boniface as the apostle of their country, immediately raised an army, and conquered the Pagans, whose lives were spared only on condition of their submitting to be instructed in the truths of Christianity.

Siefuvyn, another Englishman, was particularly distinguished among those who labored as missionaries in Germany. On one occasion he ventured to appear before an assembly of Saxons, while they were sacrificing to their idols, and with a loud voice exhorted them to turn from such vanities and to serve the living God. This interference exasperated the idolators to such a degree that the zealous missionary would probably have been immolated on the spot, had it not been for the remonstrances of a Saxon chief, named Buto, who contended that an ambassador of Heaven ought not to be treated with less respect than if he had come from the king of some neighboring nation. Siefuvyn was, therefore, permitted to retire without molestation, and he continued a useful and active laborer in Germany until his death.

Villehad, a native of Northumberland, is also said to have been very successful among the Saxons, whose ferocious spirits were softened by his meekness, whose minds were illuminated by his instructions, and some of whom, it is hoped, were eternally saved through his instrumentality. He became bishop of Bremen, and died in Friesland, after he had preached the Gospel thirty-five years with unwearied perseverance and unabated zeal.

During this century a war broke out between Charlemagne and the Saxons, which contributed materially to the extension of the nominal Church. After a long and obstinate struggle the Saxons were subdued; and when gentle means proved unavailing to induce them to embrace the Gospel, coercive methods were adopted, and they were then baptized by thousands. What sort of converts these were, may easily be conceived. However, as schools and monasteries were founded, and ministers were appointed to reside among them, some general knowledge of Divine truth must have been progressively diffused, though wretchedly intermingled with the superstitions of the age.

During the seventh and eighth centuries the zeal of British, Scotch, and Irish Christians, induced many devoted individuals to undertake extensive and laborious missions in Germany, Belgium, France, and the unevangelized parts of England, Scotland, and Ireland. These benevolent toils were not unfrequently shared by princes and nobles, when converted from paganism to Christianity. As instances of this, it is recorded that when Aidan, a monk of Ireland, and a zealous and successful missionary in the north of England, undertook his missionary tours, Oswald, a British prince, who had been baptized and educated in Ireland, acted as his interpreter. About this period, Corbinian, a French Benedictine monk, labored assiduously among the Bavarians. Firmin, a Gaul by birth, preached in Alsace, Bavaria, and Switzerland.

CENTURY IX.—Rumold, a native of England or Ireland, had long been an example of piety at home, when, animated by a desire for the conversion of the heathen nations, he visited Rome, and earnestly solicited an appointment as a missionary. His request was granted, and he not only received the Papal benediction, but was also "ordained a reigionary, or missionary bishop, without any fixed see." Anascharius, or Anasgar, preached the Gospel to the Danes and Swedes, and other northern nations, and so extraordinary were his labors and success, as to cause him to be termed "The Apostle of the North."

The missionaries who accompanied him, or whom he sent out, were directed by him to the apostle Paul, as an example of missionary zeal. To these and other Christian worthies who lived at this period, we may justly add the name of Adulard or Alard, the cousin-german of Charlemagne. He appears to have been truly pious from early years; and though obliged to fill several important offices by the emperor's order at court, he retained his love of privacy and retirement. He founded several monasteries, in which he promoted learning and science. His favorite institution, however, was a missionary college, as it might be justly called, founded by him at New Corbie, or Cosway, nine leagues from Paderborn, upon the Weser, expressly instituted to be a nursery of evangelical laborers in the instruction and conversion of the northern nations. Anascharius, mentioned above, was one of its greatest ornaments. This period has been emphatically called "The Age of Missions."

The ninth century was likewise rendered remarkable by the attempts of Constantine, (or Cyril), and Methodius, two Greek monks, to evangelize several Slavonian tribes. They were the sons of Leo, a Greek nobleman, of Thessalonica. Cyril, the younger brother, was the most distinguished for his literary acquirements and knowledge of the Holy Scriptures. In his youth he had enjoyed the best education as a companion to the young Prince Michael; but on the proposal to him of what was deemed a highly important matrimonial alliance, but which he disapproved, he withdrew from court, and retired for some time into a monastery. In 857 he visited Constantinople, and shortly afterwards proceeded on a mission to the country of the Khazars; and proved successful in prevailing with the prince, some of his nobles, and many of his people, to embrace the profession of Christianity. He then visited the Bulgarians, with the same design, and succeeded in baptizing many of them. Methodius, the other brother, filled the office of governor on the Slavonian frontiers for ten years, affording a most favorable opportunity of acquiring a knowledge of the Slavonian language. He afterwards accompanied his brother in his mission to the Khazars, and other nations. An application being made to the Greek emperor, by certain Moravo-Slavonian princes, for teachers to instruct their people in the truths of the Holy Scriptures, the two brothers were at once named as the fittest persons for the undertaking. Being appointed to the charge, they engaged in the translation of the Scriptures, on which they are said to have employed four years and a half, at the same time instructing the inhabitants of Moravia. Afterwards they visited Rome, where Cyril became a monk, and died there, in the year 871. To effect the object of translation, Cyril, with the assistance, as some think, of his brother, Methodius, invented an alphabet, adapted to the language of the Slavonic tribes, to whom they were sent. Whether they translated the whole of the Old and New Testaments, or the New Testament principally, is uncertain. Such, however, has been the attachment to this ancient Slavonic version, that no other is permitted to be read in the churches; and there existed no version in the modern Russ prior to the year 1816, when the Emperor Alexander ordered a translation to be made, that his own subjects might be favored, like other nations, with the Scriptures, in their vernacular tongue, the Slavonian language having been for centuries obsolete, and nearly as difficult to a modern Russ as the Anglo-Saxon to an Englishman.—(See Report of British and Foreign Bible Society.) This order of the emperor having been partially carried into execution, the whole of the New Testament was printed in 1823. Since that time the printing of the Scriptures in modern Russ has been suspended principally by the intrigues of the Jesuits and the opposition of the Emperor Nicholas.—(HENDERSON'S Biblical Researches, p. 132.)

About the year 867, under the reign of the Emperor Basilus, the Macedonian, the Slavonians, Arentani, and others, inhabitants of Dalmatia, sent an embassy to Constantinople, declaring their resolution of submitting to the Grecian empire, and of embracing the Christian religion, and requesting to be supplied with suitable teachers. Their request was granted, and those provinces were included within the pale of the church. The fierce and barbarous nation of the Russians, inhabitants of the Ukraine, embraced the Gospel under the reign of the same emperor. But what has already been said as to the nature of such conversions, must be borne in mind. In the case of individuals, the profession of Christianity may have been sincere; but as to the great body of the people, it was probably merely formal. In the course of this century, Christianity began to be preached in the frozen regions of Scandinavia, and on the shores of the Baltic, which had hitherto been involved in the grossest pagan darkness. In the year 826, Harold, king of Jutland, being expelled from his dominions, implored the protection of the Emperor Louis, the son and successor of Charlemagne. That prince promised him his assistance on condition that he would embrace Christianity, and permit the ministers of that religion to preach in his dominions, to which he consented. He was accordingly baptized, and returned to his own country, attended by two ecclesiastics, Anscarus and Aubert, monks of Corbri. These venerable missionaries labored with remarkable success during two years in converting the rude inhabitants of Cimbria and Jutland. On the death of his companion, the zealous and indefatigable Anscarus went into Sweden, A. D. 828, where his exertions were also crowned with success. After having been raised in the year 831, to the archbishopric of Hamburg, and of the whole north, to which charge the superintendence of the church of Bremen was afterwards added, this missionary spent the remainder of his life in traveling frequently amongst the Danes, Cimbrians, and Swedes, to form new churches, to confirm and establish those which had been already planted, and otherwise to promote the cause of Christianity. He continued in the midst of these arduous and dangerous enterprises till his death, in the year 865. Rembert, his successor in the superintendence of the church of Bremen, began, towards the close of this century, to preach to the inhabitants of Brandenburgh, and made some progress towards their conversion.—(PEARSON'S Brief Historic View of the Progress of the Gospel, page 29.) About the middle of this century, the standard of the cross began to be unfurled among the Bulgarians, a Slavonic people of extraordinary fierceness, who had long proved extremely troublesome, by their contiguity to the Greek emperors. The sister of their king Bogoris having been taken prisoner in a military excursion, was carried to Constantinople, where she heard and embraced the Gospel. After some time she was ransomed, and on her return home she was so deeply affected by her brother's idolatrous practices, that she earnestly sought to convince him of the absurdity of his worship. The king listened attentively to her arguments, but did not appear inclined to change his religion, till, on the appearance of a pestilence in his dominions, he was persuaded to pray to the God of the Christians, and the plague was almost immediately removed. This circumstance convinced him of the omnipotent power of Jesus, and he took an early opportunity of sending to Constantinople for missionaries, from whom he and many of his subjects received baptism. Moshiem remarks, that "the missionaries of this period were superior, both in their principles and conduct, to those of preceding ages, as they were more anxious to inform the minds of men than to extend the domination of the Pope, and they made no attempts to add to the number of their converts by rigid and coercive measures, altogether inconsistent with the spirit of the Gospel."—(SMITH'S History and Origin of Missionary Societies, Vol. I. pp. 49, 50.)

CENTURY X.—In the tenth century, the Christian church presented a deplorable scene of ignorance, superstition, and immorality. Amidst the darkness, however, which universally prevailed, some rays of light occasionally appear. The Nestorians continued their missionary labors. The Hungarians and Avari had received some imperfect ideas of Christianity during the reign of Charlemagne; but, on his decease, they relapsed into idolatry, and the Christian religion was almost extinguished among them. Towards the middle of this century, two Turkish chiefs, Bologndes and Gylas, whose territories lay on the banks of the Danube, made a public profession of Christianity, and were baptized at Constantinople. Of these, the former soon apostatised; the other steadily persevered, received instruction from Hierotheus, a bishop who had accompanied him from Constantinople, and encouraged his labors among his subjects. Yarolta, the daughter of Gylas, being afterwards married to Geysa, the chief of the Hungarian nation, he was by her persuaded to embrace Christianity. Geysa, however, still retained a predilection for his ancient superstitions, and was only prevented from apostatising by the zeal and authority of Adalbert, archbishop of Prague, who visited Hungary towards the conclusion of this century. But however imperfect might be the conversion of the King, the most salutary consequences followed the reception of the Gospel by his subjects. Humanity, peace, and civilization, began to flourish among a fierce and barbarous people.—The inhabitants of Poland were, during this century, blessed with the knowledge of Christianity. Some Poles, traveling into Bohemia and Moravia, were struck with the preaching of the Gospel, and on their return, earnestly recommended it to the attention of their countrymen. The report at length reaching the ears of Micislaus, the Duke of Poland, he was induced to divorce his seven wives, and married Dambronca, the daughter of Boleslaus, Duke of Bohemia. He was baptized in the year 965, and, by the zealous efforts of the Duke and Duchess, their subjects were either persuaded or obliged, by degrees, to abandon their idolatry, and profess the religion of Christ. The conversions which had taken place in Russia during the preceding century, were neither sincere nor permanent. But in the year 961, Wolodomir having married Anne, sister of the Greek Emperor Basilus the Second, was prevailed upon by that princess to receive the Christian faith. He was accordingly baptized in the year 987. The Russians followed, without compulsion or reluctance, the example of their prince; and from that time Russia received a Christian establishment, and considered herself as a daughter of the Greek Church. In Scandinavia Christianity, which had been so successfully introduced during the preceding century, had met with a severe check in Denmark, under the reign of Gormo the Third, who labored to extirpate it entirely. At length, however, he was compelled by Henry the First, called the Fowler, the predecessor of Otho the Great, to permit the profession and propagation of Christianity in his dominions; and under the protection of the emperor, Unni, then Archbishop of Hamburg, with some other ecclesiastics, came into Denmark, and formed many Christian churches in that kingdom. On the death of Gormo, his successor Harold, being defeated by Otho the Great, A. D. 949, by the command of his conqueror, though not unwillingly, embraced the Gospel, and zealously supported and propagated it amongst his subjects during his reign. Suen-Otho, however, his son and successor, entirely renounced the Christian name, and persecuted his Christian subjects in the most cruel manner. At length, being driven from his throne, and forced into exile among the Scots, he was led to reflect on his Christian education, and to repent of his apostasy; and being restored to his kingdom, spent the remainder of his life in the most sincere and earnest endeavors to promote the cause of Christianity in his dominions. In Sweden, an almost entire extinction of the Gospel had taken place. Unni, animated by his success in Denmark, determined, therefore, on attempting a revival of it in that country. His pious exertions were rendered prosperous, and he had the happiness of confirming the Gospel in Sweden, and of planting it even in the remoter parts of that northern region. It was during this century that Norway first received the Christian faith. Several attempts were previously made in the early part of it, which were altogether unsuccessful. The barbarous Norwegians resisted both the exhortations of the English missionaries, and the more forcible endeavors of their princes, to convert them from their idolatry, till the year 945, when Haco, King of Norway, who had been driven from his throne, was restored by Harold, King of Denmark; and having been converted by that prince during his exile, publicly recommended Christianity to his subjects. The impression, however, which was then made upon their minds, was but slight; nor were they entirely persuaded to become Christians till the reign of his successor Olaus. At length Swein, King of Denmark, having conquered Norway, obliged his subjects universally to renounce idolatry, and to profess the Gospel. Among the missionaries whose labors were rendered successful in this work, Guthebold, an English priest, was the most eminent, both in merit and authority. From Norway, Christianity spread into the Orkney Islands, which were then subject to that country, and penetrated in some degree, even into the remote region of Iceland. So that in this century the triumph of Christianity was complete throughout Scandinavia. (PEARSON'S Brief Historic View of the Progress of the Gospel, p. 30-33.)

Though this century was proverbially an age of darkness, yet the Gospel continued to spread. And it has been well remarked that although "the efforts of the missionaries at this period, had their defects, yet they form the principal glory of those times, and appear to have been attended by the power of the Holy Spirit, to the genuine conversion of numbers, and the improvement of human society." (BURDER'S Miss. Anec., p. 129.)

From the end of the sixth to the ninth century, the progress of the Gospel continued with varied success, among the Gothic tribes. After that period, in the tenth century, the field of missionary labor extended itself still further towards the East. Beyond the limits already named, amid the barren table lands of Sclavonia and Sarmatia, shut in by the Elbe and the Ural mountains, were gathered the wandering tribes distinguished by the name of Slaves, who presented a still more hopeless task to Christian zeal. Uncontrolled by any government or law, deeming even the formation of villages an infringement of liberty, guided only by traditionary custom, they dispersed throughout the forests and plains of that wide district, clustered in family groups, with no unity, either of national existence, or of habit, or even of religion. A vague superstition, consisting of a rude worship of nature's powers, with stated sacrifices, and the dualistic notion of the East, derived from contact with the Scythian tribes, possessed their minds with a sense of religious awe; but, throughout the whole race, even the idea of the immortality of the soul had become extinct. One social virtue had the force of law amongst them; and the obligation to hospitality afforded an opening for the strangers of the West to gain an entrance among them. Partly, and in the first instance, from the Greek Church, by the two apostles of Poland and Prussia, Cyril and Methodius; afterwards, and more perfectly, by emissaries from the Latin Church, in various ways, and at various intervals, the prevailing form of Christianity was propagated in these countries from the tenth to the sixteenth centuries; and during the same period, by missionaries chiefly from the monastery of Neuf Corbie, on the banks of the Weser, and from the British Isles. And thus, by the end of the thirteenth century, paganism may be said to have been well nigh banished from the limits of Europe. (GRANT'S Bampton Lecture, p. 112.)

Anschar, the apostle of Denmark and Sweden, A.D. 826, and Giselmar, who followed him to Denmark, were sent from Neuf Corbie. Missionaries were brought by Hakon, king of Norway, into his dominions, (938.) Christianity was not, however, permanently introduced before the reign of Olaf I., who was accompanied from England by John Sigard, (993.) Olaf II. afterwards requested missionaries of Canute, upon which, Sigfrid, first bishop of Wexia, Gomkill, and others, were sent into Norway, (1019.)—(History Eccles. of Adam Bremensis.)

In Germany, the exertions of the Emperor Otho contributed, in a signal manner, to promote the interests of Christianity, and to establish it on the most firm foundation throughout the empire. At the earnest request of the Rugi, a remarkably barbarous people, who inhabited the country of Pomerania, between the Oder and the Wipper, and the Isles of Rugen in the Baltic, that zealous prince sent Adalbert among them, to revive the knowledge of Christianity which had formerly existed, but was then extinguished. The mission, however, was unsuccessful; but Adalbert, who was appointed the first Archbishop of Magdeburgh, was successful in converting great numbers of Slavonians.

Throughout this century, the Saracens in Asia and Africa, successfully propagated the doctrines of Mohammed; and multitudes, even of Christians, were the victims of their delusions. The Turks also received the religion of the Arabian impostors; and, turning their arms against the Saracens, began to lay the foundations of that powerful empire which they afterwards established. (PEARSON'S Brief Historic View, p. 34.)

Adalbert, archbishop of Prague, visited Hungary, and afterwards traveled as missionary to Poland, and planted the Gospel in Dantzic; and was at length, like many of the missionaries already named, murdered by the Pagans. Otho the Great, emperor of Germany, distinguished himself in this age, by his zeal for religion, by erecting and endowing churches, and promoting the propagation of the Gospel among barbarous nations. Nor was his empress, Adelaide, less remarkable for her piety and liberality. English missionaries, particularly Bernard, were the active instruments in planting the standard of the Cross in the Orkney Islands and Greenland. The conversion of the Normans is likewise said to have taken place in this century, on the occasion of the marriage of Rollo, Duke of Normandy, to Gies'a, daughter of Charles the Simple, king of France;

but, such matrimonial conversions may be justly doubted: they might assume the name without the change to Christianity.

Hungary, which had previously received some faint dawns of the Christian faith, became, toward the end of this century, more enlightened. Among those tribes of uncertain origin, who assailed Europe at the time of the dissolution of the Carolingian empire, were the Magyars, who emerged from Asia, and established themselves near the Don. Being expelled from those regions, they penetrated into Ukraine, from whence they were driven away by the Russians, and then arrived in Dacia, under the name of Hungarians, (889.) At the head of the Magyar hordes was the princely race of Arpad. The tribes were seven in number, each being commanded by a chief, almost independent. Christianity, as we have seen, penetrated among them under the reign of Geysa I. who was converted from heathenism, by the exertions of his wife Sarolta; and was baptized towards 980. But the general conversion of the Hungarians to Christianity took place under the reign of their son STEPHEN, one of the most celebrated kings of that nation, who was at once the apostle and legislator of Hungary, and the true founder of that monarchy. In his reign churches were erected, bishoprics established, and the profession of Christianity became general in all parts of the country.

The tenth century has been emphatically styled "an iron age, barren of all goodness; a leaden age, abounding in all wickedness; and a dark age, remarkable above all others for the scarcity of writers and men of learning." In this deplorable state of the church, however, some rays of light, as shown in these previous records, passed across the gloomy scene, and some pleasing occurrences evinced that God had not yet "forgotten to be gracious" to his humble worshipers. Several of the churches still possessed the oracles of divine truth in the vulgar tongue; the supremacy of the Roman pontiff was in some places opposed with heroic firmness, and the doctrine of transubstantiation was denied by many to whom the Holy Spirit had revealed "the truth as it is in Jesus." (Smith, Vol. I. p. 51.) In the darkest ages of Christianity, the few rays of light yet unextinguished, appear in connection with the efforts of missionaries to evangelize the heathen.

CENTURY XI.—In the early part of this century the Christian religion was further extended in the kingdoms of Sweden, Norway, and Denmark, and also in Germany, by the assistance of English missionaries. The conductors of the mission were Sigefrid, Archdeacon of York, Eschil, Gunechild, Rudolf, and Bernard. The names of others are likewise mentioned, as laborious and useful messengers of truth among the barbarous European tribes: thus, it is related of William, an English priest, who attended Canute in one of his voyages to Denmark, that he was so affected with the idolatry of the Danes, that he desired to be left among them as a missionary, and had the happiness of finding his labors not in vain in the Lord.

The zeal of the Nestorian Christians continued to be conspicuous in this century. In Tartary and the adjacent countries they succeeded in converting great numbers to the profession of Christianity.

The light which had been diffused during the preceding centuries among the Hungarians, Danes, Poles, and Russians, was considerably increased and extended by the zealous endeavors of their princes, and of the missionaries who labored among them.

CENTURY XII.—The twelfth century was noted for attempts to spread the Gospel by the sword. Waldemar I., King of Denmark, in particular, distinguished himself by his endeavors to propagate Christianity by force of arms, especially among the Sclavonians, Venedi, Vandals, and other northern tribes. In these warlike methods of forcing his subjects to listen to evangelical instructions, he was zealously encouraged and aided by Asalom, Archbishop of Lunden. The inhabitants of the island of Rugen, a fierce and savage people, were numbered among his conquests. The Finlanders were driven to accept of peace on similar terms by Erick IX., King of Sweden, who was accompanied in his bloody campaign by Henry, Archbishop of Upsal. The Livonians, on rejecting the missionary instructions of Mainhard, a monk of Segeberg, were, on an appeal made by Mainhard to the Roman Pontiff, Innocent III., subjected to the horrors of war. An equestrian military order, of "Knights Sword Bearers," instituted for the express purpose of converting pagans, was sent against them. During the Livonian war, they exercised the greatest cruelty and injustice, not merely by the slaughter of numbers of the inhabitants, but by the confiscation of their property. These forced conversions, however, as might have been expected, effected but little more than a profession of obedience to the See of Rome, and a constrained attention to certain forms and ceremonies, substituted for idol worship, while the profoundest ignorance remained of the true nature of the Gospel.

This, indeed, appears to have been an age peculiarly distinguished by the institution of religious military orders, such as the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, now called the "Knights of Malta," originally instituted for the care of the sick, and the protection of pilgrims in the Holy Land; the Knights Templars, so called from their occupying on their first establishment a house in Jerusalem, near the site of the temple, and designed to guard pilgrims from the violence of the infidels, when visiting Jerusalem; The Order of Montjoye, instituted to fight against infidels, especially the Moors of Spain; the Portuguese Order of Avis, established for the same purpose; the Order of St. Lazarus, who received pilgrims, in Jerusalem, in houses founded purposely for them, and then conducted them on their way, and defended them against the Mohammedans; the Order of Knights of St. James, united for the protection of pilgrims visiting the relics of St. James of Compostella from the ill-treatment of the Moors; and the Order of Teutonic Knights, founded originally by some Germans, who built a hospital at Jerusalem for the pilgrims of their nation, and approved by Pope Celestine III. After the loss of the Holy Land, these knights returned to Germany, and, by their warlike prowess, made themselves masters of Prussia, Livonia, Courland, and Semigallia. To these may be added the order of Christ's Militia, instituted by Dominic for the extirpation of the Albigenses. An eminent Romish theologian attempts the defence of the warlike character of these institutions, by the following specious reasoning: "Two very different things," he says, "are confounded by the Protestants, the object and the intention, the conduct of the knights, and that of the missionaries. The knights were never constituted preachers, and the missionaries were never armed. The barbarians were wild beasts; it was necessary to make them men first, and to reduce them by force, before it could be expected to make them Christians. The first of these exploits belonged to the knights; the rest was reserved for the missionaries. When the warriors had done their part, they remained to protect the missionaries, in order to the peaceful performance of their labors."—(BERGIER'S Dict. Theologique, Ordres Militaires, tome VI.)

Most of these military orders owed their institution to the Crusades of this century, undertaken by the Roman Catholic princes of Europe for the recovery of Jerusalem from the Mohammedans; an outburst of religious fanaticism, by which all Europe and Western Asia were convulsed. They were the legitimate offspring of ignorance, superstition, and fanaticism combined, guided by the ambitious designs of the Church of Rome. They deserve no notice in this connection, except so far as their influence upon Europe and the rest of the world, may have tended to prepare the way for the Protestant Reformation, and ultimately for the universal diffusion of the Gospel. They broke the slumber of ages like an earthquake at midnight. They roused the minds of Europe, long besotted in ignorance and barbarism; and thus prepared it to grasp the great and soul-stirring truths of the Reformation. They quickened the energies of nations, to provide for vast armies, and awakened their enterprise to fit out fleets; and thus navigation received a new impulse, opening the way for commerce, which, in its turn, opened a door for Christian missions. Its expeditions also promoted geographical discoveries, and acquainted the mind of Christendom somewhat with the extent of heathenism. It is thus that the overruling providence of God brings good out of evil, and order out of confusion, and makes the wildest fanaticism and the most horrible scenes of war and bloodshed contribute to the extension of his kingdom. For the further examination of this subject see Gibbon's Decline and Fall, ch. LXI.; Mosheim, Cent. XI. Part I. ch. 1.; Robertson's Charles V.; Channing on Associations; Guizot's History of Civilization, sec. 8; Encyclopedia Britannica, Art. Crusades; Campbell's Maritime Discovery and Christian Missions.

The propagation of the Gospel was successfully continued in this century, chiefly in the north of Europe. Boleslaus, duke of Poland, having taken Stetin, the capital of Pomerania, by storm, and laid waste the surrounding country, compelled the vanquished inhabitants to submit at discretion, and imposed upon them, as a condition of peace, their reception of Christianity. The conqueror sent Otho, bishop of Bamberg, in the year 1124, to instruct his new subjects. Many of them, among whom were the duke and duchess, and their attendants, were brought over; but great numbers of the idolatrous Pomeranians, as might have been expected, resisted appeals made at the point of the sword, and adhered to the superstitions of their ancestors. In a second visit, in the year 1126, the bishop was more successful, and the prevailing form of Christianity was established in Pomerania.

In the year 1168, Waldemar, king of Denmark, who was foremost among the northern princes of this century, by his zeal in the propagation of Christianity, having subdued the island of Rugen, which lies in the neighborhood of Pomerania, obliged its rude and piratical inhabitants to listen to the instructions of the missionaries who accompanied his army. Among these Absalom, archbishop of Lunden, was distinguished; and, by his exertions, Christianity was introduced into this island, which had hitherto baffled every attempt.

The Finlanders, whose character resembled that of the inhabitants of Rugen, and who infested Sweden with their predatory incursions, received Christianity in a similar manner. Eric, king of Sweden, having totally defeated these barbarians, sent Henry, archbishop of Upsal, to evangelize them. His success was so great, that he is called The Apostle of the Finlanders; yet he was at length assassinated by some of these refractory people on account of a heavy penance which he had imposed on a person of great authority.

In Livonia, the labors of Mainard, the first missionary who attempted the conversion of that barbarous people, having proved unsuccessful, the Roman pontiff, Urban the Third, who had consecrated him bishop of the Livonians, declared a crusade against them, which was zealously carried on by that ecclesiastic, and by his successors, Berthold and Albert. These warlike apostles, at the head of great bodies of troops raised in Saxony, successively entered Livonia, and compelled the wretched inhabitants to receive baptism.

CENTURY XIII.—The thirteenth century affords few records of missionary labor. It was however, distinguished by the institution of the Order of the Franciscans, or of friar missions, and the endeavors of James I. of Arragon to communicate Christian instruction to his Moorish subjects by the establishment of Arabic schools and the translation of books into the Arabic language. These schools were chiefly at Majorca and Barcelona, in which a considerable number of youths were educated for preachers; but these efforts proving ineffectual, he listened to the advice of the Romish Pontiff, Clement IV., who exhorted him to drive the Mohammedans out of Spain by force, instead of missionary efforts.

Francis of Assisi, the founder of the Franciscans, undertook a mission to Palestine himself, and sent several monks of his order as missionaries into Germany, Greece, France, England, and to the Moors in Spain. Johannes a Monte Corvino, a monk of this order, was sent into Tartary, by Pope Nicholas IV., resided there for many years, and translated the Psalms of David, and the New Testament, into the Tartar language.

The Dominicans of Spain applied themselves to the oriental languages and rabbinical literature, and were employed by the king of Spain in the instruction of the numerous Jews and Saracens, who resided in his dominions. Both the Franciscans and the Dominicans sent out many persons as missionaries to various countries; but the most of them were more solicitous to make proselytes to the Romish Church than to teach their converts the scriptural way of salvation.

The Waldenses and Albigenses, in this century, were distinguished witnesses for the truth—the martyrs of the age; and though compelled to maintain a defensive, rather than aggressive position, yet they did much to prepare the way for the reformation, by the secret diffusion of the Gospel among the nominal Christians of Europe. But the records of their labors are scanty, and they do not come properly under the denomination of missions to the heathen. And this century furnishes little more, in the way of missions to the heathen, than details of military conquests, by which heathen nations were compelled to yield a nominal conformity to the Church of Rome.

CENTURY XIV.—Wickliffe, “the Morning Star of the Reformation,” rendered the fourteenth century a remarkable epoch in the history of the Church, by the intrepidity and success with which he contended against the errors and the corruptions of the Church of Rome, and by his translation of the Scriptures into what was, at that time, the vernacular tongue of England, though now utterly obsolete. The followers of Wickliffe, generally called Lollards, among whom was Sir John Oldcastle, otherwise called Lord Cobham, were anxious to diffuse as extensively as possible, the doctrines promulgated by their learned anti-papal chief. They expended considerable sums in collecting and transcribing (printing not having been invented,) and dispersing the works of Wickliffe, and in maintaining a number of itinerant preachers, who preached in churchyards and market-places, particularly in the dioceses of Canterbury, London, Rochester, and Hereford. Bale says that Lord Cobham caused all the works of Wickliffe to be copied by the desire of John Huss, and to be sent into France, Spain, Bohemia, and other foreign countries. Queen Anne of Bohemia favored the adherents of Wickliffe; possessing and constantly reading the Gospels in four languages, Bohemian, German, Latin, and English. Many of her attendants imbibed the same opinions, and on their return to Bohemia, after her decease in 1394. carried with them the writings of Wickliffe and his disciples; by which means they were widely dispersed, and produced a powerful anti-papal influence, not only in Bohemia, but also in other neighboring states.

CENTURY XV.—The fifteenth century was rendered remarkable by many important events, which, though not strictly missionary, yet, in their influence, have in some cases so greatly forwarded, and in others so greatly retarded, the progress of the Gospel, that we may just glance at their occurrence and character. One of these was the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus, in 1492, and the subsequent landing of the Portuguese Americus Vesputius, in Brazil; a second was the discovery of the passage to India by sea, by Vasco de Gama, in 1497; and another was the ruin of the Greek empire, in the taking of Constantinople by the Turks, in 1453. By the first of these events, an immense extent of country was eventually placed under the control of the Roman Catholic princes of Spain and Portugal; and hence these kingdoms were induced to make extraordinary and ultimately successful efforts, to introduce and establish Popery, in its most superstitious and degrading forms, throughout the continent of South America, and the kingdom of Mexico. By the discovery of a passage to India, by doubling the Cape of Good Hope, the intercourse between England and the East Indies was greatly facilitated; the previous routes having been through Egypt and Persia; and, by the overthrow of the Greek empire, many learned men fled for security into various European states, and, by the diffusion of literature and science, prepared the way for the Reformation of the following century. But, probably, no occurrence of this age proved of greater interest than the Invention of Printing, by Guttemberg and his associates and successors, about the middle of this century; the slow and expensive mode of transcription being the only way previously known of multiplying copies of books, however valuable. But, by the invention of this most useful art, and the improvements of later years, copies of valuable works can be rapidly and cheaply multiplied; and millions of persons have by this means been furnished with the Holy Scriptures, who, otherwise, must have remained destitute.

The military expeditions of the Papists continued during this century, and some of them, among which were those of Don Henry, Duke of Visco, (Portugal,) and Grand Master of the Order of Christ, were productive of important results, in the way of maritime discoveries, &c.; but the events of this century, of a purely missionary character, were few and comparatively ineffectual. In the East, the Nestorian Patriarch, who resided in Chaldea, sent missionaries into Cathay and China, who were empowered to exercise episcopal authority over the Christian assemblies, which lay concealed in the remote provinces of those great empires, affording a demonstrative proof, that notwithstanding the dreadful persecutions that had been exercised by the dominant authorities against the Nestorian Christians, there were still some churches existing in those regions of darkness.

There were also individuals, whose consistency of conduct and zeal for the dissemination of Christianity in this dark age, entitle them to our notice and admiration. Such, for instance, were the two brothers, Vincent and Boniface Ferrer, Thomas à Kempis and John Wesselus. Vincent Ferrer was a Spaniard by birth; at his own earnest request he was appointed apostolical missionary, by Pope Benedict XIII., and for many years preached with indefatigable ardor in different parts of Europe. He visited Spain, France, the Netherlands, Germany, and at the request of Henry IV., England, Scotland, and Ireland. The usual subjects of his sermons were death, judgment, and eternity. Milner says, that "though bred in the midst of darkness, and connected with the worst of ecclesiastical characters, he was a shining model of piety." He died in 1419, at the age of sixty-two. Boniface Ferrer, the brother of Vincent, was a zealous preacher of the word of God, and having embraced the monastic life, he successively rose to high official situations, and died prior of the Carthusian monastery of Pontaleli, in Valencia, in 1417, after having translated the Scriptures into the Valencian or Catalonian dialect of Spain.—(See McCrie's History of the Reformation in Spain, p. 191.) Thomas à Kempis, whose piety has received a perpetual monument in his "Christian's Pattern," was born at Chempis or Kempis, in Cologne, in 1380, and became one of the most illustrious members of the society of the "Brethren of the Common Life;" a society founded by Gerard de Groot, who, having retired into a monastery, devoted himself to prayer and the reformation of immoral characters, and instituted a fraternity, having one common property, and earning their livelihood by their pens. Kempis died in 1471, in the ninety-first year of his age. His excellent work, "The Christian's Pattern," has been translated into most of the European languages, and even into Chinese. A beautiful copy of the Bible transcribed by him, is preserved in the library of the regular canons, at Cologne.—(TOWNLEY'S Illustrations of Biblical Literature, Vol. I. p. 328.) John de Capistrano may be added as an instance of the activity and energy of the pious, though mistaken, missionary agents of the Romish church. He was a Franciscan friar, of a wealthy Neapolitan family, and was sent to convert the Bohemians, and to preach in Saxony, Misnia, and Moravia, and is said to have been everywhere received with banners, crosses, and processions, like a sovereign prince. He is said to have preached at Erfurd to 60,000 persons, the men being arranged on one side and the women on the other. When ignorant of the language, he was assisted by an interpreter, who explained what he delivered to the people. His sermons were accompanied with violent action, so that he is said to have "preached with his hands and his feet as well as with his voice," which corresponds with the accounts given of him by an English historian, who relates that "he itinerated through the cities and towns, addressing sermons to the people, in the highways and market places, against the enemies of the Romish Church. Among the Germans and those that were ignorant of the Italian, he is said to have affected the minds of his audience in a wonderful manner, by using gesticulations instead of words."—(See TURNER'S Modern History of England, Vol. II. p. 9.) His death occurred October 23, 1456, being seventy-one years of age.

CENTURY XVI.—The happy reformation from Popery illustriously signalized the commencement of the sixteenth century; the year 1517 being regarded as its commencement, when Luther first publicly opposed the monk Tetzel, in his sale of papal indulgences. The adherents of the Reformation were called Protestants, from their protesting against an intolerant decree of the Diet of Spires, in 1529. As the Reformation proceeded, those who had embraced the views of its advocates became increasingly desirous of emancipating the inhabitants of their native lands, and of other adjacent countries, from the errors of the Romish church. This object they pursued with indefatigable zeal; and in order to accomplish it, translations of the Holy Scriptures were made into the vernacular tongues, and widely dispersed; while plain and homely rhymes, embodying the opinions of the reformers, were composed, and put into the hands of poor people, who made a livelihood by singing them through the country. It is related, that on one occasion a poor man, who had received the printed copies of some of these rhymes, repaired to Wittenberg, and, in the course of his progress through the town, sung them under Luther's windows. The attention of Luther was caught by the subject, and when on inquiry he learned the name of the author, he is said to have burst into tears, and rendered thanks to God for making such humble expedients conducive to the propagation of truth. In pursuance of the same great object, missionaries were sent into Roman Catholic States to preach the distinguishing doctrines of the Reformation, especially that of justification by faith, and tracts, often denominated libels, or little books, were composed and extensively dispersed, containing defences of the Protestant tenets, detached books of Scripture, or exposures of Papal errors or practices.

An expedition was fitted out in the year 1555, by Villegagnon, a knight of Malta, under the patronage of Henry II. of France, with the view to establish a French colony in the new world. The approbation of the monarch was secured by the medium of the excellent Admiral de Coligny, whose favor Villegagnon propitiated by the secret understanding that the projected colony should protect the reformed religion. Accordingly Calvin, the reformer of Geneva, was applied to, in order to obtain ministers to embark with the expedition. After consultation with the other pastors of Geneva, he sent two, Guillaume Chartier and Pierre Richier, who were afterwards joined by several others. Their object was at once to labor among the colonists, and to evangelize the heathen aborigines. This was the first attempt at a foreign mission, by the Protestant churches. The expedition reached Fort Coligny, as it was named, on the Rio de Janeiro, in Brazil, in March, 1556. On their arrival the Genevan ministers proceeded to constitute a church, according to the forms and rites of the reformed churches, and celebrated the Lord's Supper. But Villegagnon soon betrayed his true character, and after cruelly maltreating the missionaries, forced them to reembark, and return to France. The next attempt to send the Gospel to heathen countries was made by the celebrated reformer and king of Sweden, Gustavus Vasa. About the year 1559, a missionary was sent by that monarch to Lapland. The natives were at the same time commanded to congregate at a certain season of the year to pay their tribute and receive religious instruction from this missionary.—(BAIRD'S Christian Retrospect, p. 296.)

Internal strifes and gainsayings, hostilities from without fomented by Rome, and perplexities from within, exhausted the energies of Christian men in England, during the reigns of Elizabeth and James; and for 150 years nothing was undertaken for propagating the Gospel in other lands. A scheme to rival the Roman propaganda was devised by Cromwell, but never realized. Burnet says that Cromwell resolved to set up a council for the Protestant religion, in opposition to the congregation De Propaganda Fide at Rome. He intended it should consist of several counsellors, and four secretaries for different provinces. These were, the first—France, Switzerland, and the valleys; the Palatine and other Calvinists were the second; Germany, the North, and Turkey were the third; and the East and West Indies were the fourth. The secretaries were to have £500 salary a-piece, and to keep a correspondence everywhere, to know the state of religion all over the world, that so all good designs might be, by their means, protected and assisted. Stoupe was to have the first provinces. They were to have a fund of £10,000 a-year at their disposal for ordinary emergencies, but to be farther supplied as occasion should require it. Chelsea College was to be made up for them, which was then an old decayed building, that had been at first raised to be a college for writers of controversy.”—BURNET'S History of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 132.)

(For any further notices of Roman Catholic missions, see “Church of Rome, Missions of.”)

Under the impression of duty, and that of feeling and benevolence towards others, created by the enjoyment of experimental Christianity, many of the laity who had felt the power of Divine grace in their own hearts, by the preaching of the doctrines of the reformation, became exceedingly anxious that others should partake of their happiness, and gladly seized the opportunities presented to them by mercantile intercourse to disseminate the truths which they themselves had embraced. France, Spain, Italy, and other countries thus received the rays of Divine light for a season, though partially or entirely extinguished by the cruelties and industrious efforts of the inquisitors of those ill-fated regions. Dr. McCrie, speaking of the eastern part of Spain, says: “The inhabitants of Bearn were generally Protestants, and many of them crossing the Pyrenees spread themselves over Arragon, and at the same time carrying on trade, found the opportunity of circulating their religious books and tenets among the people.”—(McCrie's Hist. of the Reformation in Spain, p. 234.)

The Waldensian pastors (barbes) who were so numerous at this time, that 140 were present at a meeting of the Synod, were not neglectful of opportunities for disseminating the truth. An Italian manuscript, preserved in the University of Cambridge, bearing date 1587, states, that “some of these barbes traveled into distant countries to preach the Gospel, and to visit the Waldensian churches established in France, Germany, Lombardy, Calabria, &c., while in 1535, an edition of the French Bible had been printed at Neufchatel, by Robert Olivetan, a native Vaudois.”—(GILLY'S Excursions, &c., Appendix, No. XI.)

Towards the close of this century missions were sent by the Swedish Protestants into Lapland, but as they did not understand the Lappanese tongue, an interpreter stood under the pulpit and explained their discourses to the people. But so little success followed this mode of preaching, that Gustavus Adolphus founded schools for the instruction of youth in a more correct knowledge of the doctrines of the Gospel. The first school was established at Pithen, prior to the year 1619, and committed to the care of Nicholaus Andree, the minister of the place, who had translated the ritual, and dedicated it to the king. Gustavus also committed to the same person the translation of necessary and useful books into the Lapländish language; the Laplanders being previously altogether ignorant of letters, and without a book in their own language. For the further encouragement of the schools, Gustavus Adolphus allowed money for the diet and clothes of the children who attended them, besides a stipend for the schoolmaster. By these schools and the elementary and scriptural books compiled by Nicholaus Andree, the youth of Lapland were so greatly benefited, that some of them became students at the University of Upsal, and were afterwards entrusted with the Christian ministry.—(SCHAFER'S History of Lapland, p. 27.)

The Protestants at length awoke to more active efforts for the extension of the Gospel, and attempts were made to form missionary societies. Ernest, a zealous Lutheran and a baron, sought to form a society for a Protestant mission, but a variety of impediments disappointed his purposes, so that no effectual benefit resulted from his efforts. The learned Anthony Walaeus, of Leyden, recommended a seminary to be founded for the education of young men of known piety, prudence, zeal, and diligence, to be employed as missionaries especially to India. This object he proposed to the Dutch East India Company, who appear so far to have countenanced the plan as to have placed several persons under the instructions of Walaeus himself, about the year 1622. A brief exposition of his views was published in the third volume of his works, printed in 1643, under the title of “Necessitas ac Forma erigendi Collegii seu Seminarii Indici.” The Dutch East India Company, indeed, with a praiseworthy attention to the religious interests of the colonists in their foreign possessions, supported ministers in most of them. Millar, in his “Propagation of Christianity,” mentions Ceylon, Sumatra, Java, Amboyna, Heresoria, Isles of Banda, Coast of Coroman- del, Surat, China, Formosa, Trywan, Sincan and Japan, in all of which churches had been erected. In several of these stations the preaching of the Gospel appears to have been greatly blessed. In Ceylon, HARVARD (Narrative, &c., Introduction, p. 69,) states, that "under the Dutch government there were in the province of Jaffna alone, thirty-four churches appropriated to the use of the Malabar Christians, attended by nearly 63,000 auditors, exclusive of more than 2,000 baptized slaves; and the government schools belonging to them included upwards of 16,000 native children, who were under regular tuition." Since that period there has been a most lamentable neglect of religious instruction by the government authority, and an awful relapse of immense numbers into idolatry, who, it is to be feared, were more swayed by political motives than by a love of the Gospel.—(See Art. Ceylon.) The zeal of the British Christians was at length aroused, and more active measures were adopted, not only to recover the nominal Christianity which had been lost, but to diffuse true religion throughout the island.

In Formosa, Mr. Robert Junius of Delft, who had been sent by the Senate of the United Provinces of Holland, as a missionary to the pagan inhabitants, was eminently successful. He is said to have baptized 5,900 converts, "on professing their faith, and giving proper answers to questions propounded out of the word of God," and to have planted twenty-three churches, besides appointing schoolmasters, by whom about six hundred children were taught to read and write. He is said also to have composed certain prayers, collected the chief articles of religion, and translated various psalms into the Formosan language. Being at length grown infirm, and having set pastors over various congregations, he became desirous of seeing his aged mother, and of visiting his native land; he therefore returned to Holland, and was succeeded by Daniel Gravius, and others. The Dutch were driven from their principal fort in 1659 or 1661, and the island afterwards became subject to the Chinese. In the American provinces, which were taken from the Portuguese by the Dutch, under command of Count Maurice of Nassau, zealous efforts were made for the conversion of the natives by their new masters, and with much success; but the recovery of these territories by the Portuguese, in the year 1644, obscured the pleasing prospect that was beginning to open upon them.

Among the objects contemplated by the planting of the Plymouth and Massachusetts Colonies, as avowed by their founders, and set forth in their charter, the conversion of savages to Christianity was prominent. Their first purpose was to provide an asylum, where, free from the restraints imposed by the civil and ecclesiastical policy of England, the Christian Church might be organized in a form, as they believed, more consonant with the primitive model, and the doctrines of Christianity, as they deduced them from Scripture, preached without the forced admixture of dogmas and rites imposed by act of parliament. Their second was to make the aboriginal races participators of these blessings. The first prompted a jealous resistance to the introduction of any adverse opinions or customs, which was carried, in some instances, to excess. The second, though its execution was delayed by the cares incident to a new plantation, commenced in circumstances of such peculiar hardship as tried the endurance of the pilgrims, prompted very early action. Individuals made some exertion to recommend the Gospel to the natives with satisfactory, though limited results; and in 1636, the colony of Plymouth enacted a law to provide for preaching among the Indians. A similar act was passed in 1646, by the legislature of Massachusetts. By these movements, a missionary spirit was awakened in England. A society was organized for the propagation of Christianity in North America, and raised a fund yielding £500, which was applied to the circulation of the Bible, and the support of missionaries. The formation of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, by members of the Church of England, in 1698, is ascribed by Bishop Burnet, to a spirit of emulation aroused by the example of the Non-conformists. (Early Missionary Enterprises, by SMITH, p. 39.)

In the year 1620, a considerable number of Non-conformists emigrated to America, having obtained a patent for the establishment of a colony and the free exercise of religion. These were followed by a more numerous company in 1629. This new colony received the designation of New England. Rev. John Eliot, a holy and zealous young minister, joined the emigrants in 1632. For fifteen years he was the faithful and laborious pastor of a congregation at Roxbury, near Boston. During this period he was deeply affected by the miserable and destitute state of the North American Indians. He studied their difficult language, and occasionally itinerated and preached among them; and he had the happiness of seeing, not only an increase of civilization in some of the Indian tribes, but also of witnessing the influence of the Gospel upon the hearts of some of the people. In 1646, he devoted himself to a mission among the native tribes, having accomplished the difficult task of a translation of the Scriptures into the Mohegan dialect. Two editions of this version were afterwards printed; the first at Cambridge, in New England, in 1661–4, in quarto. Of this edition, Dr. Cotton Mather states as two curious facts, that this was the first Bible ever printed in America, and that the whole of the translation was written with one pen. The second edition was published in 1685, in quarto. Towards this impression and the mission generally, the Hon Robert Boyle gave £500. Eliot was afterwards assisted by other zealous and able missionaries, among whom John Cotton and the Mayhews, are worthy of special notice. The former possessed such skill and dexterity in the Indian tongue, as to have the correction and emendation of the second edition of the Bible committed to him. The family of the Mayhews was eminent for its missionary spirit. The Rev. Thomas Mayhew was an excellent evangelist to the neighboring heathen. In a few years, two hundred and eighty-two Indians renounced their false gods, and turned to the Lord. After the death of this excellent man, his father, the governor of Martha's Vineyard, felt so much concern for the poor Indians, that, seeing no probability of a regular minister to succeed his son, he applied himself with great diligence to the attainment of the language, and then preached to them with acceptance and success. He continued to labor among them to the age of ninety-three, and had the pleasure of a pious grandson associated with him.

Hiacomes, who afterward became a preacher of the Gospel, was the first fruits of the mission. This convert, though opposed and derided by his brethren, manifested so much boldness and intrepidity in the cause of Christ, that many were induced to renounce their former idolatrous practices, and embrace the Gospel. In 1650, such was the anxiety of a considerable part of the Indians to hear the word of life, that Mr. Mayhew, to accommodate them, preached weekly at different parts of the island. About this time, schools were established among them. In 1674, there were supposed to be 2 or 3,000 Indians on this and a neighboring island, of whom, 1,500 were praying Indians; 50 were regular church members.

Soon after this, the number of Indians began to decrease, so that, in 1792, the whole number amounted only to about 440. While the Indians were fast verging toward annihilation, the zeal of the Mayhew family in bringing them to a knowledge of the truth, did not abate. Five successive generations have been indefatigable laborers on this and the neighboring islands.

CENTURY XVIII.—The eighteenth century opened by the institution of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, for a particular account of which see the article under that head. The Danish mission to India was undertaken early in this century, in consequence of representations to the king, Frederick IV., by one of his chaplains. Application having been made to the professors of divinity at Halle, for suitable persons to engage in such a mission, Messrs. Ziegenbalg and Plutschow were recommended and appointed. In 1705 they sailed for Tranquebar, on the Coromandel coast, and arrived there on the 9th of July, 1706. These missionaries were followed by three others, who arrived at the Cape of Good Hope in 1709. This mission was early assisted by the English Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, which sent out a printing-press, with the requisite apparatus of type, &c., and one hundred reams of paper, accompanied by Mr. Jonas Finck, a native of Silesia, as a printer. By this means the missionaries were enabled to print a number of books for the use of the Malabar school, which they had commenced, besides various tracts, but especially a translation of the Scriptures into Tamil, begun by B. Zeigenbalg, and completed by B. Schultze. In 1714, B. Zeigenbalg returned to Europe for a short time, and on that occasion was honored with an audience by the king, George I. who took much interest in the success of the mission. He was also patronized by the "Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge." The king and the Society encouraged the Oriental missionary to proceed in his translation of the Scriptures into the Tamil tongue, which they designated "the grand work;" the former addressing them letters of commendation and encouragement, signed with his own hand. After the first missionary Ziegenbalg had finished his course, he was followed by other learned and pious men, upwards of fifty in number in the period of a hundred years—among whom were Schultze, Jœnicke, Gericke, and Swartz, whose ministry has been continued in succession for many years; until the missions became absorbed in the Indian Missions of the Church of England.—(See BUCHANAN'S Researches, p. 65; and MORRISON'S Fathers and Founders, Vol. I. p. 159.)

In 1714, the King of Denmark established the Royal College of Missions at Copenhagen, for the instruction and preparation of missionaries. In connection with this college, the celebrated University of Halle, in Saxony, may very justly be noticed, not only on account of its general objects, but more especially from its having provided the Danish mission with its first missionaries, and several others, profoundly learned and most able men. This extraordinary institution was begun by the pious Dr. Herman Augustus Francke, as an orphan house, erected by voluntary donations, and continued increasing in other departments of an important nature until it became deserving of royal patronage, and the designation of a university. Connected with the institution are an oriental and theological college, for the study of eastern languages, and the instruction of missionary candidates; a medical school; a seminary for catechists; and an extensive printing-office, chiefly for the purpose of printing and circulating the Scriptures in different languages. At one period this university had more than 3,000 students from different parts of Europe. The Canstein and Jewish institutions are also intimately associated with the other benevolent establishments of Halle. The Canstein, or Bible Institution, was established in 1710 by Charles Hildebrand, Baron de Canstein, for the purpose of printing and selling Bibles and Testaments at a moderate price, in order to secure a more general circulation of the Scriptures. In 1805, above three millions of copies of the entire Bible or Testament had been distributed. The founder of the Jewish Institution, formed professedly for the conversion of Jews and Mohammedans, was Dr. John Henry Callinberg, one of the pupils of Professor Francke, and afterwards Professor of Divinity in the University of Halle. One of his most eminent coadjutors was Mr. Stephen Schultz, who was many years engaged in the East in missionary labors, and returned from Turkey to Halle in 1756.

In reverting to the Danish missionaries, it will be satisfactory to learn, from the following questions, propounded to their missionaries, that their instructions were Scriptural and sound: "Have you discovered some true working of grace in the souls of the catechumens? Are you sure there is more in their conversion than a bare external compliance with, and verbal confession of the Christian doctrine? What proofs and indications have you of an inward work of grace?" The venerable Schwartz was one of the missionaries sent out by the Danish College, though afterward supported by the English Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, which has uniformly aided the Danish Missions, by the entire or partial maintenance of many of its valuable missionaries.

The Danish mission to Greenland was commenced in 1721, by Rev. Hans Egede. This devoted man had for thirteen years felt a desire to convey the Gospel to that inhospitable country, and made repeated but ineffectual attempts to carry it into execution. At length he succeeded in raising a subscription of 8,000 rix dollars, and purchased a ship to convey himself and several settlers, who proposed to winter in Greenland. The king sanctioned and aided the enterprise, and settled upon Mr. Egede a salary of $300 a year. On their arrival they proceeded to erect a habitation, much to the displeasure of the natives, who called on their conjurors to destroy them. Mr. Egede attempted to convey to the people a knowledge of the most important facts of revealed religion by pictures, but the following year he gained some familiarity with the language, and was able to undertake oral instruction. The arrival of a colleague in the succeeding year, strengthened his hands, but though the people listened attentively to what was told them, they showed no personal interest in his preaching. Some of them, indeed, seemed pleased with the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, but the impression produced was faint, and their curiosity soon satisfied. In 1728, the King of Denmark resolved on prosecuting the work with increased energy, and a large colony, with additional missionaries, was sent out, and established a new settlement 200 miles northward of Good Hope, the station founded by Mr. Egede. But the severity of the winter and the ravages of a malignant disease made them discontented, and the accession of Christian VI. to the Danish throne put an end to the enterprise. The colonists were ordered home; Mr. Egede's salary was stopped; and he was offered the alternative of returning with the rest, or remaining on his own responsibility, with such persons as he could induce to stay with him. He obtained a supply of provisions for one year, and ten men to remain during the winter, and with a heavy heart bade adieu to his two colleagues, who returned with the colony. A vessel arrived the next year with provisions, and having a valuable return cargo, the king was encouraged to renew the trade, and made a generous donation to the mission. This intelligence gave fresh strength to the lonely missionary, but his faith was doomed to a severer trial. A young Greenlander who had visited Denmark came back, and shortly after died of a disease that proved to be the small-pox. The contagion spread rapidly, and raged for twelve months with such fatal effect, that for thirty leagues north of the settlement, the country was almost wholly depopulated. Such was the alarm and consternation of the natives at this visitation, that many committed suicide. Mr. Egede, in conjunction with the Moravian missionaries, who had recently arrived in the country, did all that untiring benevolence could do to alleviate the physical sufferings and comfort the hearts of the unhappy Greenlanders; they were much affected by their kindness, and manifested the liveliest gratitude. The mission was reinforced in 1734, by the arrival of three assistants, one of them a son of Mr. Egede. The venerable pioneer, regarding the number as wholly inadequate, returned to Denmark. His representations led to the establishment of several new colonies, and the sending of additional missionaries. But the efficiency and interest of the Danish mission shortly declined. It had not been wholly in vain, but its fruits were scanty, and the chief agency in imparting Christianity to Greenland was now manifestly committed to the United Brethren, or Moravians.—(Hist. View of Earlier Missions, by L. E. SMITH, p. 31.)

While attending the coronation of Christian VI., king of Denmark, at Copenhagen, in 1731, Count Zinzendorf was brought into intercourse with two Greenlanders, who had been baptized by Hans Egede, and from them he learned with regret that the Danish government had determined on abandoning their mission to that forlorn race. On the same occasion he met with a West Indian negro, of the name of Anthony, who told him that while in the island of St. Thomas, when sitting alone on the seashore, he had frequently and earnestly sighed for a revelation from heaven. By a remarkable providence of God he had been brought to Copenhagen, where he had received instruction in Christianity, and was baptized. Having enlarged in a touching manner, on the deplorable state of the negro slaves of St. Thomas, and referred with anguish of heart to the miseries endured by a beloved sister, who, like himself, had sighed for the light of truth; he added that if God were to send teachers to instruct the negroes in the way of salvation, he had no doubt that his sister, and many others similarly affected, would gladly embrace Christianity.

These accounts of the poor Greenlanders, and of the West Indian slaves, greatly affected the benevolent mind of Zinzendorf, and on his return to Herrnhut in July, he communicated his impressions to the congregation. So powerful was the effect of his narrative that several of the brethren immediately offered themselves for missionary service to the West Indies and Greenland.

This extraordinary band of Christian disciples, the feeble remnant of a once numerous body, that for a century and a half, against powerful enemies, maintained the doctrines of revealed truth in Bohemia and Poland, found a refuge from persecution on the estate of Count Zinzendorf, at Bethelsdorp, in Upper Lusatia. Thousands had been driven into banishment, and in their scattered condition, they and their descendants had either been absorbed into other communions, or had lost in a great measure the power of that faith which had been sealed with the blood of so many martyrs and confessors.

It is now, (October, 1854,) 122 years since the Moravians entered the great field of missionary enterprise; and though their congregation at the time they commenced their efforts in 1732 consisted of little more than six hundred persons, most of them poor and despised exiles, such was their zeal and disinterestedness in their Master's service, that in less than nine years after, they had sent missionaries to Greenland, to St. Thomas, to St. Croix, to Surinam, and to Berbice, to the North American Indians, to the negroes of South Carolina, to Lapland, to Tartary, to Guiana, to the Cape of Good Hope, and to the island of Ceylon. The successes that crowned these enterprises, thus so humbly begun, will be found narrated in their proper places in this work.

The mission at Stockbridge among the Mohecan Indians, was commenced in 1734 by the Rev. John Sergeant, then tutor in Yale College. He was succeeded by Rev. Mr. Woodbridge, at whose death Rev. Jonathan Edwards took charge of the mission for six years.

In 1735 John Wesley arrived in Georgia, to instruct the Indians of that state, where he remained till 1738. The founder of Methodism thus began his career as a foreign missionary.

In 1743 the devoted David Brainerd began his labors among the Indians under the patronage of the Scottish Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, and after four years of successful labor he expired in the home of President Edwards, in Northampton, on the ninth of October, 1747. The record of his life by Edwards, held up his career to the admiration of the Christian world; and it is interesting to note that the missionary devotion of William Carey and Henry Martyn, was nourished, if not kindled, by the contemplation of his brief but triumphant course. A complete view of Indian missions in North America would not fail to include at least a passing notice of Dr. Wheelock's Seminary for the education of Indians and missionaries, founded in 1748, at Lebanon, Ct., and afterwards removed to Hanover, N. H.; of the life and usefulness of Rev. Samson Occum, distinguished as an effective Indian preacher; of the forty years' ministry of Kirkland among the Indians of New York; of the labors and sufferings of the Moravians; and of others who did their part toward the rescue of the aboriginal tribes from the fate which uniformly overtakes savages when brought into conflict with civilization, unless it is arrested by the conservative force of Christianity. The proper effect of these benevolent efforts was greatly impaired by the vices and rapacity of the European settlers, and by the wars in which European policy involved the colonies. But that any remnants of the once powerful tribes formerly inhabiting the country east of the Alleghanies have been preserved, is to be attributed to the elevating influences of Christianity, imparted by those devoted men whose labors have been reviewed, sustained by active charity in Europe and America.—(SMITH, p. 47; Prince's Christian History, and Brainerd's Life, p. 47.)

The ardent zeal of Wesley and Whitefield and their associates, now began to develop itself. Their plans of operation both in England and America, were practically missionary; and contributed in a high degree to restore the spirit of an evangelical Christianity. To this fact the grateful testimony of Christians of various denominations has been willingly rendered, and in the energetic words of Mr. Douglass of Cavers, we may remark: "The Wesleyans, after Christianizing the abandoned districts of England, and encountering the rage of their own savage countrymen, often baffled by their own civil or religious guides—the neighboring magistrate or clergyman—have carried the same zeal, dexterity and success to the slaves of the West Indies, more docile than their masters; and to the savages of the remotest countries and islands, less infuriated and dangerous than the rude agricultural population of England."—(Encyclopedia Britannica, Article "Religious Missions." Vol. XL., Part I.) No doubt these labors for the revival of pure religion tended to evoke that spirit of devotion from which the missionary zeal of the churches bodied itself forth in the organizations which characterized the close of the eighteenth and the commencement of the nineteenth century.

In 1750, the Rev. Christian Frederick Swartz arrived at Tranquebar, and entered upon those apostolic labors which have linked his name imperishably with the establishment and progress of Christianity in India. He had gained some knowledge of the Tamil while at the university, to aid in examining the proofs of a version of the Scriptures in that language, an incident which is supposed to have suggested to him the design of devoting himself to missionary life. On his arrival he pursued his studies with such ardor and success, that in four months he commenced preaching. His labors were indefatigable, in public and in private, in Tranquebar, Trichinopoly, Tanjore, and throughout the Carnatic, for the space of fifty years. His purity, sincerity, and disinterestedness won the confidence of all classes, and those even who rejected his doctrine gave him the tribute of their unaffected veneration. In the distracting wars that marked that portion of the history of British India, his active benevolence was exerted to relieve misery which he could not prevent, and more than once he was sent to negotiate treaties, as the only European who could be trusted by the natives. When a garrison was threatened with famine, and the people could not be induced to furnish provisions, through fear that the supplies would be seized without compensation, they accepted the security of the venerated missionary for the whole amount needed. He rendered important services both to the British and to the native princes, yet scrupulously avoided receiving any gifts or emoluments that might taint him with the suspicion of mercenary motives, and sedulously guarded himself from being involved in any transactions that might impair his influence as a Christian and a preacher of the Gospel. With all the humility of a child, and the wisdom of mature experience, the harmlessness of the dove and the wisdom of the serpent, he was enabled to testify to the truth in every place and among all grades of society. At his death he was mourned as a father, and the Rajah of Tanjore erected a monument to his memory, with an inscription which is remarkable as the only specimen of English verse attempted by an Indian prince. Swartz had in his life time acquired considerable property, through the kindness of the English government and the native princes. When he was dying, he said: "Let the cause of Christ be my heir." When his colleague, the pious Gericke, was departing, he also bequeathed his property to the mission. And afterwards, another of the missionaries, Mr. Kohloff gave, from his private funds, upwards of a thousand pagodas a year.—(See Greenfield's Sketches of the Danish Mission, p. 145.) At the death of Swartz the native Christians connected with the mission were counted by thousands. The fruit of his toils was gathered rapidly by his successors. Bishop Heber, writing in 1826, says, "There are in the south of India about 200 Protestant congregations;" and he estimated their number at about 15,000. Many were undoubtedly merely nominal Christians, as the Lutheran missionaries were much less exacting in the qualifications they demanded for admission to the sacraments, than later missionaries have been; yet, considering the purity of their preaching and the devout spirit in which their labors were conducted, a large measure of piety must have been the result. These missions have since come under the patronage of the London Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, and the superintendence of the Anglican Bishop of Calcutta.—(Smith, p. 31.)

In 1769, the English Wesleyan Methodists began to send forth their missionaries. Eleven were commissioned for America, whose labors laid the foundation of the Methodist Episcopal Church. They next sent missionaries to the West Indies, and to the East Indies; but their missionary operations were not regularly organized until 1816.

We now approach the commencement of that period which has, by way of preëminence, been designated the MISSIONARY AGE, when the various churches of Christ began to wake up to life and activity on behalf of the heathen world; and the isolated efforts of individuals and churches were succeeded by the great organized agencies of the present day; a list of which, with the time of their organization, we give in the following table. For a more particular history of the origin and progress of these societies and their operations, the reader is referred to other parts of this work. All the more prominent societies are noticed under their respective names, in their places in the alphabet:—

As an approximation to an estimate of what this missionary Christianity has done for the world during the eighteen centuries we have sketched, in establishing the institutions of the Gospel, and bringing men into that relation to its agencies, from which their enlightenment and salvation may spring,—we shall here insert a quotation from a writer of acknowledged ability. Mr. Turner, in his "History of the Anglo-Saxons," gives the following tabular statement, "as a conjectural, but probable, representation of the progressive increase of the number of Christians in the world:"

2nd "	2,000,000	11th "	70,000,000
3rd "	5,000,000	12th "	80,000,000
4th "	10,000,000	13th "	75,000,000
5th "	15,000,000	14th "	80,000,000
6th "	20,000,000	15th "	100,000,000
7th "	25,000,000	16th "	125,000,000
8th "	30,000,000	17th "	155,000,000
9th "	40,000,000	18th "	200,000,000

—(FERUSSAC. BULL, Univers. Geog. p. 4, Jan. 1827.)

"But I think," he adds, "in this nineteenth century, the real number of the Christian population of the world is nearer to three hundred millions, and is visibly much increasing, from the missionary spirit and exertions which are now distinguishing the chief Protestant nations in the world."—(Vol. III. p. 484, note, 6th edition.)

We have thus endeavored to trace the connecting links in that chain of Christian labors which unites the missionary exertions of the Apostolic Church, down through the evangelical efforts of subsequent centuries, to the commencement of its present glorious development in our own day; and have at the same time glanced at the workings of that all-wise and gracious Providence, which in every age has been operating, not only in the religions, but also in the politics, the arts, the sciences, and the literature of our race, to prepare the world for the full millennial glory of the latter days.

—Condensed from an original article prepared by Rev. W. BUTLER.

EAST CAPE: A station of the Church Missionary Society in New Zealand, in the beautiful valley of Waiapu, through the centre of which runs the river of that name.

EBENEZER: A station and a colony of the Rhenish Missionary Society in South Africa, at the mouth of the Elephant river.

EBENEZER CHAPEL: A station of the London Missionary Society in Demerara, W. I.

EDINA: A settlement at the mouth of the Mechlin river, in Western Africa, formerly a station of the American Baptist mission.

EGYPT is so well known, and the descriptions of travelers are so generally accessible, that it is not necessary to the purposes of this work, to say much of its geography, topography, or history. It is bounded on the east by the Isthmus of Suez and the Red Sea, south by Nubia, west by Lybia, and north by the Mediterranean Sea, being about 500 miles in length, and some parts of it 250 in breadth. The principal parts of the country are the Delta, or lower part of Egypt, and the narrow valley of the Nile in the higher parts, which is bounded on both sides by high hills and abrupt banks. The mountains on the east of the Nile extend to the Arabian Gulf, and are only inhabited by Bedouins. The principal towns and villages are on the eastern side of the Nile. The whole area of arable soil has been estimated at from 10,000 to 16,000 square miles, or equal to nearly half the surface of Ireland.

This country, once the cradle of the arts and sciences, has been for centuries trodden beneath the iron hoof of Moslem and Turkish despotism. It is now, however, in a kind of transition state, in which the feelings, opinions, and habits of the people are undergoing a great and rapid change. Fanaticism is every day becoming less powerful in Egypt; and the ancient Asiatic manners and customs are fast giving way to the European.

The political revolutions to which Egypt has been subject from time immemorial, have given its population a mixed character. The following estimate of the different races of its present population, made by Mr. Lane, is, we believe, the most recent:

Arab Egyptians	1,750,000
Christian Egyptians (Copts)	150,000
Turks	10,000
Syrians	5000
Greeks	5000
Armenians	2000
Jews	5000
	1,927,000

Egypt presents great facilities for the introduction of the Gospel into the north-eastern portions of Africa. Independent of the Christians, who, though ignorant and degraded, still keep alive the name and profession of Christianity, there is a perpetual concourse of strangers from all parts of the interior. Caravans from Sennaar, Darfur, and Timbuctoo, are, at the proper seasons, in constant activity.

MISSIONS.

CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—Several German missionaries, with their wives, sent out by this society, arrived at Alexandria, Sept. 6, 1826, and employed themselves, at first, in the study of Arabic, preaching in English, French, and German, and in making tours, distributing the Scriptures and tracts, which were received with great readiness by the Copts. Their arrival occasioned a great sensation, especially among the Franks, who considered it a hopeless undertaking.

The location of this mission was at length fixed at Cairo, where, in 1830, they had two schools, with 51 boys and 21 girls, consisting of Greeks, Copts, Armenians, and Roman Catholics. They found it impracticable to preach the Gospel to congregations of the native Christians, who would not assemble for fear of their priests; but they made known the Gospel in religious conversations, from house to house, and with those who visited them. The Mohammedans were inaccessible, as it was death to them to change their religion; but some Mohammedan boys were admitted into their school. In 1833, a boarding-school was commenced, with ten boys; designed for training teachers and catechists. In 1834, a chapel was erected, by subscriptions obtained on the spot. In 1835, the mission was interrupted by a terrible visitation of the plague, which, for some time, carried off 1,500 daily. In 1840, it was reported by the missionaries, that in the different quarters of the town, no less than six religious meetings had been established by the native Copts, for the purpose of reading the Scriptures; and that the Patriarch had sanctioned them, remarking that it was better to meet to read the word of God, than to drink brandy and commit sin. He had also been induced to sanction a plan for the establishment of an institution in Egypt for the education of the Coptic clergy.

In 1841, Mr. Lieder writes, "Notwithstanding all the various vexations arising from political, civil, and religious causes, we are able to say, that not only have the education of the young, and the general civilization of the people, advanced beyond all expectation, but that a pleasing religious movement has also been observed among the Christians within this city."

In consequence of the distracted state of Abyssinia, the church in that country had been for a number of years without an Abuna, or Patriarch. In 1841, a deputation applied to the Patriarch of Alexandria for one, and he appointed a young man named Andraus, who had been partly educated in the society's school at Cairo. Although but 21 years of age, he received the appointment on account of his learning and religious character. He took with him 1,000 copies of Testaments, and other portions of Scripture; and it was hoped the event might prove favorable to the progress of the Gospel in Abyssinia.

In 1846, eleven Roman Catholic nuns arrived at Cairo, with large means, and purchased the extensive house of the former prime minister of Egypt, for purposes of education. In 1849, two Roman Catholic priests in Egypt, one of them Secretary of the Bishop, and the other, Superior of the Convent at Cairo, renounced the errors of Romanism, and made a profession of Protestantism, which created a great stir among the Catholics.

In October, 1849, Bishop Gobat visited this mission; and, in a letter dated Jerusalem, Jan. 9, 1850, he gives the following views respecting the policy and results of the mission: "The missionaries seem to follow almost too strictly the plan on which the mission was begun 24 years ago: to seek the friendship of the clergy, especially of the high clergy of the Eastern churches, with the view of influencing them gently, in the hope that by slow degrees they would become convinced of the errors, and themselves reform their respective churches. But this system has failed; and I am convinced that it will ever fail, with the several Eastern churches, as well as with the Church of Rome. Individual conversion must be the aim, as the only means of prosecuting reformation."—"Besides the dissemination of the Word of God and other good books, in all parts of Egypt, and the scriptural, though imperfect education of hundreds of youth, the results of the mission are, the conversion of a few individuals, some of whom have died in the faith; a few enlightened youth dispersed through Egypt; and many members of the different communities have been led to doubt the truth of their superstitions and traditions, and to respect Protestantism." This last, he represents as a great change from what it was when they first began to preach the Gospel in Egypt. "Yet," he says, "upon the whole, it must be confessed that the Egyptian mission has not had the success which might have been expected." He recommends a change in the policy of the mission, in accordance with these views. At a missionary conference, held in Jerusalem, May 12, 1851, it was determined to continue this mission on a reduced scale. It stands thus in the report for 1852:

Stations	1
Missionaries	2
Female Teacher	1
Male do.	1

EIMEO: An island of the Georgian group in the South Seas, about 2° west of Tahiti.

ELEUTHERA: A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society in the Bahamas, W. I.

ELIM: A station of the United Brethren in South Africa, on New-Year's river, 60 miles from Genadendal, near Cape Aiguilla.

ELIOT: The first place occupied by the missionaries of the American Board among the Choctaw Indians. It is within the limits of the State of Mississippi; about 120 miles from the north line of that State, and nearly equidistant from its eastern and western borders. It is about 400 miles W. S. W. of the Brainerd station, in the Cherokee nation. Messrs. Kingsbury and Williams commenced their labors there in June, 1818.

EMMAUS: A station of the United Brethren, in St. Thomas, W. I.

ENGKATOO: A village near Mautmain, in Burmah, and an out-station of the Maulmain Baptist mission.

ENON: A station of the United Brethren in South Africa, on the White river, near Algoa Bay.

EPISCOPAL BOARD OF MISSIONS: The Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, was organized by the General Convention, in 1820. By the constitution, the meetings of the Society were to be held at the time and place of the Triennial General Convention. The business of the Society was conducted by a Board, of which the bishops of the Church and patrons of the Society were members ex-officio, and the remainder were chosen at each regular meeting of the Society. The seat of operations was Philadelphia, and there were auxiliary societies in almost every state in the Union. Under this organization, the society went on prosperously for fifteen years.

At the meeting of the General Convention, in 1835, an entire change was made in the Board, the Church undertaking, in her character as a Church, to carry on the work of Christian Missions. At each meeting of the Convention, a Board of 30 members is elected, of which the bishops and the patrons who became such prior to 1829, are ex-officio members, called "The Board of Missions of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America." This board appoints, not necessarily and not usually, from its own number, two committees, of eight members each, four clergymen and four laymen, exclusive of a secretary and treasurer for each, and of which the bishop of the diocese of New York is ex-officio chairman, one to direct the Foreign, and the other the Domestic Missions. As thus organized, the society embraces as members, all the members of the Episcopal Church.

Board, or by either of the committees, without the recommendation of the ecclesiastical authority of the diocese to which he belongs; nor shall any missionary be sent to officiate in any diocese without the consent of the ecclesiastical authority of the same; and no clergyman shall be appointed a missionary, who is not at the time a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, of regular standing; and the appointment of a missionary may be annulled at any time by the written direction or order of a majority of the bishops of the Church."

TABULAR VIEW.

The following table shows the aggregate receipts of both the Foreign and Domestic Committees, from their organization to the change in the constitution in 1835, and, since that time, of every year, with the grand totals.

Year.	Domestic.	Foreign.
1820 to 1835	$76,328	$50,683
1836	18,783	18,050
1837	31,563	26,012
1838	25,566	27,194
1839	29,660	26,347
1840	19,609	23,853
1841	28,317	22,918
1842	27,517	29,279
1843	35,913	33,746
1844	27,899	31,032
1845	28,870	38,514
1846	36,444	34,127
1847	23,300	30,691

1850	36,194	34,800
1851	34,302	37,702
1852	30,395	41,048
1853	23,856	42,050
Totals,	$590,424	$629,968

The Board now have missions in Western Africa and China, which they are prosecuting vigorously and successfully. They have, also, an efficient mission in Greece, but chiefly devoted to educational interests. Their missions to Eastern Christians, for a time, absorbed no small share of their means and efforts; but not being as successful as was anticipated, they have been withdrawn in the form in which they were originally undertaken; but the field, we believe, is not abandoned, the committee being authorized, whenever they shall think proper, to resume the work in such form as they may judge to be wise and expedient. They had, also, for some time, a mission among the North American Indians; but this field has been transferred to the Domestic Committee, and as yet, but little progress has been made therein.

ERROMANGA: An island of New Hebrides, where is a station of the London Missionary Society. This is the place where the lamented Williams was murdered by the natives.

ERZURUM: A station of the American Board among the Armenians, situated almost in the centre of ancient Armenia. Population 36,000, of whom 10,000 are Armenians.

EUROPE: Area.—3,816,936 square miles. (Ungewitter's Europe.) The continent does not quite equal in superficial contents, the combined areas of the United States and Mexico.

Population.—262,300,000 (U.) The proportion is nearly that of seventy persons to a square mile. The United States and Territories would contain, if as densely occupied as Europe, 226,000,000 inhabitants.

Languages.—The principal languages are thirteen, derived from three great fountains; the Latin, the Teutonic, and the Slavonic.

Independent States.—Sixty-three. Of these eight are Republics; twenty-two, Empires or Kingdoms; eighteen, Duchies; fifteen, Principalities, Electorates, &c. Of these governments, seventeen are absolute; forty-six constitutional; sovereigns, nineteen, of whom nine are Catholics; eight, Protestants; one, Greek Churchman; one Mussulman.

The vitality of the Grecian and Roman form of civilization was already exhausted, at the opening of the Christian era. The sceptre was still held in the feeble grasp of the Caesars, long after all religious faith and national feeling had perished in Rome; a phenomenon repeated, in our day, on that magical soil. An effete civilization, a corrupt society, and a wild combination of refinement and barbarism, presented a rather discouraging field of invasion to the heaven-descended kingdom of Christ, yet in the vigor of its youth. Its entrance into Europe was silent, and almost unnoticed, in the persons of Jewish converts returning to their western homes from Jerusalem and the celebrated feast of Pentecost.

But the first formal invasion of Paganism, and the first organization of the spiritual kingdom, in Christian institutions, was made by the Apostle Paul, about A. D. 51, at Philippi, a provincial Roman city in Macedon. Amid weariness, watchings, fastings, stonings, scourgings, imprisonments, and martyrdoms; amid the fiercest opposition of philosophers, priests, and magistrates; with all the powers of Judaism and Paganism, arrayed against a few feeble soldiers of Christ, was his kingdom established in Europe.

Paganism as a religious system, was then so completely routed from the field, that, at this day there are left only a few thousand wandering tribes, and a few savages in Southern Russia and the northern regions, to profess its principles. But, as we shall see, history confirming and illustrating the language of prophecy, presents to our view "the deadly wound of the beast healed, and all the world wondering after the beast." The organic body of paganism was killed. The spirit of it went out, seeking rest, but found it not; and returned, finding the Roman empire and society, "empty, swept, and garnished" by Christianity; and entering into it, brought "seven other spirits worse than the first." But at present we only notice the fact that paganism, as an institution, was almost demolished. Judaism, too, fell before the victorious arms of the church. So that though it has thousands of votaries, it retains no fortress, but every where, simply craves permission to exist, and to traffic. Mohammedanism, in the 8th century, was master of Spain; and in the 15th century, when it lost Iberia, it ascended the Byzantine throne, which it still feebly retains. But this false religion need scarcely be mentioned when we are enumerating the forces actively contending against Christ. Having no missionaries, and having long since laid aside the policy of propagating its faith by the sword, it now chiefly interests us as one of the fortresses in which Satan defends his subjects against the weapons of Christ. The Greek and Armenian churches may be regarded in the same light, unless the present measures and war policy of the Czar must be considered as a form of missionary enterprise.

Among the victories of the early missionaries, must be enumerated the questionable conversion of Constantine, probably the most costly triumph Christianity ever made, as it immediately brought about the reconciliation of piety with worldliness, and of the Christian name with the Pagan spirit, the desecration of the Gospel to be merely an arm of the civil power. From that period the fatal re-action, which had before manifested itself at the extremities, reached the heart. Paganism revived under Christian names and forms; and Satan turned the very arms and armies of Christianity against Christ. And to this day, nearly three-fourths of the inhabitants of Europe still worship pagan gods in pagan temples, with pagan rites, and pagan festivals, all of them bearing Christian titles. The war cry of this occidental paganism is now, Christ and the Church; while it has abated in no degree its original hostility to both.

I. RELIGIOUS CLASSIFICATION OF THE PEOPLE OF EUROPE.—The great apostasy from truth and from spiritual worship, which began to manifest itself openly as Christianity became popular, was subjected to many modifying influences, political intrigues, military adventures; and the curious tides of immigration resulted in producing those distinctive phases of religious sentiment and ecclesiastical organization, which now characterize respectively the three principal divisions of the European family. The Slavonic tribes, taking possession of north-eastern and eastern Europe, assimilated with the Greek Church. The Romanic races, occupying southern Europe, never really abandoned the distinguishing spirit of the old empire; a spirit of gross superstition, servile subjection to authority; consolidated social organization under rigid law; and the ambition of universal dominion. They still retain all the spirit of pagan hostility to Christ, unchanged. They uphold the anti-Christian power prominently portrayed in prophecy: the beast, to whom Satan gives energy to make war on the saints. Protestantism has been engrafted on the old trunk of the Germanic race; a people controlled by the spirit of personal independence, and of loyal and intelligent submission to rulers chosen by the ruled. With them originated the reformation in the 16th century, which made a radical change in the intellectual, social, and religious condition of the entire middle and north-western sections of the continent. And in fact, it had, at one period, thoroughly penetrated Italy, France, Belgium, Austria, and Poland. But, by dragoons and Jesuits, by massacres and banishments, those states were restored to the Roman pontiff. So that the present religious condition of Europe may be thus roughly sketched in numbers:

A. The Unevangelical Sects.—Roman Catholic, 133,000,000, (U.) Jews, 3,000,000, (U.) * Greek Church, 59,000,000, (U.) Pagans, 750,000, † Mohammedans, 7,000,000 (U.) other sects, 1,000,000; inhabiting the several states thus: Roman Catholics and Jews, every state of Europe; Greek Christians, Greece, Ionian Isles, Russia, Turkey, Austria; Mohammedans, Turkey and Austria; Pagans, Russia.

B. The Evangelical Sects.—They are computed to embrace about 58,750,000 persons, ‡ whom we may conjecturally state to be thus apportioned to the several denominations: Episcopalians, 13,000,000; Independents, 3,980,000; Methodists, 4,000,000; Presbyteri-

* Baird's Retrospect, p. 190.

† A writer in the Boston Courier, (April, 1854,) asserts that the professors of the Byzantine creed are not only a majority in Free Greece, but also half the population of Austria, Servia, &c.; and two-thirds of the population of Turkey.

ans, 6,973,000; Baptists, 1,912,000; Moravians, 45,000; Lutheran, German Reformed, and United Churches, 28,840,000. The Episcopalians reside chiefly in Great Britain, Ireland, Guernsey, Jersey, Gibraltar, and Malta. Yet so many of them are constantly abroad; and the national feeling of the English is so identified with their religious sentiments, that they have chapels in most of the great cities of the Continent. The Presbyterians are found in Ireland, Scotland, England, Holland, France, Switzerland, and Piedmont. The Lutherans inhabit Denmark, Sweden, Norway, Germany, and France chiefly. The German Reformed are mostly in Germany. The Baptists are in Great Britain and Ireland, and a few on the Continent. The Independents or Congregationalists, are in Great Britain, Ireland, France, and Russia. The Moravians are found in England, Ireland, Lusatia, Silesia, Gosna, &c. Separate organization is not so much their aim, as quickening existing churches.

The distinctions of doctrine, government, and rites, which separate the evangelical churches of Europe into different denominations, are so generally known, as to need no explanation here. Perhaps the division of the German churches is less understood in this country. It may therefore be remarked that the difference between Luther and Calvin, as men and Christians, has extensively perpetuated itself in the Continental churches. This difference has been thus expressed by Herzog and Lange. (as quoted by Professor Smith. Christian Review, xvi. 596,) "while it was the special office of Lutheranism to protest against all Judaism in the Church, it has been the special office of the Reformed Church to protest against all Paganism." "The Catholic Church is the church of priests; the Lutheran of theologians; and the Reformed Church is the church of the believing congregation. The first talks most of the church; the second, of the speculative aspects of religion; the Reformed Church dwells most fondly upon the plan of Redemption." Calvin had a clearer intellect, and a purer logic than Luther; less superstition as a catholic, and a less preponderating imagination. Hence the Reformed Church has swept away more of the rubbish of popery, and come to a greater degree of simplicity in ecclesiastical organization; while it has, at the same time, cast away the vague conceptions of the Eucharist, which make the twilight where Romanism most effectually does its work of proselyting. They differ, then, in origin, the one being German, the other French; in doctrinal bias, the one tending to Arminianism, the other being purely Calvinistic; in government, the one being episcopal, the other Presbyterian. They have now been amalgamated in some states, as Prussia, Baden, &c. It was, however, a forced union, ab extra, not voluntary, and so not vital. And yet it was working well in Prussia; too well, indeed, to meet the government's desire for a firmer attachment to dogmas and distinctive standards; as ensuring a more legal and less democratic spirit than the fervent union of real believers.

II. ESTIMATE OF THE SPIRITUAL CONDITION OF EUROPE.—God alone knows the heart; and man is, at best, an imperfect judge of his own, much more of his brother's spiritual state before the Omniscient eye. And while an inaccurate judgment is worse than useless, an arrogant judging of man is hurtful to him who practices it. A judgment is arrogant, either when it is volunteered for a selfish end, or when it is formed without adequate light, and a conscientious care. But on the other hand it is very important for us, both to judge the religious systems under which our fellow men are passing their brief probation, and also to form a general estimate of their spiritual condition, as individuals and as bodies. We must therefore in justice say, that we experience more sadness than joy, in counting the numbers in the evangelical ranks in Europe. We fear, and for the most cogent reasons, that the vast majority of them are in the condition of the church of Sardis: having a name to live, they are dead. And with every true believer, such a conviction will incite to prayer for the Spirit of life to come down and breathe on the "valley of dry bones." We shall now refer to some indications of the present spiritual condition of the European churches:—

1. The condition of the Clergy.—The intellectual cultivation of the evangelical clergymen is generally of the highest order. And there is extensively a return to the more direct study of the Bible itself, which has always distinguished the ministry in the best ages of the church. Fifty years ago there was left a small remnant of godly men in the European ministry; but great changes have taken place in England, Scotland, Germany, France, and Switzerland, within that period. In 1815 there was probably not one spiritual, faithful preacher of Christ's Gospel in the Protestant Church of France—now there are nearly 300. In England the clergymen of the established church were generally far from possessing the spirit of their office; now there are thousands of godly, earnest men in the ministry of that church. The same might be said of the kirk of Scotland, and particularly of that large body called the Free Church. Even the Independents in Great Britain, thirty years ago, had fallen far below the type of Owen, Baxter, and Howe. The change in that body of ministers is very cheering. The same may be said of the German clergy, who had sunk deep into the abominations of neology. About half the Protestant clergy in Germany are evangelical in opinion and feeling, the rest embrace every shade of opinion—moderate rationalism, deism, pantheism, &c. The evan- gelical clergy surpass in learning the clergy of any other nation. They are generally devout men. The pulpit is disproportionately weak when compared with the chairs of theological science. The number of first-rate exegetes, historians, theologians, is very great, in proportion to the number of effective preachers. There is too much reflection and too little action.

2. Estimate of the Sabbath.—It is essential to the spiritual prosperity of the church, that she recognize two features of this institution: its divine authority and its entirely spiritual character. But the general declension of the European churches has sadly manifested itself in this direction. Yet it is cheering to witness the many signs of a healthful sentiment reappearing. Among other indications of this we may notice the following facts. The Evangelical Alliance has called the attention of the continental churches to this subject. At Metz, Amiens, Agen, and Lille, in France, industrial men and members of liberal professions have engaged, by regular contracts, to abstain from all work and commercial operations on Sunday. A central council for promoting the voluntary observance of the Sabbath has been formed in Paris. And the King of Prussia has issued military orders requiring his army to observe it as sacred time. The labors of our brethren in the British parliament are familiarly known. They have led, as is always the case with any important subject brought before that practical body of men, to a thorough investigation of facts, as to the amount of outward desecration of the Divine institution. The result is, an accumulation of powerful testimony in favor of at least so much legislation as shall throw the influence of the government on the side of the Sabbath. In Protestant Germany, however, the Sabbath is a religious and social holiday. The people follow the reformers in their loose estimate of the Sabbath, and know nothing of the advantages of a Puritan Sunday. The continental reformers never reached the light attained by those of Scotland and England. In Switzerland the infidel party, ascendant in the government, have labored to put the Sabbath where the leaders of the revolution in France placed it, in the height of their frenzy.

3. Religious Reading is another test of advancing or declining piety. In this light the vast circulation of books by the British, French, and other tract societies is very full of promise. The British, French, and German presses are pouring forth continually a stream of religious truth surpassing the productions of any preceding age. Religious devotional books are said, by an intelligent observer, to be more read in Germany than in any other country.

4. Family Worship.—With Christians in America the neglect of at least daily domestic worship is regarded as inconsistent with the healthy condition of a church; and yet, out of the small circle of the evangelical churches of Switzerland and France, Holland and Sweden, there is evidence of a very general want of family worship among the evangelical churches of the continent.

5. Discipline is another pillar of a true church, extending its cognizance of church-members to the following points: morality; soundness of belief; outward fellowship; and habitual attendance on ordinances. We know not an established church in which such a thing as discipline, in the Puritan sense, is recognized.

6. Social Religious Meetings are an efficient means of promoting piety. But these are generally discountenanced in the established churches, though not universally neglected. The dissenters, and the most evangelical members of the established churches generally delight in adding to the more general and formal, the more social and simple exercises of prayer-meetings and conferences.

7. Revivals and Conversions.—We do not insist upon one specific form of manifesting the work of the Holy Spirit in the human heart. Men must, however, be converted; and if we are to judge from the entire course of the Church's history, conversions will be sometimes solitary, and at others, in great numbers at a time. But it is certain that the supernatural operations of the regenerating Spirit are so much modified in their manifestations by the outward influences which affect their subjects, that it is difficult to judge the degree of spiritual influences a people enjoy, except by the more uniform and universal tests of their living "soberly, righteously, and godly." Yet there are many social movements in European churches, resembling the phenomena known among us as revivals of religion. In France, Sweden, Norway, and many parts of Germany, they have appeared, especially in France, under the labors of faithful evangelists and colporteurs, and particularly in connection with the meetings of the Evangelical Alliance.

8. Religious Education is also intimately connected with the existence and advancement of true godliness among a people. By no people has more fidelity been manifested in the religious education of families and in public religious instruction, than by the Scotch. The pious and patriotic exertions of Knox to secure a common religious instruction for the children of his countrymen, have produced results of immeasurable value to that people, in the formation of personal character, and consequently in their national history. The recent struggles of the dissenters in Great Britain to prevent the monopoly of religious education in public schools by the Church of England, have led the dissenters to more vigorous exertions to provide such education for the poor, under their own direction. The Congregationalists have commenced not only their own colleges, but what we should call a normal school, or a school for training religious teachers of public schools. It is called the Homer-ton College, in which were recently 21 male and 28 female pupils. The necessities of the case have driven the governments of Europe, for centuries, to provide for the poor orphans within their dominions. And private philanthropy has done much in this respect. In the seventeenth century, Francke instituted at Halle his celebrated orphan-house, which has trained nearly 5000 children under the influence of the Gospel. It has grown into an important institution, having several branches, among which is the Canstein press, that has already issued two million Bibles, and one million New Testaments, at a low price. There are in London 150 ragged schools, which are accomplishing a work of immeasurable importance for the long neglected pauper children of the metropolis. In Horn, near Hamburg, is a very interesting institution for reforming depraved children. It refuses to bring together more than one hundred. The Evangelical Society of France has a valuable school in the city of Paris, for educating the children of Roman Catholic parents, which has been crowned with great success. Sunday schools originated in England, and are gradually introduced in France, Sweden, Denmark, and other portions of the Continent.

9. Christian Union is another sign of the Church's spiritual state. The divisions of the church are a sign of weakness. They awaken zeal, indeed; but its strength is the convulsive action of disease, not the vigorous movement of health. And Rome has obtained an advantage by presenting the false appearance of unity in contrast with this manifest diversity, and often even animosity of the different branches of the evangelical church. But we may notice many indications of a brighter day approaching. Among these we place, first, the organization of the Evangelical Alliance. All the friends of Christian Union are not yet convinced of its value. It must, in fact, be admitted that in England, where it originated, there was an outward pressure, which might as fully account for the movement as the simple attraction of brotherly love. In France, however, it appears to exist in a purer spirit; yet it must be said for the British Alliance, that it has nobly carried out the spirit of brotherly love in its valuable efforts to liberate the Madias, and to defend the Baptists in Prussia. It is slowly gaining favor in Holland, Sweden, and Germany. In the latter country there are two institutions already existing, which, to some extent, embody the same principles—the Kirchen-Tag and the Gustavus Adolphus Society. The first of these grew out of the movement in London, and is promoting brotherly love in the German churches. Having to contend with a very high church feeling in the Lutheran clergy, it is not yet prepared for an affirmation of unqualified religious liberty as the normal state of man and churches. It is engaged in distributing Bibles and tracts, and at its last meeting thoroughly discussed the questions of Union, Schism, and Separation. In all such discussions we may hope that truth and charity will gain ground. The Gustavus Adolphus Society was formed in 1832, on the second centenary of the Protestant hero's death from whom it was named. It was organized "to afford assistance to the dispersed and scattered members of the Protestant Church, especially to any who may suffer oppression; to supply their spiritual wants, and to aid in the erection of chapels, in which the evangelical doctrines may be preached." At first it was not discriminating in the selection of its objects; but now stands on the Word of God as its platform. Among other good deeds, it has saved from utter extinction a church of 1900 members at Santomysl, by reconstructing its ruined church edifice. It expended last year more than $30,000, mostly on churches suffering from Romanist oppression. And not least among the signs of Christian union is the growth of Young Men's Christian Associations, which are entirely catholic in their character, and are now increasing in number in different states of Europe.

10. The Missionary Labors of the Church.—

Here we see one of the brightest spots in the horizon, the harbinger of a new day for Europe and the world. When we consider what has been done in Europe and by European Christians since the days of the Countess of Huntington and the Wesleys, to spread abroad Bibles, religious tracts, and missionaries, we feel assured that so much seed sown in so much faith and prayer, must be growing, now in the unnoticed blade, soon to show the ear, and the full corn in the ear. Other portions of this Cyclopaedia will show what the European churches are doing in the great field of Paganism. We shall here merely exhibit a sketch of the missions conducted on their own territory, and a table of their foreign operations. The Gustavus Adolphus Society, already referred to, is a Home Mission Society. They have turned their attention recently to the wretched condition of their countrymen in the different capitals of Europe. In London are 25,000 German Protestants, of whom not 1000 attend worship. In Paris 60,000 Germans are found, exceedingly degraded, for the most part, having only 5 churches and 7 preachers. In Lyons there are 12,000. They resolved, at their recent meeting in Berlin, to collect information concerning the spiritual condition of their expatriated countrymen, and report to the several states, requesting that measures might be taken to discourage emigration, and to provide churches and schools for those who are deprived of them. Besides this institution, the German churches have organized the Inner or Home Missionary Society. The Episcopal and the dissenting churches of Britain have organized very efficient societies to labor in Ireland. To those Irish mission churches alone which are sustained by the Congregational Society of England, more than 400 members were admitted last year. Its labors extend to nearly half a million of people, and it has 13,000 children in its Sunday-schools.

The following table presents an approximate view of the contributions of the European evangelical churches to the missionary work; and yet it is far from being complete.

All intelligent observers agree in affirming that the Roman Catholic and Greek churches present a spectacle of the most revolting formalism and hypocrisy on the one side, and superstition, equally disgusting, on the other. The absurd credulity of the people, and the villainy of the priesthood, who palm upon them not only lying legends of the past, but present miracles, characterizes even the most highly cultivated Catholic people. High dignitaries in the church give their sanction to these falsehoods; and even the Pope shows his favor to the monarch of a mighty nation, by sending him a tooth or the toe of a saint! Materialism in the lower stratum of society; absorption in money-making, in the middle stratum; and sheer scepticism, in the upper class, gives the portrait of every Catholic country.

The interesting inquiry here meets us: Is the present tendency of Europe toward Protestantism, Atheism, or Popery? So far as England is concerned, we may speak with confidence. Even the astute Wiseman was deceived by the tractarian movement. The Oxford apostasy and the tendency Romeward have probably reached their climax. And it is now manifest to all that the Cardinal has unmasked his battery prematurely. The Protestant spirit of England has been outraged, and will probably not slumber again speedily.

The London Times asserts that, from 1780 to 1853, the Papists have increased only from 70,000 to somewhat less than 200,000. In Scotland the increase has been much greater; but in Germany, as in England, the semi-Roman development has only the more effectually aroused the Protestant spirit. And we have varied and accumulating testimony to the falling away of thousands from the Roman church, besides a vast growth of Protestant populations in Catholic towns and districts on the continent. Coblenz, for example, had, in 1824, 23 families or 60 persons in the evangelical church. Now there are about 4000. Mayence, 50 years ago, had 60 members; now more than 6000. Cologne in the same time has advanced from 1000 to nearly 10,000. In Ireland the change has been very great; though the number of conversions is variously estimated. In West Galway ten years ago there were but 500 Protestants; there are now more than 5000. Rev. W. Marable says that within two years, 30,000 have been converted to the evangelical faith. In the diocese of Tuam, out of about 20,000 Protestants, nearly 6000 were born papists. At the beginning of the present century the King of Bavaria married a Protestant princess, who brought a Protestant chaplain to her court. But he could not find a person in Munich who would consent to rent him a house. He was the first avowed Protestant settling there. Now there are 12,000 Protestants in the city; mostly however, immigrants. In France and Italy we have growing evidence of changes of conviction, which are abiding their time, but which must, ere long, be openly manifested.

The Ultramontanists in France now dare to unmask their policy; and are misinterpreting the silence of the nation at the avowal of their monstrous notions and pretensions. They are certainly completing the alienation of the French heart from the Roman church. After the events of 1830, honest men looked to the priests as the only defence against socialism. But the conviction is steadily growing, that Rome is the enemy of a rational freedom. The people are beginning to make that comparison which is so fatal to Rome, between the influence of Romanism and Protestantism respectively, on human society. Protestant England, they see, advancing; but gradually, healthfully, peacefully adopting various improvements in her government, while within sixty years Catholic France, with violence and blood, has passed successively from monarchy to republic; from that to the consulship; then, to the empire; then to legitimist monarchy; then to constitutional monarchy; then to the republic; then to absolute monarchy again; and she is resting there only to recover breath for another somerset. Even Catholic writers, as for instance, Eugene Pelletan and Michel Chevalier, (Profession de foi du XIXe Siècle, 1 vol. 8vo.—Journal des Débats, 17 Juin, 1853,) have confessed that Protestant, or at least, non-Catholic nations alone are advancing in all respects; and that they are moving on to the conquest of the world, whilst Catholic nations are gradually dropping from their hands the sceptre of power and influence.

Within twenty years, the Protestant pastors of the French national church have increased from 250 to 500; and all other Protestant interests have been advancing in the same ratio.

Atheism has made some progress in Great Britain, in connection with the movements toward social reformation. But these indications have drawn forth corresponding efforts on the part of Christians, which are attended with very encouraging results. The change in the tone of some leading journals indicates a favorable change among the educated classes. In Germany there is a manifest reaction among the clergy. The cold and barren regions of atheistical speculation are not as popular as they were a few years ago. Believing men are adopting a bolder policy; and in fact, entertaining less respect than formerly for rationalistic theories.

In Prussia there have been some manifestations of favor to Popery in high places. And this has certainly led to a formidable increase of Roman priests and churches in that kingdom. But the people have at length become so sensitive on the subject, that the king will probably act hereafter with more reserve in this direction, and pay more regard to the wishes of his Protestant subjects than to the feelings of his Catholic wife.

It is then difficult to give a well founded reply to the inquiry whether the European people are tending most to Protestantism or to Popery. The Catholics appear to be sanguine. You may find recorded in the Dublin Registry the very names of their converts from the Protestant ranks, with special stress laid upon the rank of the pervert or the standing of his father. Thus they give the statistics of conversions in England, (1845-1852.) "Clergy 142. Ladies, 76. Their children, 87. Noble ladies, 26. Noblemen, 30. Gentlemen, all of high station, 148. Total 509. Mem. The additions of 1853 will greatly swell this list."

In so brief a space as we can give to this field, it is impossible to show all the encouraging indications of reviving religious principle and feeling, which the present state of Europe presents. The French Protestants are aiming in every way to revive a love for the memory of their ancestry of confessors and martyrs. Among other measures they have organized a society for publishing the history of French Protestantism. The British press is issuing a higher style of exegetical works than we have been accustomed to receive from that quarter. And religious periodicals of great value are now issued in every part of Protestant Europe. And if it were necessary to reply to the false assertions of a distinguished Roman prelate under the title, "The Decline of Protestantism," we should merely contrast the missionary enterprises of the True with those of the False Church. Did we count our missionaries as they count theirs, amounting to 6,076, ours would be 20,000, or 4000 ordained missionaries, and 16,000 assistants, controlling some 40 presses in heathen lands. We should point to more than $7,000,000 spent in one year by the evangelical churches of Europe alone to propagate a pure Christianity; to 2,200,000 Bibles, which one society distributed in one year, making a total of more than 26,500,000; and to 34,700,000 religious publications; making a total of nearly 550,000,000 by one society.

III. THE AGENCIES EMPLOYED TO DISSEMINATE THE GOSPEL IN EUROPE.—We are not at liberty to consider here any agency that does not immediately affect the religious interests of the people. Yet, Christianity requires so imperiously the aid of popular instruction, to secure her highest ends, that we cannot entirely omit a reference to it. The brutal ignorance of the majority of Catholics who migrate to this country from Ireland, is painful to every philanthropic mind. In Russia not more than one in eight hundred can read. So that we must strictly regard the majority of the people of Europe as really pagans, intellectually as well as religiously.

1. Common Schools.—Scotland took the lead in popular education. And to that and the character of her pulpit instruction, she is indebted for her distinguished position. England moves slowly in this work, because Dissent is jealous of the Established Church; and yet the government wishes to place the schools under the control of the pet-church. Prussia has introduced a very efficient system of common schools, which is now extended to all Germany. Yet it should be remembered that, while the children of Prussia are so extensively instructed, we must not judge the results of this instruction by what we witness in this country. With the peasantry it does not form the basis of higher cultivation, nor the guarantee of further improvement. Ireland, Holland, Denmark, Protestant Switzerland, Austria, Italy, Belgium, and Sardinia, have adopted a system of primary instruction. Russia, Sweden, and Turkey, are taking some steps in the matter. Much has been done in Germany, France, and England to reclaim vicious boys. Miss Callandrini, a lady of a truly missionary spirit, more than twenty years ago introduced religious infant schools into Northern Italy. But the Roman Pontiff, with earnest vigilance, has guarded his little wretched dominions from the intrusion of infant schools, railroads, and Bibles.

2. Temperance.—The northern portions of the Continent present the same melancholy spectacle of intemperance, which was so common in this country, before the organization of Temperance Reform; and until very recently no very manifest impression has been made any where, unless it be in Sweden. Within a few years, however, the British people are beginning to appreciate the immense advantages which would result from a universal cessation from the use of intoxicating beverages. But we now look mainly to—

3. Preaching and the distribution of Bibles and Religious Tracts, for the salvation of the perishing. There are several organizations in this country, and in England and Scotland, which act on the people of Europe, mostly through native institutions and laborers. In America is the American and Foreign Christian Union, which supplies the principal Continental societies with funds, and employs a few laborers under its own immediate direction. In an appendix will be found a very full statement of the missionary labors of the Methodist Church in Europe. The Presbyterian Church (O. S.) also contributes liberally to this object. The Baptist Church has labored long and faithfully to support American missionaries in France; thus far, with very discouraging results, from the opposition of the priests, which has been the more effectual, as directed against foreigners. They have likewise sustained missions in Germany and northern Europe, and with much better success. Their churches now spread through Germany, Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, and into Switzerland, embracing about 5000 members. More than fifty Bible Societies, and the Tract and Sunday-school Societies of Europe and America, are distributing their valuable publications over the whole European field; perhaps less extensively in Spain and Portugal, however, than in any other countries. The native Missionary Societies in France, Belgium, Switzerland, and the German states, laboring among their own population, are yet feeble; and mostly much restricted by the civil power of the priesthood. The Belgian Evangelical Society has 16 preachers and 45 stations. The French Wesleyans have 26 chapels, 79 stations, 19 ministers and candidates, five evangelists and catechists, 32 local preachers, 830 members, 122 candidates, and 1462 pupils in their Sunday-schools. The Religious Tract Society of France has distributed more than one million publications. The two French Bible Societies have distributed more than 18,000 Bibles and 67,000 New Testaments. Besides these are the Evangelical Society of the dissenters; the Central Society, sustained by the evangelical members of the French National Church, both accomplishing a work of inestimable importance, employing hundreds of laborers, and with constantly encouraging results. The Church of Lyons is itself a vigorous missionary society. In Germany there are various important Home Missionary institutions, which are working with encouraging success. In Sardinia, complete toleration is now opening a wide door for evangelical efforts. In Central and Southern Italy, as in Austria, much greater obstructions exist. Several very interesting establishments, almost or quite unknown in America, exist among the Protestants of Europe. One is the Deaconess Houses, designed to train religious women for usefulness among the poor and sick. They exist in France, Germany, Switzerland, and Russia. Another is a Retreat for ladies of high families in Germany, not requiring celibacy; but, in case of marriage, the member of the sisterhood forfeits her admission-fee. This, and several others, are adapted to the peculiar circumstances created by the institutions and customs of the country. The Rough House, of Horn, near Hamburg, has great celebrity as a model institution for reclaiming children. We now inquire—

IV. WHAT MAY BE DONE TO EVANGELIZE EUROPE?—Wide and effectual doors are open for a tenfold increase of evangelical labors. And there is much reason to believe that He who is so wonderfully bringing India and China within the reach of his Church, will soon bring eastern and southern, if not north-eastern Europe before her, as an accessible missionary-field. But at present our brethren in France, Belgium, and Germany are continually pointing out to us labor to be done, and laborers ready to perform it, while the lack of pecuniary resources restricts their operations.

V. THE HINDRANCES TO EVANGELIZING EUROPE.—They are many and mighty; such as only faith in God has a right to despise. Most prominent among them are:

1. The Union of the Church with the civil government; or, rather, the subjection of the Church to civil rulers. The Roman Catholic Church is thus united with the governments of France, Belgium, Spain, Portugal, the Italian States, Austria, and other German states, and several Swiss cantons. The Episcopal Church is thus united with the Government of Great Britain in England, Ireland, Malta and Gibraltar. The Lutheran Church is united with the governments of Prussia, France, Denmark, Sweden, Saxony, and other German states. The Presbyterian Church is united with those of Holland, France, Great Britain (in Scotland,) and several Swiss cantons. The Greek Church is united with those of Russia, Greece, and the Ionian Isles. The Mohammedan Church is united with that of Turkey. France also supports the Jewish Church. The vital question in regard to this relation between the Church and the State, is: Has either a right to interfere with the self-government of the other? It is a broad question, demanding a profounder discussion than would be appropriate here. Yet we cannot dismiss it with a dry statistical statement. Even popes have advocated the complete independence of each of these powers. Their testimony, however, loses even its appropriate weight, because it is always given for an occasion, and frequently on the opposite sides of the same question. Some writers pretend to discover great advantages to the Church and to society in this connexion, especially in the periods when the forms of society were dissolved; and also its adaptedness to the old forms of civilization. To us, even this is very questionable; while, in our age, it presents gross and enormous evils, with scarcely a mitigating feature. The injustice now perpetrated under the forms, and in the name of justice, by the most civilized governments of Europe, is a constant appeal to the vengeance of Heaven. We mean not to deny that good men may approve of the system; nor to censure those who, in their circumstances, think it best to labor within the various established churches. Every man stands or falls to his own Master, and not to his brethren, on that point. Take the case of a civil government throwing the whole of its power into the cause of a lie; abetting, sustaining, enforcing on the consciences of its subjects, be they thousands or millions, to reject Christ's Gospel, and embrace an invention of Satan! How great the responsibility; how enormous the injury; how dreadful the account of such a stewardship! It is much for a man to judge for himself what is truth, and to stake his eternal well-being on it. It is more to give himself to instructing and persuading others to do the same. But what will at last be thought of worldly princes or godless statesmen choosing for themselves a false religion, and then, under pains and penalties, enforcing it on their fellow-creatures! They hinder Christ's faithful servants from proclaiming his Gospel. They are the kings of the earth that set themselves against the Lord and his anointed. They hinder the people from coming to the light. No one, for instance, can tell what would become of the Roman Catholic Church in ten years, if the civil and military power of France and Austria did not uphold it. We have reason to believe that multitudes of the people of Italy and France would at once proclaim themselves Protestants of some form; and that the zeal of some of its most fervent prelates would take some other object, and flow in some other channel. We might refer, in confirmation, to the changes which have taken place in Turin, in Genoa, and in Nice, within six years. Nice is said to have become almost as Protestant as Geneva. And, were it in place here to cite facts from America, we could show that Romanism melts away like dew, where it is left to a fair competition with Christianity. Maryland was settled by Catholics, just as New England was settled by Puritans. Puritans retain their ascendancy there, and have moulded the character of all the land westward to the Pacific ocean. But Maryland presents at this day 65 Catholics to 800 Protestants. Florida was Spanish. The whole country west of the Mississippi was first settled by Spanish Catholics or French Jesuits. And yet, with all the influx of Irish and German Catholics,—enough, it might reasonably be thought, to have given the Roman Church a majority,—the census shows in Florida 5 Catholics to 147 Protestants; in Louisiana, 55 Catholics to 223 Protestants; and in similar proportions in the other states.* It is difficult for Christians in America to conceive of the enormous evils resulting from this violent conjunction of these two institutions. What man can judge for the conscience of his fellow-man? Think of such sovereigns as Henry VIII. of England, and his daughter Elizabeth, determining for godly men what they must believe, and how they must worship! No Protestant country more clearly determined, at the time of the Reformation, the true relations of the Church and State, than Scotland; and, at the same time, none embraced more errors than England. The only difference between the supremacy of Henry, however, and that of Victoria is, in omitting the title of headship. Thus stands the 37th article of the Church of England: "The Queen's majesty hath the chief power in this realm of England, and other her dominions, unto whom the government of all estates of this realm, whether they be ecclesiastical or civil, in all causes, doth appertain." The 2d canon of 1603 stands thus:† "Whosoever shall affirm that the king's majesty hath not the same authority in cases ecclesiastical, that the godly kings had among the Jews, let him be excommunicated."

Dr. Lucius, of Hesse Darmstadt, speaking of his country, says:‡ "The present lords paramount of the soil are, at the same time, archbishops, born of the Protestant national church—bishops in military array, with sword and shield; would that they also always bore the sword of the Spirit, and girded on the whole armor of God! Even Roman Catholic princes assume the arch-episcopal office, and exercise its authority in the German Protestant church." Thus, ungodly men enact ecclesiastical laws, and appoint to ecclesiastical offices. Do we avoid this evil wholly by our system? Alas! no. But when worldly men get power in the Church here, it is not by the consent of the Church, by birth, nor by the operation of a system which avows that piety is not necessary in an officer of Christ's Church. The Hessian Constitution for 1803 runs thus: "To the Minister of the Interior" (he may be an infidel, avowedly; it would not hinder his appointment to this civil office,) "belong matters of police, in the widest signification of the term; the promotion of popular education, and, consequently, ecclesiastical and scholastic affairs!" Thus, the law makers, judges, rulers and teachers of Christ's Church, are more likely to be men without piety, than to be regenerated men.

Look, then, at these facts, selected from thousands. They show both the indifference of the higher clergy to the real worth and wants of the poorer citizens, and the violence done to the Church of Christ in depriving her of one of her most valuable and cherished rights, the choice of teachers. Of 547,112 inhabitants of Sardinia, 512,381 can neither read nor write. And yet, there are in that state 11 bishops, 693 canons, 391 curés, 88 monasteries, 15 nunneries, and 2600 priests! or less than 160 souls to a teacher of religion. The Church of England is possessed of immense wealth, and yet the Earl of Winchelsea asserted in Parliament she had left two millions of the people without church accommodations; and then, out of 10,891 Episcopal churches in England, only 64 choose their own pastors!

And not among the least pernicious results of the system is that a false standard is brought into Christ's kingdom, and the canon law takes the place of Scripture. Errors that ought to be vanquished by instruction and conviction, are suppressed by physical force, and thought itself is stifled in the conforming and the non-conforming; and as light penetrates these countries, and the minds of men are aroused to a consciousness of those inalienable rights which these systems destroy, there arises a growing confusion. Civil and canon law are coming constantly into collision with each other, as now in the governments of France and Bavaria, which undertake to support Catholic and Protestant churches alike. In Westphalia the absurd spectacle has been presented of a pastor (Heinrich) seized and imprisoned, his whole edition of a sermon destroyed; and yet the offence of the sermon was, that in a Lutheran church, under a Lutheran king, he defended the doctrines of the Lutheran Church against Roman heresies.

But in the case of the state supporting a true church, while the immediate evil is not so great, yet the principle is equally false, and many hurtful results remain. There is an injustice to other sects, and an injury to the denomination chosen. For instance, we may cite the fact that in Prussia every person is born into the church, and entitled to the "sealing ordinances." Go into one of the principal prisons of Prussian Saxony, containing more than 300 prisoners, and you may regularly see the chaplain administering to them the Lord's Supper indiscriminately. An eye-witness reports: "Several months ago I saw in Marysburg the Lord's Supper administered to a company of several hundred soldiers."—(Letters of Prof. Fisher, in Congregationalist.) deems it his policy to favor the priesthood, yet there is a public sentiment gradually maturing in France, founded on more correct views than have heretofore prevailed. The Protestants of the national church boldly demand their rights under the constitution. And the labors of British Christians on the continent have not been fruitless. The Protestant Conference of France and the Kirchentag of Germany have appointed a commission to take charge of this subject. The Belgic Constitution guarantees religious liberty to all, although the Roman Catholic Church is supported by the government. Holland has a moderate degree of religious liberty; so have Turkey, Denmark, and Norway; but in Switzerland infidels now play the tyrant, especially in Neuchâtel and Vaud. Russia tolerates other religions than the Greek; but is very severe on some poor churches, who come reluctantly within the favored fold. Spain, Portugal, Sweden, Italy (except Sardinia,) and Greece have now the unenviable superiority to the Turkish government in the exercise of intolerance and bigotry.

Englishmen dying in Spain are subjected to the most brutal indignities. As one remarks: "The gloomy intolerance of Spain pursues the British Protestant, should he die on Spanish soil, even to his grave." Portugal exhibits some shades of improvement upon Spain; but even in that country, though it is far more open to British influence than Spain is, religious liberty does little more than breathe. Dr. Gomez, under the article of the Constitution which permits the exercise of the Protestant religion to foreigners, and under British protection, continues to preach the doctrines of the Reformation in Lisbon, yet no Portuguese is allowed to become a member of a Protestant church; and the Jesuits are inciting the mob against him, as they did in regard to Dr. Kalley in Madeira.

It would require too much expansion of this article to enter into details concerning the state of religious liberty in the several states of Germany. The violence involved in the system, and the immeasurable wrong it inflicts on an intelligent people, may be seen in a remark made by one of the most distinguished theologians of Prussia. An American inquired of him, if the Church should be separated from the State, how many of the existing churches of Prussia would adhere to their present pastors? The reply was, Not three. The British government has manifested a shameful indifference to the rights of its own subjects traveling or dwelling in papal countries. Her statesmen have boasted of dictating treaties and constitutions to the continental powers; but, to their disgrace, they have looked with indifference upon the sacred rights of conscience, which it was thus in their power to advance.

In some states foreign dissenters are hardly tolerated; and in a large number, native dissent is prohibited; and, of course, all proselyting efforts are crushed by the power of the government. Even among the Protestant governments the spirit of intolerance is manifesting itself. Great Britain has gradually abandoned the narrow policy of former days, under which our fathers suffered to death and exile. But in Sweden persecution is now carried on against those who, wearied with the formality of the established churches, are assembling to worship God in spirit and in truth. Yet it is cheering to see the symptoms of a change even there. The archbishop of Upsala, primate of Sweden, has recently held a convocation of his clergy, in which it was decided that laymen ought to participate in the spiritual management of the parish; that, abstractly considered, religious liberty is desirable; and that conventicles are allowable. The Baptists have peculiarly suffered in Germany, the arm of clerical oppression masked by the toga of the magistrate.

Another hindrance to the progress of the Gospel is,

2. The Social penalties attached to a change of religion.—This operates with peculiar power over superstitious and affectionate people, like the Irish and Germans.

3. The Literature of the day is deeply imbued with a worldly spirit, and to some extent, with infidel opinions and an aversion to the Gospel.

4. The Philosophy of Europe has been a mighty hindrance to the success of evangelical labors. In Scotland, Hume has had few followers. In England, Locke has exerted a less injurious influence than in France. But between the materialism of one school of German philosophers, and the pantheistic transcendentalism of another, the higher and the lower classes of the continent have been strongly fortified against the influence of the Gospel. But a visible and powerful reaction is taking place in France and Germany, in favor both of a more evangelical faith and of a more spiritual philosophy.

Another hindrance to the labors of evangelical men is,

5. The debasing effects of Popery on the masses of the People.—It promotes ignorance, superstition, and sensuality. It is, in fact, one of the most demoralizing institutions in the world. The Rev. Mr. Seymour has recently brought out some comparisons between the immorality of several countries of Europe, which are very instructive and painful. The more thoroughly popish a country is, the worse it is. Murder and licentiousness stalk hand in hand among Gothic cathedrals, gorgeous rites, and mumbling priests. Take, for instance, the crime of murder. The standard assumed is one million inhabitants. For every million, there are murdered annually in England, 4; Ireland, 19; France, 31; Austria, 36; Lowbardy, 45; Sicily, 90; the Pope's kingdom, 100; Naples, 200.

All these causes combined have resulted in counteracting, to a great extent, the influence of the few faithful heralds who have been endeavoring to proclaim the Gospel to the misguided millions of Europe.

VI. THE PRESENT CONDITION OF THE ROMAN HIERARCHY, considered as an aggressive power.—In forming an estimate of the religious condition and prospects of Europe, a prominent place must be assigned to this formidable power. We consider,

1. Their Home Missionary Societies.—The mightiest of these, and yet the most suicidal, is the Order of Jesuits. They were not organized to spread the Gospel in heathen lands, but to defend the Papacy in civilized nations. In a Jesuit's eye, schism is worse than heresy, heathenism, irreligion, or immorality. And, although they have been distinguished as missionaries, their main work was to arrest the Reformation. Loyola organized them as a religious military police, for the Church of Rome; but Lainez, the second general of the order, gave it its permanent form of a political order, whose main instruments are shrewd, unscrupulous intrigue, educating youth, and confessing princes and nobles. One of their early movements was the planting of two powerful colleges in Rome; that of the Jesuits for general purposes, and a German college, in which the course of instruction prepared men to control the German mind. Belgium had become half Protestant; but, by education chiefly, the Jesuits recovered it to Rome. The college of Douai was founded for the conversion of England. Poland had become almost Protestant. But the colleges of Cracow, Grodno, and Pultusk, crushed the Reformation there: in the same way they saved Austria to the Pope. The order has made itself, in turn, indispensable to every despotic government of Europe, and then has rendered itself intolerable to them all. To the best classes of every civilized community, sooner or later, the presence of this body must be found insufferable to men of probity and virtue, to true patriots, to rulers, and to men of science and learning. Society is against them; for she is pressing to the future; they would anchor her to the past. Even the other orders of the Roman hierarchy can barely tolerate their arrogance. Their barbarous opposition to science, genuine history, and classical literature, unites the educated classes against them. They make unrelenting war on the universities and educators of any country that will tolerate them. Three hundred and twenty-six of their authors have been condemned by the tribunals of Europe as encouraging crime.

The Parliament of France burned their books by the hands of the hangman in 1762. The archbishop of Malines, in his work, Du Jesuitisme, Ancien et Moderne, says, "that of these 326 works approved by these Jesuit theologians, 17 encouraged immodesty, 28 perjury, 33 robbery, 36 homicide," &c. In 1773 Clement XIV., in compliance with the feelings of the civilized world, suppressed the order. At that time it had 22,787 members; of whom 11,010 were priests. But the suppression was only in appearance. Catharine of Russia saved them as an order. But, authorized or unauthorized, they have insinuated themselves into every part of Europe. In 1814, Pius VII. restored their order. But when the Emperor of Russia found them not only opposing the Bible Society he had formed, but also interfering with the Russian mission in Peking, which was purely scientific, he adopted still more rigid measures against them. This is the official verdict of the government: 'Every act of the Jesuits is founded in selfishness, and directed solely to the unlimited extension of their power: adepts in excusing each of their unlawful proceedings by some rule of their company, they have a conscience as vast as it is docile.' In 1845 they had 1390 priests in Europe, 1184 scholars, and 1041 lay brothers. They have lost the prestige of their fame as educators and as leaders of human thought. They have not, at this day, one commanding preacher, to reach the masses of mankind. Immense wealth and untiring industry are powerful instruments. But when these are employed against the whole current of human thought and the mighty movements of human society, their possessors toil like Samson shorn of his locks. They are at present recognized only in some of the Italian States, and tolerated in France, where they hold immense possessions, under false names; having about one thousand members, so far as can be ascertained. Their paper in Paris, L'Univers, is bold to impudence, and uncompromising in its claims for Popery. It is said to be in the pay of the Court of Rome. And it is a striking fact that the Department of Worship in the general government—that is, the superintendence and care of all the churches of France, Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish, is in the hands of a Jesuit layman.

Beside this renowned corps, there is a great number of orders and institutions, embracing persons of both sexes, designed for educating Protestant children, and for the care of orphans and invalids. They are resorting again, in self-defence, to preaching "out of season," if not out of consecrated places. Series of meetings are now held by the Jesuits, Redemptorists, Capuchins, Franciscans, Liguorians, &c., sustained by various societies—St. Vincentius, Borromeo, Childhood of Jesus, Rosary Catholic, Sisters of Education, &c.

A society has been organized to pray for the conversion of France. It counts 40,000 members in St. Brience alone. Then there are fraternities attached to particular churches. Almost every church in Paris has one. The most important is that of the Sacred Heart : it has had 50,000 members. They have great varieties of schools for children, and asylums for the aged. They have also retreats, not so rigid as monasteries. The Society of St. Vincent de Paul, in Paris, composed of young people, has auxiliaries throughout the kingdom. It labors indefatigably to reclaim children, paupers, and apprentices, to the Catholic faith. Its receipts from lotteries, charity sermons, &c., were $40,812 in one year. As a specimen of the home missionary operations of the Roman Catholic church, we may select those established in Belgium. Twenty monasteries exist there. The majority of them are of recent foundation, and have abandoned the old notions of meditation, fasting, and inactivity ; for all which they have substituted an intense activity. The Ignorantins have upwards of twenty houses, and are increasing in number, as being peculiarly efficient in reaching the mass of the people. The Frères de la Charité have houses, scattered through the five dioceses. The Josephites have seven houses, divided into three classes ; priests, seminarists, and artisans. The Frères de Renaix have four houses : they take care of the aged, promote free schools for the poor, and workshops for needy tradesmen. The Frères de la Miséricorde have three houses ; attending to the sick and to prisoners. The Frères Xavériens devote themselves to instructing and to nursing in families, and in houses of detention and correction. But female missions are still more numerous. The diocese of Mechlin alone contains 33 orders of nuns ; comprising 109 communities, only eight of which are devoted to a contemplative life. The whole corps of archbishops and bishops in Europe is about 400.

2. Their Foreign Missionary operations are increasing.—The missionary college in Rome, called the Collegium de Propaganda Fide, instituted by Urban VIII., in 1627, still continues to educate men of different nations as missionaries to their own people. And the Congregatio de Propaganda Fide, founded by Gregory XV., in 1622, still continues its missionary labors. There are five Foreign Mission Societies established in Paris.

The Society for Propagating the Faith, founded recently in Lyons, is a remarkable institution. It collects one cent a week from each of its members, scattered throughout Europe, Asia, and America. In 1850 its receipts were $620,370 ; (some say $950,000,) of which $357,734 were from France. The congregation of St. Lazarus has increased its missionaries from 13 to 200, within thirty years. The Jesuits, Dominicans, and Franciscans have taken up the work of missions afresh, and new orders are entering the field, Redemptorists, Passionists, Oblatists, Priests of Mary's Holy Heart, the Maryists, and the Monks of Picpus. The united incomes of three of their missionary societies amount to nearly $1,300,000 per annum.

The Dublin Catholic Registry reports their foreign mission operations, but furnishes basis for no other statistical statements than these : the number of Catholics in India is 822,000 ; the number of priests in Africa is 150.—(See Church of Rome, Missions of.)

3. Present internal strength of Popery.—Judged by the true standard, the papal religion is a failure, even on its own chosen ground. The present political, social, financial, moral, intellectual, and religious condition of the imperial city is its standing condemnation : the verdict of a righteous Providence, which mankind may read and understand, if they have eyes to see and ears to hear. The city of Rome, for instance, has 137,866 lay citizens, and to teach them how to be holy and happy, they have the Pope himself, a large portion of the cardinals, 34 bishops, 1314 secular priests ; 1548 monks, and 1686 nuns. But immorality, scepticism and discontent, with a profound contempt of the Pope and his reverend counsellors, characterize the city of seven hills. A leaden atmosphere seems to oppress the respiration in that doomed city ; the blasphemous corrupter of the kings and nations of the earth. No man is competent to judge the real condition of that church. It is constructed with a cunning adaptedness to conceal, even from Catholics, its faults and falsehoods ; and yet more energetically to prevent the exposure of them to the world, when discovered ; and therefore even the Pope himself is incompetent to determine anything beyond the external show of things. But results cannot be concealed, and we may get some definite view of a system comprising such varied and conflicting pretensions, and blended ambiguously with so many civil governments, by separately considering these points : The temporal supremacy of the Pope ; the boasted unity of the infallible church ; the state of the controversy with Protestantism ; and the result of the attempt to convert Great Britain. How stand then

A. The pretensions of the Pope to be the Emperor of the World ?—It should never be lost sight of, that while Roman Catholics are divided into two parties, Catholics and papists, the Popes and Cardinals are always papists. They believe, or profess to believe, that mankind will never be happy ; error and sin will never cease ; commerce and agriculture, education, and above all, religion will never thrive ; nor, in a word, Christ reign universally until the Pope has reigned as a temporal despot, over every kindred and people, and tribe and man. All however who believe the dogmas of the church, do not believe in these pretensions of the Pope. After the mighty Charlemagne had called on the bishop of Rome to crown him, the idea of universal supremacy seems to have taken root in the papal brain. But it never was fully matured until the ambitious Hildebrand gave it form and utterance. Among the doctrines he promulgated are these: (Baronius, Dictatus Papæ.) "The Pope is one universal bishop, with all power to depose, restore, translate, and alter the sees of other bishops. No book is canonical without his sanction. No council can be called general without his precept. He can depose emperors; he can absolve subjects from their allegiance. He is the judge of all men, and no man can judge him. All princes must kiss his feet. There is only one name in the world, that of the Pope; and by the merits of the blessed Peter, he is endowed with personal sanctity." But how far has Gregory VII. convinced the world of the truth of these tremendous dogmas? The world has discovered that the Roman Church stands upon two falsehoods—two base and acknowledged forgeries. We say acknowledged: for since the day in which the Magdeburg centuriators showed to the world that they were forgeries, her ablest writers have abandoned them. And yet, if these are not her ground, she has no other for claiming to be more than a simple Christian church, upheld, (if she stands at all, like all other churches,) simply by the power of the Holy Ghost. Her claim of supremacy over all other churches is founded, not to say upon the strange construction of a promise to an apostle to the Jews, by which a church of gentiles is made supreme over all others, but upon the 'Decretals of Isidore.' Her claim for temporal authority stands upon the 'Donation of Constantine,' both of them base forgeries.

The question then before us is, how the governments and churches regard these two claims? The Protestant churches and governments probably acquiesce unanimously in regarding the pretension as arrogant and absurd, to the last degree. A recent writer, (J. E. Shephard, A.M., "History of the Church of Rome to the end of the Episcopate of Damasus, A.D. 384, 1851,") says, that he undertook to investigate the facts on this subject, as established by documents; this is his conclusion: "What is recorded of the Roman church within that period, is almost nothing; and that those acts of interference with other churches, which appear in the histories and some other writings, are forgeries of a much later date, manifestly written to create a belief in a supremacy which had never existed, but which, at the time they were made, the Roman church was endeavoring to introduce." He finds the grossest anachronisms in these records, for example: Constantine is said to give Sylvester supremacy, even over Constantinople, when Constantinople has not yet an existence.

Gregory VII. proposed to himself to subjugate the world by means of the clergy. He therefore exempted the monasteries from episcopal jurisdiction, and so obtained the exclusive services of a disciplined ecclesiastical militia. But even the Catholic sovereigns of Europe choose to keep their sceptres in their own hands, and employ the Catholic clergy as a police. And the most intelligent Catholic laymen throughout Europe, we believe, are of the same opinion with the late Abbé Lammenais, that if the Pope is a sincere Christian, and seeks the spiritual welfare of mankind, he will lay aside his triple crown, and retain only the Bishop's Crozier. There is not a prince in Europe who does not despise the civil authority of the Pope, at least as much as that of the Sultan. Both those characters are retained in the list of sovereigns by suffrance, and by the help of other peoples' soldiers.

B. The Unity of the Catholic Church.—This is another false pretension and hypocritical profession. Neither Popes, Councils, Clergy, nor Laymen are any more united than the members of Protestant churches. Opinions and decisions of Fathers, Councils, and Popes recorded and published, are not harmonious. Two Popes contended for the crown; and a council without a Pope appointed a third. The old Jesuit and Jansenist tendencies remain, while the Jansenist party is broken up. The Gallican and Ultramontane battle is as severely fought to this day in Paris, as in any former period. The church has adopted two self-destroying fundamental theories; on the one side, infallibility, and consequent immutability; on the other, the development theory of Newman. She insists on absolute authority, and then reasons with private judgment to prove that there can be no legitimate exercise of private judgment. The questions to-day discussed in Catholic France go to the bottom of Papal claims and pretensions. They affect the union of civil and temporal power in the Pope; the agreement or antagonism of Popery and modern society; the rights of the inferior clergy. And when Frenchmen take up such questions, they investigate them thoroughly.

C. The State of the Doctrinal Controversy.—The only real and legitimate controversy Rome can maintain, is on the question of her infallibility. And it is striking, that when Mr. Seymour in his discussions with the Jesuits, (Mornings at Rome,) affirmed that Rome had never dogmatically asserted her infallibility, and challenged them to produce such affirmation, they were thrown into utter confusion. The fact is, that on these fundamental points, What is the Church? and, When are her utterances infallible? she never speaks positively; but always assures that she is infallible, when it suits her purpose so to do. Her present doctrinal discussion makes a meagre portion of theological literature.

D. The Papal Movements in England.—One of the most striking events of the 19th century has been the struggle of Rome, accompanied with premature shouts of victory, to recover England to the Pope. Appearances were certainly encouraging for them. There were in 1838, in England, 11 dukes, 2 earls,

7 lords, 18 of the richest baronets, and more than 50 of the wealthiest families, members of the Catholic church. And within a few years 70 Episcopal clergymen, and 120 of the nobility and gentry have joined them. In 1792 there were not 30 chapels in Great Britain; now there are 616, (800, Dr. Cummings says,) with more than 300,000 attendants, and 875 priests. Within seven years sixty of the largest churches have been built by them. They had not then one college. Now they have 10.* They have one Quarterly Review, two or three monthlies and one able weekly paper. In Ireland the principal high offices of state were in the hands of Catholics. Oxford University education partook so much of the mediæval spirit, as to furnish good instruments for destroying the work of the Reformation. There was great formality and indifference in the Episcopal ranks that had rejected the "Methodism" of Simeon and the Clapham school. So far then as these gentlemen were sincere in attachment to the Protestant principles they professed, they aimed to prevent the Episcopal church from being latitudinarian and worldly. But their remedy was worse than the disease. They substituted traditions of men for the Word of God; apostolical succession for ministerial godliness; sacramental regeneration for the work of the Holy Spirit; the visible unity of the church for the spiritual union of free men; justification by ceremonies for justification by faith. Many of the most intelligent men in England, however, give them no credit for sincerity. The honest Arnold bitterly complained of their want of honesty. Mr. Rose affirms that the movement originated in an anticipation that the established Church was to be separated from the state, and then these clergymen would be denuded of those claims of superiority and of transcendental dignity, which they have never sacrificed, and be placed on a level with the ministers of other denominations. They must, therefore, have something to fall back upon. And they hit upon the assumption that they are the Church, and that all churches or communions, extrinsic to theirs, are heathen men and publicans. So that about twenty years ago they commenced their operations, and conducted them with consummate skill. Three fundamental principles were laid down: the participation of the body and blood of Christ in the Eucharist is a reality; the mystery of his body and blood has been confided only to the hands of the successors of the Apostles, and their delegates; since the Apostles, those who derived their succession from them in an unbroken line, by the imposition of the hands of the bishops, are the only priests to give this body and blood unto the people. Dr. Newman saw that their effort to transfer the Nicene Church of the fourth century to the nineteenth was inadmissible. He therefore resorted to the doctrine of development, which is directly destructive of the famous claim of Rome to infallibility. By means of tracts, reviews, novels, and poetry, this leaven was spread through England. It has logically resulted, in seventy instances only, in taking its abettors from the ministry of the Episcopal to that of the Roman Church. But the movement has reached its climax, and is silently sinking into the oblivion it merits.

Our picture will not be complete, without adding to this general view of the Continent, a more specific description of the several States.

VII. REVIEW OF THE EUROPEAN STATES.—

§ 1. England, Scotland, and Ireland.—Population (including Guernsey) 28,500,000 (U).—The English Reformation, we have already remarked, was deeply defective in many respects. The king was made the Pope of England; all religious interests being put under his control, even to the appointment of all the bishops; and, to complete the anomalous condition of the church, her bishops became a portion of the civil aristocracy, and members of the government. Liberty in matters of conscience was not permitted, on the penalty of an utter exclusion from all civil offices, and from the privileges of the universities. After passing through various phases, the Church of England is now divided into three parties. They are familiarly denominated the Low, High, and Broad Church. The Low Church takes the Calvinistic view of the Articles; and is earnest in moral reforms, in promoting spiritual religion, and missions to the heathen. Their organ is the Record. The High Church has for its watch-words—Judgment by works; Baptismal regeneration; Church authority; and Apostolical succession. The Guardian is its organ. The Broad Church is well represented by the lamented Arnold. It makes much of the visible church; of symbols; of the unity of the Church under different names. The following classification has been made of the 18,000 episcopal clergymen in England:—High Church—Anglican, 3500; Tractarian, 1000; High and Dry, 2500. Low Church—Evangelical, 3300; Recordite, 2500; Low and Slow, 700. Broad Church—Theoretical, 1000; Anti-theoretical, 2500. About 1000 of the peasant clergy are to be ranked apart from these. Of the bishops, 13 are High; 10 Broad; 5 Evangelical.

To the student of British history, this state of things is encouraging, as it is an evidence of progress. Indeed, the distinguishing feature of all British history is the steady progress of truth and righteousness, as seen in her Constitution, her legislation, and her ecclesiastical history. Britain is moving with a slow, undeviating march, onward toward a brighter age. A great principle once secured there, is never lost to the British race, nor to the world. Reforms do not move as rapidly as we desire ; but they are advancing. We have seen those two instruments of tyranny—the act of Uniformity and the Conventicle act, give place to the act of Toleration ; which has been continually maintained inviolate, and even enlarged. It was an immense progress from the days of Laud and Jeffrey to the day when Lord Chatham, addressing his peers, said, “The Dissenters are represented as men of close ambition. They are so, my lords. And their ambition is, to keep close to the college of fishermen, and not of cardinals ; to the doctrine of inspired apostles, not to the decrees of interested and aspiring bishops. They contend for a spiritual creed and a spiritual worship.”

From the days of Magna Charta to the present parliamentary investigation of Oxford affairs, resulting in the admission of dissenters to the University, there has been a steady progress ; while the other European nations have either remained stationary or receded. The dissenters have become more discerning of their rights and more courageous in advocating them. They have also become more powerful in the House of Commons, which is the real seat of civil power in the nation. The recent papal manœuvre was premature, and has made England more intelligently anti-papal, more firmly Protestant than she has been of late years. There is also an increase of spirituality in the national and the dissenting churches. The renowned universities of the kingdom provide for the ministry a majority of its incumbents. The prominent defect of these venerable institutions is their conservative lethargy. They do not keep pace with the necessities of society, only as far as it has interests in the past. The present and the future are not to be learned in Oxford or Cambridge, as they may be in the colleges of the dissenters.

* The numbers enclosed in parenthesis belong to Scotland alone.

The preceding table presents the results of some recent efforts to ascertain the provisions made in England, Wales and Scotland, for the religious culture of the people, and the actual attendance on divine worship. From these statistics it is manifest that unless the room provided in churches exceeds the number needed, (which is highly improbable,) there is still a sad indifference to God's institutions of grace, even in a country so Christianized as England. Of the 17,297,000 inhabitants of England and Wales, only 6,000,000 or about one-third attend worship. So that as many as seven and a half millions either neglect public worship, or attend on the ministry of error.

Dr. Cummings, in his able and interesting Lectures on the Apocalypse, has given a fearful exhibition of the moral and religious condition of London. (Vol. I. p. 382.) He remarks : “If all the churches and chapels were as full as they could hold, not one-fourth of the population would be within them. There are never in church on one Sunday, in all denominations, more than 200,000 people out of 2,000,000. And how many, do you think, of that number are communicants? Startling fact! Awful stain upon the missionary zeal of the metropolis! There are scarcely 60,000 communicants in all the chapels and churches of this vast city put together! The steam boats and railways alone carry from the metropolis every Sunday morning a greater population than are that day in all the chapels and churches together. There are in London 12,000 children trained professionally to pick pockets and plunder houses. There are 10,000 gamblers, 20,000 beggars, 30,000 regular thieves, 150,000 habitual gin drinkers, and 150,000 of both sexes habitually leading a life of debauchery!”

In the report of the late imperfect investigations of attendance on worship in Scotland, it is stated, that on the census day, March 30, 1851, of the 2,888,742 people in Scotland, only 943,951 persons attended the fullest, or morning service ; and of these about 46,000 attended on the ministration of error. And there is also a want of provision ; there being in every kind of church only 1,834,805 sittings, and of course many of these remote from the people.

The Catholics have 14 colleges in England, and 3 English colleges on the Continent. In Great Britain 812 churches, 1126 priests, 101 nunneries, &c.

The Sunday-school is less efficiently sustained in Scotland than in England. There may be so much more faithful parental instruction and public religious instruction there, as to diminish the necessity for this form of religious influence.

Popery has made progress in Scotland. In 1831 there were 54 priests ; in 1852 they had increased to 135—having 100 churches and chapels, one college, and several schools and convents. But the most interesting feature in the modern history of Scotland is what is there termed "the Disruption." It was a new Protest against the usurpation of ecclesiastical power by the state. In 1843 nearly 500 pastors, 200 licentiates, and 200 students, followed by a million of the inhabitants, abandoned the State Church in one day, and formed the Free Church. At their annual General Assembly in 1854, they reported $1,347,780 as raised by their churches for the sustentation, building, congregational, missions, education and miscellaneous funds. They sustain two theological schools, one in Edinburgh and one in Aberdeen. They have about 40 Scottish foreign missionaries, mostly in India, and 57 native missionary assistants.

On no foreign country do we look with such interest in reference to the world's conversion to holiness, as on Great Britain. Her political power is ascendant; her Constitution is liberal; her national interests are less exposed to the control of demagogues than those of our republic; her religion is Protestant; her intellectual culture is high; her colonial possessions stretched as a zone of Protestant constitutional power around the globe, contain 131,000,000 souls. A recent writer justly remarks: "With all England's defects, it would not be an easy task rightly to estimate the vast instrumentalities which she contains for the moral and spiritual melioration of her own population and the world at large." It requires six weeks to enable the various religious societies to hold their annual meetings in London. In the city of London millions of dollars are annually expended for the benefit, temporal and spiritual, of the poor and the careless. Its City Mission has become a magnificent instrument of good, solving most satisfactorily the difficult question for London and all large towns, "What can be done for the poor?" The Young Men's Association is opening a new prospect to another class, heretofore so neglected. By tracts, lectures, Bible classes, meetings for prayer, conference meetings and libraries immeasurable good has been done. Similar organizations are now spreading throughout the kingdom, and introduced into Germany, Holland, France, Switzerland, and Sardinia.

In regard to Ireland, we may be sure that the Roman Church has lost great numbers by famine, emigration and conversion within six years. The estimates vary from half a million to two millions. Many who remain in the Roman Church have at heart renounced its errors. All the Protestant bodies in Ireland are actively engaged in opening the eyes of their blinded countrymen. In 1841 half the Irish natives had houses of only one room, three-fourths of these being made of mud. Two-thirds of them lived on the potato; one-third were without any employment; one-eighth were beggars; one-half neither wrote nor read.* The Protestants numbered in 1834 1,517,228; the Catholics, at the same time, 6,427,712. So that Ireland was eminently a Catholic country, and a specimen of what the Roman Church does to elevate and bless a people. The Irish Society has 667 schools, containing 29,000 pupils and 250 laborers. The Irish Evangelical Society has 20 missionaries, and 30 readers. One Methodist Society has 400 stations. The Irish Church Mission has 425 agents in the field, and the industrial schools are working very successfully. The Catholics have 21 colleges in Ireland, one missionary seminary and three high schools, besides two colleges for the Irish on the continent.

§ 2. Holland.—Population, 3,208,400. (U.) Holland must be had in grateful remembrance for its brave defence of the Gospel in the seventeenth century, and for furnishing a Protestant sovereign to England, as well as a refuge to our persecuted Puritan fathers. An enumeration of the sects has been made by a learned Hollander, which, if designed to present the whole population under these religious divisions, would make the number some 204,000 less than Ungewetter states it. His enumeration is,—9,000 separate Lutherans, 54,000 Lutherans, 38,000 Baptists, 58,000 Jews, 5,000 Armenians, 1,670,000 Dutch Reformed, 1,170,000 Catholics, of whom 5500 are Jansenists.

An utter declension in religion had taken place after the close of the last century. Liberalism and Neology occupied the chairs of the three universities, Leyden, Groningen, and Utrecht. There was a conservative Dort orthodox party; and the young, liberal party, equally dead, though differing in doctrine. The Lord then raised up the great poet Bilderdijk, by whose energetic exhibitions of the Gospel two learned young Jews were converted, Da Costa, a barrister, and Cappadoce, a physician. In 1834, 80,000 persons separated from the national church, and organized a "true reformed church." They have encountered great difficulties from persecution, and from "false brethren." The Groningen party professed great attachment to the person of Christ; and exalted love above doctrine. But it turned out in the end that their Christ was a mere man, a divine man, but not Jehovah Jesus. The friends of pure religion are, moreover, not agreed about the means of reviving religion. One party look to the restoration of the Dort Constitution; at the head of them stands Mr. Van Prinsterer, Secret Counsellor of State. The others resort to colportage, private missions, and social meetings, to revive the spirit of the Church, and lead men to Christ. There has been a struggle on the question of religion in the public schools. The evangelical party has triumphed. The mission to the colony in Java is prosperous. Missionary tradesmen are sent out, and important results are traced to the measure.

§ 3. Scandinavia.—Population, 6,965,000. (U.) In Sweden the civil and religious conditions of the citizens are confounded together. Every Swede must receive baptism, and commune in the established Church, to retain citizenship. No subject is allowed to change his religion. A Protestant may not become a Catholic; nor a Baptist a Pædo-baptist, &c. Laymen are not permitted to preside in religious meetings; and all conventicles are forbidden. In fact Sweden has retained the intolerant spirit longer than any other Protestant country in the world. Of the 1800 Lutheran clergymen, it is supposed one-tenth may be truly spiritual men; and the number of such is increasing. The Danes are among the most highly civilized people in Europe; but the higher classes in the church are very worldly. The clergy are well educated; the Danish at Copenhagen; the German, some at Kiel, where the professors are sound in the faith, and some in the German universities. The government has long sustained missions to the heathen; but the missionary spirit has much declined in the national church. There is no home missionary institution. Toleration is complete, although the clergy are very jealous of any movements which threaten to disturb the general apathy. Bibles and tracts are circulated to some extent by the native and foreign societies. Denmark has small colonies in Asia, Africa, and America, containing about 110,000 souls. The Laplanders are about 5000, very low in their physical and moral life. The Swedish mission among them is quite prosperous, having enjoyed a revival of great interest in 1851, under the labors of the zealous Teelstrom. The revival in Sweden was promoted both by preaching and books. And an intelligent observer remarks, that the converts made through reading are better instructed than those converted by preaching, but are narrower in their views. The revival was most powerful at a distance from the capital, and yet it extended to the students of theology in the University of Upsala.

§ 4. Belgium.—Population, 4,350,500 (U.), of which 4,304,000 are Roman Catholics, 16,000 Protestants, 30,000 Jews. (E. C., III. 234.) By a happy combination of skill and firmness the politicians availed themselves of the zeal of the Roman clergy in 1830, to throw off the Protestant yoke of Holland, and secured a Constitution guaranteeing complete religious toleration. An efficient missionary society, established at Brussels, is laboring earnestly, but with too little sympathy and support from foreign churches, to extend the kingdom of Christ among that people, once so blindly submissive to the Papal yoke. There are 7 English Episcopal churches; 8 Union Evangelical churches; 12 Protestant French churches, and 15 churches of converted Catholics.

§ 5. France.—Population, 35,401,000. (U.) France is one of the great historical nations. Its life embodies principles of profound importance, and presents features altogether peculiar. Its political position is at least second in Europe. Its social and intellectual power is great, and its colonial possessions contain 4,060,000 inhabitants. But we are now specially interested in the history of religion in France. And there is no church whose annals make a stronger appeal to the sympathies of the universal church than those of the Huguenots. Piedmont, Scotland, and France are made sacred by the toils and blood of men of whom the world was not worthy. The French mind is in a peculiar state, differing from that of any other Roman Catholic country. In Germany the privilege of intellectual speculation and research, and an unobstructed exercise of the social feelings is generally an abundant compensation for any privation of a participation in questions of policy, and of any share in governing society. The Spanish type of civilization and society is worn out, as completely as are those of ancient Egypt, Greece, or Rome. In modern Italy this is true also, to a great extent. But in France there are yet vast intellectual resources, as fertile a vein, perhaps, as in the Anglo-Norman race, and far more social, propagandist, and missionary in its tendencies. Ranke observes that "the French have ever attentively meditated the great problems of the church and the state, and communicated them to all other nations, with that talent of expression which is peculiar to them." France is the most important missionary country for the Roman Church. Of three hundred foreign missionaries she employs, more than half are Frenchmen. But the present state of the French mind in regard to all the higher interests of man and society is discouraging. They accept an absolute, one-will government, because just now they are in a period of painful waiting, perhaps transition. They accept the Emperor and absolute authority as an iron band around society, painful in its pressure, but indispensable to hold together its heterogeneous and conflicting elements. Perhaps many of the best of her people are discouraged, regarding themselves as in the position of Rome when liberty had perished in her streets. But we know that Christ, who by his word and his Church penetrated that decaying mass, can introduce the leaven of life into unhappy France. She must see that the Roman type of Christianity is as much worn out as was the Roman type of civilization. There is outside of Romanism, and proscribed by the Latin Church, a pure Christianity, the same which regenerated Roman Gaul; and it can now regenerate Christian Roman France. (Rev. Chrét. Introd. I. 1.)

The Revolution had overthrown Romanism and Christianity together; for the French people had believed that they were identical. But a returning religious feeling manifested itself in Catholics, Protestants, and Jews. And while Napoleon in the Concordate* of 1801 placed the Roman Church on a new footing, the three religious systems were placed at the same time on the same level before the law, and a theological school for French Protestants at Montauban was adopted by the government, as also a German theological school in Alsace, for the German Lutheran population of that portion of France. So that the government supports 507 Presbyterian pastors, 249 Lutheran, and 114 Jewish teachers. There are 956 Protestant churches under the care of the government, of which 660 are French, 296 German, costing $250,000, about equally divided between the evangelical and rationalist clergy. The Roman Church has 15 Archbishops, 65 Bishops, 175 Vicegerents, 661 Canons, 3,388 Curés, 29,537 incumbents of chapels of ease, 6 Chaplains of cemeteries, 7,190 Vicars, making a total of 41,037, costing the government less than before the Revolution, but still an enormous sum. Before the Revolution the revenue of the Catholic clergy in France was $30,000,000. It is now about $20,000,000, not derived from direct tax, but from the public treasury. Neither instruction, eloquence, or piety is to be witnessed in many of this vast body of successors to Fenelon, Massillon, Bossuet, and Bridaine.

More than forty societies are laboring to give the Gospel to France. Although the government favors the priesthood, yet it is jealous of them, and will not come under their control. There are unmistakable marks of the wane of Romanism in France. The violent measures of the Revolution would naturally cause a reaction. But now the minds of men are receiving light gradually and healthfully. We see marks of the waning power of the Roman Church in the contest between the Archbishop of Paris and a lay-editor, in which the Pope gives his verdict against an archbishop in favor of a layman. This weakens the clerical arm. We see it also in her failure to secure a change in the marriage law, and in the change of feeling towards the clergy. From 1830 to 1840, honest men looked to them as a barrier against socialism. But it is now seen that their love of liberty was hypocritical. And when the people get the power again, there will probably be no door of return, perhaps of escape, for the priests.

bishop, governed the Roman world. He invaded Switzerland, by founding a Swiss college at Milan, opening for the Swiss the German college at Rome, in which they were the most numerous; for, while 21 of the pupils were Hanoverian, 25 Prussian, and 40 Bavarian, 48 were Swiss. He likewise sent the Jesuits to Switzerland, who established themselves at Lucerne and Fribourg. He also procured that a nuncio should be sent from Rome to reside among them. These efforts succeeded in alienating the Catholic Swiss from their Protestant fellow-citizens; and "thus was gained to the Holy See the proud and free country of primitive Switzerland, its nationality sacrificed, the gates of the Alps opened to the powerful house of Spain." (Prof. Vulliemin, of Lausanne, vide E. C., v. p. 358.) About the time of Napoleon's abdication, three facts signalized the reappearance of the Pope in Switzerland: the inscription of an article in a new federal pact, consecrating the inviolability of the property of the convents; the organization of the episcopal circumspection, in favor of Rome; and the return of the Jesuits. The ultimate result of this was, that the Jesuits became insufferable, and the Sunderbund was organized, which triumphed over them. The political organization of the country was then changed; and the confederation of states became one state. This threw the political power into the hands of the majority, who are Protestant. The Jesuits were expelled; liberty of worship was guaranteed every where; ultramontane governments were overthrown; and convent property was confiscated. Five Roman Catholic cantons then met together, and voted to maintain their entire sovereignty. They are now patiently and confidently awaiting the day when their church will again be ascendant.

The policy of the powerful European governments has placed this little mountainous territory out of the great whirlpool of the "balance of power" system. Or, we should rather go back to a higher purpose, and admire the goodness of God in guaranteeing to that people their civil rights, although surrounded by ambitious and grasping potentates. But the infidel democracy which expelled the Jesuits, has been to the cantons De Vaud and Neuchâtel as great a scourge as a pope or an emperor would have been. They threw off the bands of the Jesuit, only to play the tyrant themselves.

Geneva and Vaud are recovering some of the spirit of the Reformation; and the theological schools of Lausanne and Geneva have furnished a race of well-qualified ministers for their churches, and for the foreign service. A band of faithful disciples at Geneva have taken advantage of their central position, and labored with great success to disseminate the truth in France and in Italy. The free church of the Canton of Vaud has passed through a fiery furnace; but the arm of the Lord is with his people.

§ 7. Italy. Population, 24,573,100. (U.) The traveler from the new world to Rome and Naples is forced to exclaim: "O Italy, land of beauty; home of art, of priests, and of beggars!" God has blessed it with his gifts; man has cursed it with hypocrisy and tyranny. In the Roman States there is one priest to every 51 persons; which, together with 1,400 receptacles of indolence and fanaticism, called monasteries and nunneries, consume the moral and financial strength of the country. Until recently, it has been difficult to make the light penetrate any section of this spiritually benighted part of Europe. But great changes have taken place within seven years. Large numbers of Bibles have been distributed; many conversions have taken place; and faithful Italian preachers are proclaiming the pure Gospel of Christ to their countrymen.

Sardinia has now become the object of peculiar interest to the friends of religion and religious liberty. The sovereign, though a Roman Catholic, is following out the liberal policy of his father and predecessor; and thus, both the Waldenses are freed from the yoke, which, for centuries, has oppressed, if not discouraged them, and the field is open for the cultivation of every one who wishes to enter it. The Waldenses number 23,000; with 16 pastors, and 3 Italian missionaries, recently ordained for the Roman Catholic people. Their college has 8 professors and 84 students. They have a religious newspaper, Buona Novella, and an anti-papal secular paper, La Gazzetta del Popolo.

There are in Italy four religious parties that seriously threaten popery: the Giobertists, the Infidel Catholic-politicians, the Socialist-Pantheists, the Evangelicals. The Giobertists are followers of the distinguished priest who served the King of Sardinia as prime minister. Piedmont is the stronghold of his followers, who still believe that the Roman Church can be brought to the pure belief and practice of Christianity. The followers of Giovini declare themselves Catholics, but are really infidels. They cling to religious expressions only to deceive the people. The followers of Ansonio Franchi are Socialists and Pantheists. The fourth party includes the Waldenses.

§ 8. Germany.—Population: Austria 12,700,000; Prussia, 12,200,000; German States, 17,100,000; total, 42,000,000 (U.)* Of these more than 20,000,000 are Roman Catholic; many millions belong to the Greek Church; and 18,000,000 are of the various Protestant churches; with less than 1,000,000 Jews. There are thirty-four sovereign states in Germany, each having its own church, ecclesiastical constitution, and liturgy. The clergy of one state are often not recognized in another. Austria is the most heterogeneous in its structure, having a population of 18,000,000 (including Lombardy and Venice,) immensely varied in race, language, and religion. More than ten millions are Germans; about eighteen millions of the Slavonic tribes; five millions Italians; four millions Magyars; and less than a million Jews.

The best thing that distinguishes any of the German states is popular education. In Prussia 77 per cent. of the children between the ages of 6 and 14, or more than 15 per cent. of the people, are in the public schools; while in England and Wales only 11 1-2 per cent. are in them. Protestants and Catholics being so nearly equal in numbers, intolerance is not carried so far as in the purely Catholic countries, or as in Sweden. Austria is compelled even to support Protestant interests. The government supports a Protestant Theological Seminary in Vienna; but one of the examiners of every candidate for the ministry is a Catholic. In Vienna are three Protestant pastors over 20,000 souls. There are in Upper Austria twelve Protestant congregations, containing upwards of 16,000 members. But the Protestant portion of Hungary has felt the rigor of Austrian bigotry. In a population of nearly 13,000,000 (E. C., V. 494), nearly 3,000,000 are Protestants; but they are kept in most degrading and painful subjection. No feature of the German churches, however, has so much affected the Christians of other nations as their sad declension from the simple and fervent faith which characterized the period of the Reformation, to the blasphemous neology and rationalism of the last fifty years. That people seem literally to have undertaken to find God, a Saviour, and salvation in their own personal existence and consciousness. When the venerable Krummacher was called on to describe the infidelity of his country, he commenced by remarking: "I feel as if I had to describe a new fall of man." He traces the declension (E. C., V. 328), back to the very age after Luther's death. Formalism and an intellectual apprehension of the Gospel were substituted for the life and earnestness of the first period. Discipline also declined; and when John Arndt appeared and preached the necessity of regeneration, he was reproached as a fanatic. The same experience Spener had, a century later. Then the "Pietists" themselves prepared the way of the approaching apostasy by their opposition to doctrine. Naturalism was imported from England, and Deism from France, and both found a ready soil in hearts declined from God. Frederic the Great contributed mightily to the spread of infidelity. Kant, in a measure, checked the destructive tide, though he left a heathen philosophy as his legacy to his poor country. Fichte and Schelling began the work of philosophical reverence for the dogmas of Scripture and church theology. The overthrow of Napoleon touched the heart of the oppressed German nations, and they began to return to the God of their fathers. Still, indifference, rationalism, and radicalism greatly prevail. In Berlin, out of 400,000 persons, not more than 20,000 visit the house of God. "A literature diabolically insipid, and sneaking about in darkness, does not cease to nurse and fructify these principles (of scepticism.) Little more is necessary than that a mighty and gifted personality should appear, who should set himself up as the centre of infidelity, and represent it with energetic pathos and strong decision, and the reign of 'the Man of Sin' would be among us in more than a state of embryo." The artizan clubs have given most favorable opportunities for spreading atheism among the working classes. In the smaller Saxon Principalities, the consistories are rationalistic; while in Baden, Rhenish Bavaria, and Hesse Darmstadt they are of the laissez aller school. It is said that in these countries there are ten unbelievers in the ministry to one believer. There are towns in Rhenish Bavaria where not more than ten or twenty persons are found in church on Sunday morning, and where not a single individual is found to attend the sacrament on the great festival days. (E. C., III. 362.) Many of the universities and gymnasia are yet wholly rationalistic. But there are brighter features in the picture. There is a manifest returning from this apostasy. The evangelical portion of the church is laboring in many ways, and with the most encouraging success, to restore a pure faith to the land of the Reformation. Much has been done, and systematically too, in some of the universities, to arrest the progress of rationalism, by literary efforts, and likewise for the advancement of practical godliness. The Inner Mission is doing an excellent work in Eastern Prussia, Pomerania, Berlin, Silesia, Saxony, Hamburg, &c. It is of recent date that German Christians should send out missionaries to the poor, and to promote the observance of the Sabbath. In Hermansburg, Hanover, there is a college for Home Missionaries, and a very efficient pastor is over the church there. In fact, an American, for some time resident there, observes: "In general, the cause of evangelical piety is steadily advancing in Germany; and the return of that great nation to the principles of the Reformation can be safely predicted. The change from the state of things twenty-five years ago, when rationalism reigned, to the present state, is wonderful."

§ 9. Russia.—Population, 62,000,000 (U.) Of these we may conjecturally make the following distributions: Greek Church, 50,650,000; Catholics (Roman and Armenian), 2,790,000; Protestants, 3,770,000; Mohammedans, 2,262,000; Jews, 1,138,000; Armenians, 640,000; Pagans, 750,000. The Greek Church resembles the Church of Rome in ceremonial rites; but holds in common with her only those opinions which they held alike previously to the Nicene Council. The Greek Church accords more nearly with the Protestant on these points: the source of all religious doctrine; the corruption of human nature; the Mediator; divine grace; the sacraments; the church; and the future state. This may be seen more fully drawn out in Dr. Pinkerton's work on Russia, in his translation of a work by Philaret, Archimandite, written in 1815 to counteract the influence of the Jesuits over the Russian nobility. There is much ignorance and superstition. It is true, as Dr. Pinkerton remarks: "A church in which the people are permitted to read the Scriptures in a language which they understand, and which acknowledges this Word as the highest tribunal in matters of faith, is still possessed of the best reformer of all superstition." Yet our missionaries thus far have found the Greeks more impenetrable than the Catholics. The Czar is the head of the national church, which accordingly has no patriarch. And the present sovereign has acted up to his convictions of the duties of his office in prosecuting the work of proselytizing with great activity. The Gazette of St. Petersburg at one time boasted of 45,000 Protestants brought over to the National Church in one year. These labors have been put forth chiefly in the Baltic provinces, and in a way not very creditable to a mighty sovereign. All religions are tolerated; but no one may proselyte from the Greek Church. An able writer has divided the sects into three classes, one of which includes native dissenters of a very remarkable stamp. They are the most active and spiritual Christians in the empire, probably amounting to two million souls. They may not always keep within due limits, but they are a kind of unlearned Puritans in the dead Greek Church. They are called Molakai. In another class appear some of the most deluded fanatics; even rivaling in fierceness the pagans of India. Some of them are called self-mutilators; others, self-immolators. Of the latter, as many as one hundred have burned themselves to death together.

On the 23d of January, 1813, the Russian Bible Society was formed, by permission of the Emperor Alexander. Great zeal was manifested, and in a few years, more than 800,000 copies of the Scriptures, in whole or in part, were distributed. An anecdote is told, showing how this zeal reached the humbler classes. A chimney-sweeper presented himself at a meeting of the society to make his subscription. Every person was surprised at his appearing there for that object, and still more so when he set down his name for seven dollars. The Secretary delicately remonstrated against his subscribing so much. He replied: "I intend to subscribe this sum yearly. And if I might ask a favor of the society, I should like to have the honor of sweeping the chimneys of the Bible House for nothing." Affected to tears by the scene, says the narrator, they granted his request. The house, being a present from the Emperor, was very large; so that the sweeper's donation really amounted to nearly thirty dollars. The clergy extensively shared this zeal. But Nicholas, whose policy is to make the Christian idea subordinate to the Russian, in 1820 ordered the suppression of the whole movement. There is still, however, some circulation of the Scriptures in Finland and the Baltic provinces, and among the exiles as they are leaving Moscow to go to Siberia. And it is an interesting fact for a Protestant to record, that Dr. Haas, chairman of the prison discipline committee of Moscow, takes a lively interest in supplying the exiles and prisoners with the New Testament; and he is a Roman Catholic. In 1812 the Princess Sophia Meschessky translated an English tract, "an address to the afflicted." This was peculiarly appropriate to the circumstances of the nation; the French just then retreating from Moscow. She distributed it among the ruined and scattered inhabitants of that city. The favorable reception it met encouraged her to continue her labors; and she had written or translated, and published at least one hundred different tracts, when the Emperor Alexander came to her help. The work then expanded; and it has gone forward with little interruption, covering an immense field with the seeds of a glorious harvest. There is a censorship that extends to every tract published. But it seems to be candid and liberal. The Russian newspapers often speak in high commendation of the tracts. A peculiarly favorable opportunity for the sale of evangelical books occurs at the annual fair of Nizney Novogorod. Here are to be met representatives from China, India, Tartary, Bucharia, Persia, Turkey, Greece, Italy, France, Germany, and England. An American merchant disposed, at one fair, of 150,000 tracts and books. The Siberian exiles, on departing from Moscow, likewise receive them.

§ 10. Spain and Portugal.—Population.—Spain, 12,000,000; Portugal, 3,725,000 (U.)

This people are almost universally within the pale of the Roman Church; though the educated class, as in other Catholic countries, is almost, without exception, infidel. There remain out of the Church in Spain, some 500,000 basques, 60,000 Moors, and 45,000 gipsies. (U.) Toleration by the governments is complete for foreigners, so far as their own worship is concerned. But the law was evidently constructed on the presumption that no native would ever desire to abandon the Catholic forms, and then the influence of the clergy is so powerful as to greatly obstruct the action of evangelical missions. Spain can be approached on the side of France, and from Gibraltar. The faithful church at Nismes has organized a mission for the French Protestants in Spain, and conducted it with encouraging success. A Protestant pastor is about to be settled over the little French church in Barcelona. Besides the evangelical school at Gibraltar, containing 330 children and 89 adults, the Rev. Mr. Rule, a Wesleyan missionary, believes that missions could be established in Madrid, Cadiz, and other large towns. And it certainly was a large concession for a Catholic magistracy in Spain to grant the Protestants of Madrid permission to purchase a cemetery for their dead, and conduct the funeral ceremonies in their own way.

In Portugal there is less hindrance to evangelical labor than in Spain; there being no other hindrance to introducing the Scriptures than a heavy duty. Protestant worship is allowed, if the place of worship does not assume the appearance of one. Gomez, who was once a Spanish priest, converted and naturalized as a Portuguese subject, is a faithful laborer in Lisbon. He reported, in 1849, as many as four thousand enlightened by his labors. Among these were several priests, but who dared not avow the change openly. The ignorance of the people is deplorable. In all Portugal only 31,280 pupils in their schools, and the splendid University of Salamanca, once the glory of Spain, has utterly declined from the position it held in the sixteenth century. The feeble government of Spain yet holds sway over nearly 5,000,000 colonists in Africa, America, the Philippine and Ladrone islands.

§ 11. Greece and the Ionian Isles.—Population 1,220,000. The educated Greeks are infidels; the people generally ignorant and superstitious. There seems to be no improvement in the Church; but the literary men are making most praise-worthy efforts to restore the former intellectual glory of their country: and their success in restoring the classic as a substitute for the modern language, is very remarkable. The labors of our missionaries are described under the article Greece. Perhaps we may see one fruit of them in the recent work of Professor Pharmakides, Professor of Theology in the University of Athens. He has written a book in answer to a Decree of the Church of Constantinople, which affects to govern Greece ecclesiastically.* The mother church censured the church in Greece for asserting her independence. The professor replied to it, but in replying, he has attacked the history, doctrines and rites of his church, in a most efficient manner. Greece has taken a high educational position since the recovery of her political independence. In the capital of each of her twelve states is planted a college (three in Athens), a high school and a common school. In every country town is a high and a common school. In every village of 400 houses is a common school, which is attended from September to April; and the Minister of Instruction has issued an order requiring all common school-masters to hold a school on Sunday, for instruction in the Scriptures.

George Rijari, a wealthy Greek merchant, bequeathed a large portion of his property for the founding a theological school in Athens, which furnishes a very good five years' course to the candidates for the priesthood. The university of Otho has advanced greatly in the numbers of pupils, having, in 1839, 52; in 1853, 590. There are but few avowed dissenters in Greece. The Protestants are generally foreigners. Of these, about one hundred are Lutherans, who attend worship with the queen, in the palace. The chapel in the palace is used by both the king and the queen, alternately for Roman Catholic and for Lutheran worship. The English Episcopalians have a chapel, with a few worshipers, for the most part English and Americans, connected with the British embassy and the American episcopal mission. The Baptists have met with little success. There are many Catholics in the island of Syra, Tenos and Naxos. They have a small church in Athens, and are building another quite large. They have also a church at the Piræus, and several at the islands. The missionaries stationed in Greece are two Baptists and one Congregational, one Episcopalian from America, one English Episcopalian, and several Roman Catholics. The results of the Roman Catholic missionary labors are, a multiplication of little crosses, beads, and wonder-working medals of the Virgin Mary; devotion to her; subjection to the Pope of Rome; rejection of the Word of God; the prohibition of independent thought and investigation. Two daughters of the Rev. Mr. S., for a long time agent of the British Bible Society, have gone to the Roman church, and refuse to read the Book their father labored to circulate, and are now in a nunnery in Syra, and treat their mother in a manner to be justified only by those who say, that if a man say to his father or mother, "Corban," he is free. (Mark vii. 11, 12.)

The labors of the Episcopal mission in Athens and Syra have been directed chiefly to the establishment of schools and the instruction of children. The American Episcopal missionaries have disclaimed all intention to draw any one from the Greek church, and a large portion of those whom they have instructed are devoted to the Greek church, and conform to all its ceremonies. They have all employed the New Testament in their schools, and this, it is to be hoped, will produce some salutary effect.

The Greeks are proverbially deceitful, and some of the professed converts have betrayed their unworthy motives. "Of those," says Mr. King, "who have come to me at various times, and professed to believe the doctrines I preach, and offered to become, as they said, my followers, while some were intelligent and sincere, many were deceived, and many deceiving." The labors of the missionary formerly employed at Mani, by the American Board of Foreign Missions, produced very happy results. Some hundred young men, who were taught in the missionary schools there, now hold important stations, civil or military. And many who were taught, more or less in the schools, under the care of Mr. King, in Athens, hold important stations under the Greek government. Several are teachers of Hellenic schools; some are military officers; one is at the head of a gymnasium; some are in situations in which they can exert an influence favorable to religious liberty. The sacred Scriptures have been introduced into all the schools of Greece, and among the common people, and thousands have heard the truth, who, but for the missionaries, would never have heard it. A great degree of religious liberty has been secured.

The American Board have in this and Asiatic Turkey, a mission to each of the following peoples: to the Armenians; to the Greeks; the Jews; the Syrians; the Jacobites and Chaldeans; and the Nestorians. These missions consist of forty-three American missionaries and their wives, with one hundred and nine native assistants. For fuller statements, see Armenians, Nestorians, Syria, and Mosül.

The Free Church of Scotland have an interesting mission to the Jews at Constantinople. The London Jews' Society has another to the same people. Connected with the American Missions are schools of various grades, presses, &c. From the beginning, the American missionaries alone have printed more than 120,000,000 pages. The whole Bible has been translated, under the supervision of the missionaries, into Hebrew-Spanish, Armeno-Turkish, modern Armenian; and portions of it into other dialects. The Pilgrim's Progress, Rise and Progress, Saints' Rest, Butler's Analogy, D'Aubigne's Reformation, and similar works, have been translated and distributed. The labors of the American missionaries among the Armenians, and of the Scottish missionaries among the Jews of Constantinople, have been accompanied by the most visible results. Among the Turks there is as yet no such national movement toward reformation, and the reception of spiritual Christianity, as among the Armenians. Besides the instances of an open renunciation of the old church, there are many manifest results of missionary labor in those who still remain in the church. The opinions and practices of the people in regard to several of their ancient superstitions are changing: for example, the use of pictures in churches is in many cases discontinued; confession to priests is less practiced; the fasts are more neglected. There are now ten schools where one formerly existed. Discussion on the main points in controversy between evangelical religion and the multiform errors of formalism is now quite common throughout the whole Armenian race in Turkey. Many, still remaining in the Armenian Church, are fully convinced of its errors, and laboring to hasten the day when they shall be fully and openly renounced. Fifteen evangelical churches have already been formed among the Armenians in different parts of European and Asiatic Turkey, and more will soon be formed. Probably 2,500 have already been enrolled as Protestants; and the number is increasing. Protestantism is now protected by the government as fully as any other form of religion.

The hindrances to the coming of Christ's kingdom in this country are, however, still quite formidable. The Greeks have a pride of ancestry and church antiquity, a blind superstition and submission to a priesthood very jealous of their prerogatives, and vigilant against the invasion of their darkness by any beam of light. The Romanists are here, as every where, either bigots or infidels, and vigilantly guarded by the Pope's emissaries. The Armenians are embarrassed in their inquiries by the social penalties of deserting their church. The Jews have a low, deceitful, mercenary spirit, and seem, for the most part, incapable of appreciating an appeal to any lofty sentiment.

No missionaries are designated directly to the Mohammedans. Probably, most, if not all the missionaries in Turkey have, however, more or less intercourse with this class; and, in some instances, there is opportunity to preach to them the Gospel. The chief hindrance to its success among them is the unrepealed law, that an apostate from Mohammedanism must be put to death. Some years ago, it is true, the English ambassador forced from the Sultan a pledge that this sentence should not be executed in the case of a man who, from being a Christian, embraced Mohammedanism, and then returned to the Christian faith. But for all true Turks this cruel law is still in force; and has, in one instance, been executed even since the British fleet entered those waters to protect the Turks against the Russians! Let this law once be repealed, and liberty given to all Mohammedans to embrace what religion they please, and we have the best reasons for believing that Protestant Christianity would very soon spread among them. Romanism they never will adopt.

Several large bodies of men exist in Turkey, among whom no missionaries are yet laboring,—and some of these may be said to be fairly open for such labors; such as the Bulgarians,—professing the Greek faith,—who, for several years past, have eagerly sought for the word of God; the Wallachians, (of the same faith,) who, though more worldly in their views, are yet, it is said, in a great measure free from the shackles of priestcraft; and the Hellenic Greeks themselves, in the Turkish empire, numbering probably 2,000,000, present a field, if not yet wholly open, still not by any means devoid of promise, and one which hitherto has been but very imperfectly supplied with laborers.

The openings in the Armenian field are the most remarkable, and, though the urgent call for more laborers has not yet been fully responded to, we consider this field as occupied by the American Board, and it may be hoped that the promised reinforcement will soon be sent by that efficient body to occupy it fully. —REV. E. N. KIRK.

METHODIST MISSIONS IN EUROPE.—I. The several sections of Methodism engaged in this work (in the order in which they entered upon their labors) are—the (English) Wesleyan Methodists; the (Irish) Wesleyan Methodists; the (Irish) Primitive Wesleyan Methodists; the Methodist New Connexion; the (English) Primitive Methodists; the Wesleyan Methodist Association; and the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States.

II. The Countries of Europe where these several bodies are operating are as follows: besides destitute parts of England, Methodist missions have been established in the Norman Isles, Ireland, Wales, Spain, France, Shetland Isles, Switzerland, Germany, Sweden, Norway, Corsica, and the Sardinian States.

III. The mode of operation in the management of these missions.—With the exception of the Continental missions, which are paid direct from the General Mission Fund, the Home missions of English Methodism are managed in connexion with a fund designated the Contingent Fund. This fund is made up from the Yearly collection and the July collection. The former is made annually in the classes at the time of the March quarterly visitation. The ministers meet every class; and, after hearing the religious experience of each member, hand them their ticket (a certificate of continued membership,) on the receipt of which each member is expected to name the amount which he will give to the yearly collection. This sum is then entered by the leader in the class-book, and collected by him. It is expected that the average contribution to this fund is not to fall short in any circuit of about 12½ cents for each member in society. And the Board of Stewards is expected to do their best to see this carried out in each case. The July collection is publicly made in all their chapels and preaching stations in the month of July. The Contingent Fund also receives occasional donations and legacies; and out of this fund are paid the contingent expenses of the Conference; and the remainder is employed in assisting the poorer circuits in maintaining the ordinances of the Gospel, and to provide means of sending and sustaining additional preachers in destitute localities. This is the oldest charity of the Methodist Connection, having been established by the venerable Wesley himself, at the Thirteenth Annual Conference, in 1756. It has thus been 98 years in successful operation, and has done much for the extension of Methodism in the British Isles. This fund is distributed by a mixed committee, consisting of the president and secretary of the Conference, fifteen ministers appointed by that body, and fifteen lay gentlemen, annually chosen by the stewards exclusively, at the district meetings most contiguous to the place where the Conference is held. The annual amount of this fund of late years varies from $50,000 to over $73,000. There is no distinction made between the preachers who receive aid from this fund and their other brethren. But they are practically "Home Missionaries," and this fund is "The Home Mission Fund" of Methodism. After the Gospel has been established by means of this fund in any new place, it is expected of those who receive the Gospel through this instrumentality, that they shall, as soon as possible, begin to help themselves. Unless in extreme poverty, the minimum of Methodist contribution for the support of the ministry, "a penny a week, and a shilling a quarter," is expected to be contributed by each member; and the amount which their united payments fall short of the Home missionary's allowance, is made up from the Contingent Fund. So that each year, as the Gospel gains adherents, the circuit finances increase, and, in the same proportion, the grant from the fund becomes less and less, until ultimately the self-supporting position is reached, and the fund is entirely relieved of the burden; while, for the service rendered, this circuit is considered for ever afterward bound in honor to contribute to both the sources from whence this fund draws its supplies, in order that a similar service may be rendered for other places still destitute. And thus to this simple, but efficient plan of Home Missionary finance do more than one half of the circuits in British Methodism owe their origin.

IV. The Success which has attended their Efforts.—As already stated, the English Wesleyan Home Missions commenced when Mr. Wesley instituted the Contingent Fund in 1756; and the results are seen only in the general diffusion of Methodism, because, in proportion as they were successful, they ceased to be missionary. In 1786, Mr. Wesley sent Adam Clarke as a missionary to the Norman Isles, near the coast of Normandy, whose labors were blessed; and these isles now form a district under the direction of the English Wesleyan Conference, with 11 ministers and 3161 members. Ireland was first included as a home mission by the Wesleyans in 1799. But these missions are held under the control of the Irish Wesleyan Conference. Wales was taken up in the year 1800. The first missionaries being Owen Davis and John Hughes (since known as the learned author of Hora Britannica), and the result, with the blessing of God, is now seen in 49 Welsh preachers and 12,203 members in society. The Shetland Isles, to the north of Scotland, the natives of which are said to be of Norwegian descent, were first occupied as a mission in 1821. For several years they were under the special care of Dr. A. Clarke. There are now six ministers there, and 1265 members.

The English Wesleyans established a mission at Gibraltar in 1808. The Gospel is now preached there in both English and Spanish, and of the 250 children in the schools, 224 are Spaniards—a hope of better days to come for their noble and beautiful, but spiritually oppressed country.

France.—During the revolutionary war between France and England, Methodist missionaries were regularly supplied to the French prisoners at Chatham, Plymouth, and Stapleton. Soon after the peace of 1815 these efforts opened a way into France itself, where the Wesleyans have now a strong and interesting mission, which has lately been erected into a separate organization, with independent action, but continues to receive pecuniary aid from the English Wesleyans, and also from the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States.

Switzerland.—This is an offshoot of the French mission. Into Switzerland, the valleys of Piedmont, the hamlets of the Upper Alps, and even Nice, within the confines of Italy, Methodist preachers have found their way, and gathered little churches. The societies here, and in the south of France, are now enjoying a revival of religion such as never was experienced by them before. The National Reformed Church, the Free Church, and the Dissenters have also begun to share largely in its blessings. The missionary in the Upper Alps, Mr. Rostan, is a convert of the great and good Felix Neff, whose field of labor he here cultivates as a Wesleyan missionary.

Germany.—In Winnenden, in the kingdom of Wirtemberg, the Wesleyan Missionary Society have a most precious work going forward, conducted, under very peculiar circumstances, by the venerable Mr. Müller, assisted by 20 local preachers, with 1100 church members.

Sweden.—Here they have a chapel, and many members in Stockholm, begun in 1826, but the intolerant laws put in force against all ministers not of the Establishment, obliged the missionary, Mr. Scott, to quit the field. But a work has been done there which intolerant laws cannot extinguish—and which may yet break forth on the right hand and on the left.

The Irish Wesleyan Methodist Home Missions were commenced in 1799. These missions are scattered over different parts of Ireland; and by the preaching of a pure Gospel and the maintenance of schools where the Holy Scriptures are taught daily, they are instrumental in preserving and extending the saving power of Protestant truth in distant and necessitous localities, which would otherwise be almost, if not entirely destitute of its enlightening and regenerating influences. Some remarkable men have risen up in connection with these missions, "whose praise is in the churches," among whom are the honored names of Charles Graham, Thomas Walsh, and Gideon Ousley. These men in the streets, and fairs, and markets of Ireland, in Ireland's own tongue, have sown broadcast over the country those seeds of evangelical truth, the fruits of which others are now reaping, in the present reformations from Popery in that land. Perhaps few fields of Christian activity have yielded richer results for the labor bestowed upon them. Besides conserving the interests of Protestantism in many places in Ireland, where Popish error would otherwise have rooted up the last vestige of truth, and also during the past thirty or forty years sending thousands of evangelical Methodist Christians to Canada, Australia, and the United States, where they have helped to spread the Gospel, this mission has given McKenney, Lynch, Horne, W. Arthur, and others to the foreign missionary enterprise, and has furnished the Methodist Episcopal Church with a noble addition to her ministry, among whom stand James Caughey and Charles Elliott.

The Irish Primitive Wesleyan Methodists arose in 1816, on the question of the administration of the sacraments by the Methodist preachers in Ireland. They wished to adhere as closely as possible to the practice of Mr. Wesley's early preachers, and to consider themselves merely as preachers of the Gospel, without full ministerial responsibility. They have for several years sustained a missionary agency, chiefly in the destitute Protestant portions of the country, under the shelter of the Church Establishment, among the members of which they have done much good.

The Methodist New Connection in England, which originated in 1797, has a home mission occupying England, the north of Ireland, and Canada.

The Primitive Methodists, vulgarly called "Ranters," are a devoted and laborious body of Christians, which rose in Staffordshire in 1810. God has greatly owned and blessed the labors of these humble and faithful men. Besides England, the home missions of the Primitives are found in the north and east of Ireland, and in Canada. The rapid increase of this hard-working body of Christians, and the efficiency of their domestic mission may be seen from the fact that while in 1830 they had but 420 chapels, 240 ministers, and 35,733 members; in 1853, they had 1789 chapels, 568 ministers, and 108,926 members; making an increase, in 23 years, of 1369 chapels, 328 ministers, and 72,193 members. This increase has been realized, under God, not by any aggression upon other men's labors, for they have never built "upon another man's foundation," but they have gone forth "into the highways and hedges," and have reclaimed the outcasts and the wanderers, for whose souls no one else has cared. Their prosperity is a matter of rejoicing to all who pray for the coming of the Redeemer's kingdom.

The Wesleyan Association, which rose in 1834, under the auspices of Dr. Warren, has domestic missions in England, Wales, Ireland, and Hamburg. But these efforts are only lately originated, and, as yet, have not enjoyed any large measure of prosperity.

The Methodist Episcopal Church, in the United States, has several missions of a domestic character in Europe, and some of which, whether from the localities where they operate, or from the rich grace which God has granted upon their labors, are of the most interesting character. They are conducted on the same general plan as their home missions in this country, for which see Home Missions. Germany, the land of Luther, the home of the Reformation, now so grievously fallen from its evangelical standards, is the principal post occupied by this branch of the Methodist church; and the wonderful providence which led her there is thus traced by Dr. McClintock : "In 1821, two young men entered the University of Tubingen in Germany, from the gymnasium, to complete their education. They were both well trained according to the German plan ; both of promise and talent ; both were to be theologians. They formed a friendship at the university, and for six years lived, studied, and formed their plans of life together ; and they supposed that their lines of life would be parallel ; that they would both be theologians—ministers probably, with the usual ambition of an enterprising and talented German student. In 1827 they both finished their studies at the university. The name of one of them is no less a name than that of David Frederick Strauss, the author of the "Life of Jesus ;" the name of the other was William Nast. In eight years from the time he left the university, Strauss had written that famous book in comparison with which all that infidelity had done before was as nothing. During those eight years William Nast had come to America, with blasted hopes and fainting heart, with no sure Christianity, with no hope in this life, and with no hope and hardly any belief in the life to come ; and in eight years he had been led by Providence through many a lane of sorrow and darkness, up to the hour when the memorable awakening occurred which resulted in his conversion.

Thus Providence raised up William Nast to counteract the evil work of his fellow-student, and to be the instrument of converting thousands of his fellow-countrymen here, and then to be a most powerful agency to convert his fatherland. It is now about nineteen years since Dr. Nast's conversion. After laboring here with great success among the Germans—(See Home Missions,)—he sailed for Germany in 1848. He found the door of access wide open, and having marked out a plan of action, he returned and reported to the Board. The Rev. L. S. Jacoby (one of Dr. Nast's own children in the Lord) was accordingly appointed, and sailed in 1849, with instructions to establish the head-quarters of the mission in the free city of Bremen. The word of the Lord immediately began to take effect, and to spread, so that it was necessary to send out additional missionaries. These were readily supplied from the German converts which God had given to Dr. Nast in the United States. The mission has extended itself to Hamburg, on the north, and Frankfort on the south, and its influence has to some extent pervaded all the surrounding states. It is also established in the kingdom of Wurtemberg. Helpers have been raised up to preach the Gospel in the places where they have been converted. Persecutions have followed, and some of the brethren have been imprisoned and fined, but they still persist in preaching the Gospel. Some of the ministers of the state churches oppose and persecute, but a few give their influence and favor to these brethren. The mission in Germany is working among the people and upon the state churches, just as Mr. Wesley's mission did in his early labors in England ; and if it could have freedom and protection in all the states of Germany, as it has in the city and state of Bremen, and as Mr. Wesley and his mission and helpers had in England, the work in Germany would probably equal that of early Methodism in England. Already the fruits are great. In the state of Bremen they are formed into churches ; in other states, where this is not allowed, they are formed into societies, and are met in class and prayer meetings by the prominent persons whom God has raised up among them, as in the early days of Methodism. And where they may not enjoy this privilege, they fly by scores to the United States, bringing their certificates and joining the German churches here. There are now, besides five colporteurs, eleven missionaries itinerating through various parts of Germany. The localities where they preach and form societies and Sunday-schools, and other means of evangelical instruction, are as follows :—In Bremen they have three chapels : in Bremerhaven, Hastedt, Vegesack. In the kingdom of Hanover they operate in Achim, Scharmbeck, and a few other minor places. In the duchy of Oldenburg, in Hasbergen, Dwobergen, and six other places ; also in the possessions of the princes of Schleuss-Reuss and Greitz-Reuss, and in the kingdom of Saxony, where on account of persecution, they are obliged to have their preaching and class-meetings at the midnight hour ; they also have circuits in Frankfort-on-the-Main, and in the kingdom of Wurtemberg, where they have twelve appointments ; and they have also established a mission in Hamburg.

In many of these places the missionaries have been invited to come and labor, because the friends of the persons inviting them, who emigrated to the United States in past years, have been converted, and have written home to their families in Germany, explaining the nature and the joys of personal religion, and urging it upon their acceptance. These letters have spread light, and excited the desire to know more of this good way. The missionaries have established a printing-press and a monthly periodical, and have also opened a book concern for the sale and distribution of evangelical publications.

France, Italy and Corsica.—The French Methodist Conference having become independent, and having peculiar means of extending the Gospel in that empire, the Board of Missions of the Methodist E. Church have voted appropriations to assist the brethren there to extend their interesting work. The appropriation this year is $5,000. By this means, additional ministers have been called out into the work, whose labors are under the special patronage of the Board. Access to the Waldensian valleys, in the direction of Turin, having been much enlarged, Mr. Rastan has been stationed there, and another promised to help him. A wide and remarkable door was opened in the city of Nice, in Sardinia, which is the gateway on the Mediterranean, between France and Italy. Besides the inhabitants, there are great numbers of strangers, who resort here to spend the winter, for the benefit of their health.

There has also occurred a remarkable opening in the island of Corsica, in the Mediterranean, which is under the government of France. Occupying, as it does, a central position between France, Italy, Spain, Sardinia, and Algeria, it is the best position in the south of Europe for a central evangelical Protestant mission. The Methodist missionary is the only Protestant minister in the whole island, containing a population of about 250,000 Romanists. The missionary, Mr. Gallienne, is assisted by a zealous Christian, a convert from Popery, of the name of Dominique Rimathie. They circulate the Scriptures and tracts, both in the French and Italian languages. They have also obtained a chapel and opened Protestant services, and God is giving them favor in the eyes of the people.

In Norway the Methodist E. Church has lately established a mission. Some time ago, a sailor was converted under the ministry of Rev. O. C. Hedstroom, of the Bethel ship, John Wesley, New York. He soon became eminent for his piety, and was known among his ship-mates as "Holy Peter." His anxiety for the salvation of his kindred induced him to leave his profession, and return to his native country, Norway, that he might "tell them how great things the Lord had done for him." His simple, earnest exhortations were accompanied with the unction of the Holy Spirit, and many were awakened and converted, so that it was with difficulty he could tear himself from the people, that he might return to the United States. On his arrival here he was sent off to preach among his Scandinavian brethren in the State of Iowa. But the converted souls in Norway earnestly entreated that he might be sent back to them for their sake, and for the sake of spreading the good work among the perishing sinners around them. After the usual instructions and examinations, he was accordingly ordained, and, in October, 1853, accompanied by two other converted Norwegian sailors, as his assistants, he sailed for Norway; and, when heard from, they had hired a place to preach in, and had begun their work with prospects of acceptance and usefulness. Mr. Peterson, the missionary, in a communication, dated March 1st, 1854, "rejoices in God to be able to say that he believes that twelve or fourteen persons have been truly converted since they arrived in Norway."—REV. W. BUTLER.

FAIRFIELD: A station of the Moravians in Jamaica, W. I.

FAKIR or FAQUIR: A monk in India. The fakirs subject themselves to severe austerities and mortifications. Some of them condemn themselves to a standing posture all their lives, supported only by a stick or rope under their armpits. Some mangle their bodies with scourges or knives. Others wander about in companies, telling fortunes, and these are said to be arrant villains.

FALMOUTH: A station of the Wesleyans, in Jamaica, W. I.

FALEALILI: A station of the London Missionary Society on the Island of Upolu, one of the Samoan group.

FAIR HARBOUR: A station of the London Missionary Society in the Society Islands.

FARMERFIELD: A station of the Wesleyans in Great Namaqualand, S. Africa.

FASITOOTAI: A station of the London Missionary Society on the Island of Upolu, one of the Samoan group.

FATÉ: One of the New Hebrides Islands, having a station of the London Missionary Society.

FEARN: A station of the London Missionary Society in Berbice, S. America.

FEEJEE ISLANDS: See South Sea Islands.

FERNANDO PO: An Island in the Bight of Biafra, on the western coast of Africa, 20 miles from the continent, 40 miles in length, 20 in breadth, and 120 in circumference. Like the adjacent parts of the main land, it is very mountainous, Clarence Peak being 10,700 feet high. The southern extremity is also intersected with steep mountains, from 1,000 to 3,000 feet high; which, with the intervening valleys, are covered with dense forests of large and valuable timber, and watered by numerous rivulets. The dry season commences the latter end of May, and continues till the end of November. The sea breeze is regular, but the land breeze generally deficient, being intercepted by the high range of mountains on the main land. Clarence, the principal settlement, is on the north side of the Island, in latitude 3° 53' N. and longitude 7° 40' E. and is built close to the sea, upon an elevated plain, embracing two small peninsulas, Point William and Point Adelaide, with a semi-circular space, forming a cove, well adapted for shipping. The soil is fertile, and the water of the best quality, and there are no marshes in the vicinity. The English Baptist Missionary Society have a mission here. (See Africa, Western.)

FETISH: See Africa, Western.

FIRST-HILL: A station of the London Missionary Society in Jamaica, W. I.

FISHTOWN: Station of the American Episcopal Missionary Society in South Africa, situated to the south-west of Cape Palmas.

FIVE ISLANDS: A station of the Moravians in Antigua, W. I.

FLINT: A Cherokee town in the Indian territory and an out-station of the American Baptist Mission.

FORT BEAUFORT: Station of the London Missionary Society in South Africa, in Beaufort district, near the head waters of the Keiskamma river.

FOUR-PATHS: A station of the London Missionary Society in Jamaica, W. I.

FREDERICKSTHAL: A station of the Moravians in Greenland.

FREEDOM CHAPEL: A station of the London Missionary Society in British Guiana.

FREEMANTLE: A station of the Gospel Propagation Society in Australia, situated at the entrance of Swan river.

FREETOWN: Chief town of the colony of Sierra Leone, situated near the mouth of the Sierra Leone river. It is well situated for commerce. The Church and Wesleyan Societies both have stations at this place. (See Africa, Western.)

FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND MISSIONS: The Free Church supports extensive Home and Colonial Missionary operations; together with missions to the Jews, and Foreign Missions in Hindostan and S. Africa, notices of which appear under those heads. The income for Missions and Education in 1854, was £46,282, and for all objects, £287,574.

FREEWILL BAPTIST FOREIGN MISSION SOCIETY: The members of the Free Will Baptist denomination did not generally engage in the Foreign Mission enterprise till about twenty years ago. The founders of the connection were zealous and pious men, who made great sacrifices to preach the Gospel in the destitute parts of the country. But unfortunately for the cause of religion and the interests of the denomination, they, with those who sympathized with them, suffered their prejudices against what they called the "hireling" system to drive them into strong opposition to the regular support of the ministry. Hence, the appointment of missionaries with the appropriation of definite sums of money for their support was discarded. Yet there were some who ardently desired the conversion of the world, and wished to see the denomination engage in the great work of sending the Gospel to the heathen. Being unknown to each other, hearing but little to encourage them to engage in the missionary enterprise, and being scattered among those who were either opposed or indifferent to the cause, no effort was made in the churches to send the lamp of life to the benighted heathen for some years after other denominations had commenced their labors for the conversion of idolators. Rev. Amos Sutton, of the English General Baptist Mission in Orissa, was, under God, enabled to arouse many of the ministers and members from their inaction, and induce them to engage in efforts for the conversion of Orissa. Early in 1832 he wrote to Elder John Buzzell of Parsonsfield, Me., who was one of the oldest and most influential ministers of the Free-will Baptist connection. The letter was an earnest and pathetic appeal for aid; and as it was published in the Morning Star, the organ of the denomination, was heartily seconded by Elder Buzzell, and was written by a missionary of sentiments similar to those of the Free-will Baptists, a good impression was made. In 1833 Mr. Sutton visited the United States, having been compelled to leave Orissa for a season on account of ill health. He came by the permission of the English General Baptist Missionary Society, who generously defrayed the expense of his visit. His presence and earnest and persevering labors deepened the favorable impression previously made, and much of the prejudice that had existed against the cause of missions was removed. During his stay the Free-will Baptist Foreign Mission Society was formed. The organization was to a considerable extent effected through his means, and his services were of great value as the work was new to all who were associated with him in forming the Society. Soon after this he went to England, but returned in 1834, and engaged in the duties of Corresponding Secretary of the Society, the Directors having chosen him to that office while he was in England. His health was in a good degree restored, which enabled him to travel and lecture in many of the churches, and take collections in aid of the cause. He was very cordially received not only among the Free-will Baptists, but by Christians of other denominations. His arduous labors were continued for one year, during which time two brethren were appointed as missionaries to Orissa. These brethren were Rev. Eli Noyes of Jefferson, Me., who was a Free-will Baptist, and Rev. Jeremiah Phillips of Plainfield, N. Y., who belonged to the Open Communion Baptists, a sect that subsequently united with the Free-will Baptist connection. These two missionaries, with their wives, sailed for Orissa, September 22, 1835, and were the first sent out by this Society. Mr. Sutton was one of their fellow passengers, and was of great service to them during the voyage, and after their arrival in India.

The Society has but one mission. It has sent out six male and nine female missionaries from this country, and the services of one female have been secured in Orissa. Rev. John Buzzell was the first President of the Society, and retained the office about fifteen years. Rev. Amos Sutton was its first Corresponding Secretary, and Mr. Isaac N. Sanborn of North Parsonsfield, Me., its first Treasurer. He died in 1835 or 1836. Wm. Burr, Esq., editor of the Morning Star and Treasurer of two other benevolent societies, succeeded Mr. Sanborn as Treasurer of this Society, and has ever since retained the office, rendering his services gratuitously. It has had three Corresponding Secretaries since Mr. Sutton resigned, and their services have been mostly gratuitous.

The affairs of the Society are conducted by an Executive Committee. Its officers were formerly chosen by a Board of Directors; but this Board has been dispensed with, and all the officers are now chosen by the Society at its annual meetings.

A few years after the organization of this body, Miss Sarah Chapin of Rumford, N. H., made it a bequest of some four thousand dollars, which sum was paid in annual instalments. She had previously willed the property to the missionary society of another denomination of which she was a member. On learning the anti-slavery character of the Free-will Baptists, she revoked her will and disposed of her property as stated above. While the denomination held an informal connection with a body of slaveholding Baptists at the South, which union has since been dissolved, the Executive Committee passed a resolution not to receive the contributions of slaveholders.

The following are the Society's annual receipts. From its origin to 1835, a period of about three years, the amount received was, $2,653 37. In 1836, it was, $915 43

In 1837, $1,459 79	In 1838, $2,504 36
In 1839, $2,336 71	In 1840, $2,777 00
In 1841, $3,137 32	In 1842, $3,556 42
In 1843, $2,726 74	In 1844, $2,388 04
In 1845, $3,160 66	In 1846, $3,219 21
In 1847, $3,544 00	In 1848, $5,618 63
In 1849, $2,992 20	In 1850, $4,215 31
In 1851, $4,958 14	In 1852, $4,475 98
In 1853, $6,245 93.	Total since the organization of the Society, $62,885 24.

Considerable irregularity is seen in the receipts, as the amount of one year is compared with that of another. This is caused mostly by the irregularity of the time of holding the annual meetings when the accounts are made up. Dividing twenty of the twenty-one years of the Society's existence into two equal parts, giving to each its respective receipts, the increase of funds in the last period over the first, is $17,958 51. This gain was not made by an increase of the numerical strength of the denomination, for there was a decrease of its numbers while the funds were increasing. It was caused by the increasing light on the subject of missions, and the formation of churches better taught than some of those previously organized. As the denomination was weak in numbers and resources, and most of the churches were small, poor, and not trained to benevolent efforts, the missionary enterprise was commenced with fears of failure, and there were some apprehensions of embarrassment when Miss Chapin's bequest should be expended. But former anxieties and disquietudes have been happily succeeded by the pleasing hope that, under God, the Society has become permanently established, though its operations are limited. However small it may be "among the thousands of Judah," it has something to do in the great work of spreading the Gospel among all nations, and there are indications that the churches will become more active in the holy enterprise.

Most of the funds of the Society have been collected by subscriptions, the circulation of missionary cards, and by contributions. This course, though it saves the expense of agents, yet lacks the efficiency of the agency system. Rev. O. R. Bachelor, a returned missionary, has been on an agency among the churches more than a year past, and is still in the field. The amount of receipts for 1853 was considerably greater than that of any previous year, and his efficient labors were among the means that brought the additional sum into the treasury. Many, however, think that in most cases the services of agents are not necessary, and that all the funds that can be appropriated directly to missionary purposes may be obtained without their aid. The denomination consists of 28 yearly meetings, 129 quarterly meetings, 1146 churches, 1069 preachers, and about 50,000 communicants. Each quarterly meeting is composed of delegates from a convenient number of churches, and the yearly meetings are made of delegates sent from the quarterly meetings. Each quarterly meeting assembles four times a year with such churches in its limits as are willing to entertain the meetings. As there are some five hundred of these sessions annually held, with about the same number of churches scattered throughout the denomination, each meeting usually attended by several ministers and often by large numbers of people, great facilities are afforded in this way for obtaining funds for the cause of missions. It is hoped that these facilities will at no very distant period be so far improved as to dispense with agents.

The small amount of receipts shows that the Society has done but little in the work of converting the heathen. The connection took its rise in the then new settlements of the country, and up to some ten years ago it numbered scarcely a dozen churches in large villages and cities. At the commencement of the missionary enterprise among

Free-will Baptists, their churches were mostly small, poor, scattered, and many of them without pastors, and most of the ministers were uneducated and had no regular support. The mass, which was then in almost a chaotic state, is now assuming form and vitality. There are not many wealthy men in the churches, and not one of the few that are rich has yet made a large donation to the Foreign Mission Society.—Rev. E. HUTCHINS.

FRIEDENSBURG: A station of the Moravians on the Island of St. Thomas, West Indies.

FRIEDENSFIELD: A station of the United Brethren in St. Thomas, W. I.

FRIEDENSTHAL: A station of the Moravians, on the Island of St. Thomas.

FRIENDLY ISLANDS: A group of islands situated between $16^{\circ} 21'$, south latitude, and $176^{\circ} 186'$, west longitude. Some of them are barren and desert spots. Others are of considerable size, Tonga containing a population of 10,000.

FRIEDAU: A station of the French Protestants in South Africa, 183 miles east of Motito.

FUH-CHAU: One of the five ports of China, opened to foreigners, situated in latitude $26^{\circ} 5'$ N., and longitude $119^{\circ} 20'$ E., on the north bank of the Min river.

FURRACKABAD: A city in the province of Agra, in Hindostan, situated near the south bank of the Ganges, 82 E. N. E. of Agra, 156 N. W. of Allahabad. Population, 70,000. It is the chief commercial city of the ceded and conquered provinces, and is said to be the common resort of needy and dissolute characters from other parts of Hindostan. It is a station of the American Presbyterian Board.

FUTTEHGURH: A station of the Presbyterian Board in Northern India, on the Ganges, 200 miles above Allahabad.

GABOON: A river in West Africa, entering the ocean about twenty miles north of the equator, in longitude $9^{\circ} 18'$ east from Greenwich, on which is situated the mission of the American Board to West Africa. Its width for 40 miles from its mouth, varies from 8 to 14 miles. For the last 30 miles of its course, this river is fully equal in size to the Senegal, Niger, and Congo, and much superior in grandeur and beauty. Its general course is westerly. Many rivers flow into it, the banks of which are interspersed with numerous villages. Forty miles from the ocean it divides into the Rembwe, which is a mile wide at its mouth, and navigable some distance for small vessels, and the big Orombo, or the Olombo-mpolo, which has a width of more than two miles at its junction with the Rembwe, and is navigable to where it divides into the Kama and Bakwa. Of these branches the Bakwe, which is a quarter of a mile wide where it unites with the Kambá, is said to have a boat navigation of 40 or 50 miles; and the Kambá, which is twice its size, would allow the passage of vessels of a moderate burden a still greater distance, were it not for a sand-bar at its mouth.

Face of the Country, Climate, &c.—The country for the distance of 100 or 150 miles into the interior, is quite uniformly level, and covered with forests so dense as to render it next to impossible to thread them, and the native paths (for there are no roads) are not wide enough for a horse, or even for a man, with a pack of any size, to pass. The banks of the rivers are in many places low and marshy; in others, for miles together, elevated. Farther in the interior the country is hilly, and rises at length into magnificent mountains.

Contrary to what would naturally be inferred, there is good reason for believing that no place on the coast is more healthy than the Gaboon country. This is owing to several causes. The rainy season, which, including a month called "the middle dries," when the showers are less frequent, lasts seven months, is the warm season, when the thermometer ranges from 72 to 88 degrees of Fahrenheit. Then, the rains are generally in the night, so that one is still less exposed to take cold. Again, at the close of the rainy season, the sky becomes overcast with clouds, by which means the disastrous effects of a burning sun, operating in the luxuriant vegetation of the rainy season, are entirely obviated. The region through which the upper waters of the Gaboon flow, is supposed to be highly salubrious; and when the way shall be opened to the grand mountains which are in full sight from a hill back of King George's Town, as fine a resort will be found, it is probable, for recovering from the effects of a tropical climate, as the world affords.

Productions are various and abundant, consisting of plantains and cassada,—the staple articles of food, and which are prepared for the table in a great variety of ways,—yams, sweet potatoes, Indian corn, sugar cane, pumpkins, peas, beans, &c. Goats and fowls abound, but cattle and sheep have only recently been introduced. The forests swarm with wild animals, and the waters with fish; and honey is to be had at all seasons.

People, Customs, Language, &c.—The tribes which now dwell on the Gaboon and its waters, are not the original occupants of the country. Indeed, judging from present appearances, there is ground for very painful conjectures as to the number of tribes which have successively made their way hither from the interior, and been swept away during the hundreds of years that this has been one of the centres of the slave trade. The people spoken of by the present inhabitants as the first who lived here, are the Divwas; of whom it is said, only one is now left. The Mpongwes, who then dwelt far back in the bush, occupy their place; but are only a remnant of what they once were, being variously estimated at from six to twelve thousand in number. The Shikanis next came over the mountains, then a wild, fierce, numerous, and powerful tribe; but who, though still more numerous than the Mpongwes, have almost literally sold themselves out, and are scattered among the border towns of the Mpongwes and Bakillis. This last named tribe came over the mountains yet later, overpowering the Shikanis, and are the principal occupants of the branches of the Gaboon. They thus far know but little of trade, have had little to do with rum, the great bane of these tribes, and are in many respects a promising people. Within ten years the Pangwes have made their appearance; though rude, and possibly some of them cannibals, yet a noble race, muscular, healthy-looking and uncontaminated with the vices of civilization. They wear scarcely any clothing, many of them paint their bodies with redwood, and nearly all of them wear ornaments of white beads, ivory, and iron rings. The iron seems to be of a superior quality, and many of their implements are made with a taste and skill equal to that of any people in the world. Already not far from ten thousand of them are settled on or near the waters of the Gaboon; and they say they are only the pioneers of those who are to follow.

The Gaboon people are divided into four distinct political communities, two of which occupy the south side of the river, and two the north. The number of the Gaboon people proper is not large. They act as factors for the interior tribes. The articles of traffic, besides slaves, are ivory, redwood, ebony, beeswax, and gum copal. The annual export of ivory, in 1843, exceeded 30 tons. The entire trade of the river, besides slaves, was at that time, estimated at over $100,000. The native merchants, through whom this trade passes, are respectable and trustworthy men, who live in respectable style, and associate with foreigners on terms of equality. Their houses are supplied with many useful and costly articles of European manufacture, and their tables spread with delicacies. Most of them speak intelligible English. Most of the men are engaged in trade. The women and slaves manage what they call their "plantations." They pride themselves not a little on their approximation to the habits and customs of civilized life.

The government in all these tribes is purely patriarchal. The term king is derived from Europe; no power answering to the name is possessed by him on whom it is conferred; and no central power exists, which is acknowledged by the separate villages. Slavery in a mild form, polygamy in perhaps its worst character, and on the lower waters of the Gaboon, intemperance, prevail. Witchcraft is universally believed in. Death, whatever its immediate cause, is very generally attributed to this; and he upon whom suspicion fastens as the witch, is made the victim of a relentless superstition. Still the people are farther advanced in civilization than any other on the whole coast, and possess such elements of character as give promise that they will rise rapidly under the influence of the Gospel. Their general disposition is mild and peaceful, and they manifest an unusual desire for instruction. The Mpongwe language is spoken very extensively along the coast, and is supposed to be, with more or less dialectic differences, very largely throughout Southern Africa. It is wonderfully perfect in its structure, of great flexibility, and pleasant to the ear.

GALLE: A station of the Irish Presbyterians and also of the Wesleyan Methodists in Ceylon.

GARAWAY: A station of the American Episcopal Board in West Africa, 8 miles from Cape Palmas.

GAWAR: A district of the Mountain Nestorians, 70 miles west of Oroomiah, a station of the American Board.

GANJAM: A station of the General Baptists in Orissa, India.

GAWLER: A station of the Wesleyans in Australia.

GEELONG: A station of the Wesleyans in Australia. It lies at the bottom of a deep bay, which forms the inner harbor, about 50 miles south of Melbourne. It is rapidly increasing, and likely to become a place of importance.

GENADENDAL: A station of the United Brethren in South Africa, 130 miles north-east of Cape Town, near Sergeant's river. This was the first station of the United Brethren in South Africa. It was first called Bavian's Kloof, and afterwards Gnadenthal or Genedendal, which means Valley of Grace, or Grace Dale. It was originally commenced in 1736; but afterwards given up, and renewed in 1792.

GENERAL BAPTIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY: The distinction between particular and general Baptists, is founded on the belief of the former in particular, and the latter in general redemption. The former are Calvinists, the latter Arminians. On account of the prevalence of Socinianism among the General Baptists of England, the evangelical portion of them separated themselves and formed a new connection in 1770. The formation of the Missionary Society by the Particular Baptists in 1791, was the means of awakening the missionary spirit among the churches of the new connection; and at length Providence raised up Rev. J. G. Pike to advocate the cause among them, and his appeals awakened so much interest that a society was formed in 1816. Their first mission was established in Orissa, the province in which the idol Juggernaut is situated. To this their chief energies have been directed. They have also a mission in China. The reports of the Society do not give statistics with sufficient definiteness to enable us to state the number of missionary laborers, church members, &c. The amount of funds raised and expended by the Society is about £2,000 a year.

GEOGTAPA: A village near Oroomiah, Persia, an out-station of the mission of the American Board.

GEORGIAN ISLANDS: A group of islands in the Southern Pacific Ocean, between latitude 17° 18' S., and longitude 149° 15' West, embracing the islands of Tahiti, Eimeo, Tabuaemanu, Tetuaroa, Matea, and Meetia.

GEORGETOWN: The chief town of British Guiana, a station of the Wesleyans. Population 8,000 to 10,000, mostly negroes.

GERMAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY: (See Basle Missionary Society.)

GHAZIPOOR: A town of Allahabad, 41 miles north-east from Benares, a station of the Berlin Missionary Society.

GLASGOW MISSIONARY SOCIETY: One of the earliest organizations in the world for sending the Gospel to the heathen, was the Glasgow Missionary Society. It was formed on the 9th of February, 1796; and it originally embraced members of the Established Church of Scotland and Dissenters from that communion. After the lapse of more than thirty years, it was thought expedient to dissolve the union and form two societies; one of which should be composed of persons adhering to the Church of Scotland, and the other of Dissenters. The former retained the old name, and the latter was called the Glasgow African Missionary Society, and the missions were about equally divided between the two. After the division which took place in the Church of Scotland in 1843, the Glasgow Missionary Society became merged in the foreign mission scheme of the Free Church of Scotland; and its missionaries (all being in South Africa) were placed under the care of the latter body. The vote of dissolution and transfer was passed on the 29th of October, 1844, and, on the 27th of July, 1847, the Glasgow African Society transferred its missions to the United Presbyterian Church. See Africa, Southern.

GLOUCESTER: Town of liberated Africans, in Sierra Leone, West Africa, between Freetown and Regents' Town—a station of the Church Missionary Society.

GNADENBERG: A station of Gossner's Missionary Society in Hindostan.

GOGO: A station of the Irish Presbyterians in the district of Goelwara, Hindostan.

GOLD COAST: (See Ashantee.)

GONAIVES: A station of the Wesleyans in the West Indies.

GOOBEE: A station of the Wesleyans in India.

GOOD-WATER: A station of the American Board among the Choctaw Indians.

GORRUCKPORE: A town in the province of Oude in northern Hindostan, and capital of a district of the same name. Population 40,000. The Church Missionary Society commenced operations here in 1823.

GOSSNER'S MISSIONARY SOCIETY: Germany has one organization for the conversion of the heathen, which is unlike all others. It is generally called Gossner's Missionary Society. This warm-hearted, but eccentric man, belonged to the committee of the Berlin Missionary Society. But as he could not assent to all the principles of his associates in regard to the training of missionaries, he resigned his office in 1836. Soon afterwards he took charge of a number of young men, mostly mechanics, who were anxious to engage in the missionary work as Christian artisans, catechists, and teachers. They were to earn their livelihood by manual labor; and such instruction as they needed, was to be given them gratuitously by pious students.

Gossner had scarcely entered upon this new enterprise, when Dr. Lange, of the Scotch Presbyterian Church in Australia, invited these humble but zealous candidates for missionary employment to make known the Gospel to the natives of Australia, near Moreton Bay; and accordingly, on the 10th of July, 1837, eleven men, one of them having been ordained, and seven married, proceeded to Scotland, whence they sailed at a subsequent date for their destination. A few months later the Rev. Mr. Start, of the Church of England, anxious to establish a mission in Bengal, went to Berlin and selected twelve persons for this purpose, who proceeded to England, July 1, 1838. One of them was a "candidate," and three were married. In 1840, a reinforcement of five was sent to this mission. During the same year also, six laborers set out for middle India, upon the invitation of several Englishmen. In the following year another company left Germany for the Chatham Islands. In 1843 an attempt was made to establish a mission in New Caledonia; but those who were destined to this field, on arriving at Sydney, concluded to join their brethren at Moreton Bay. A similar fate attended an effort to commence operations at Mergui, in 1844; the company sent forth for this purpose having concluded to establish themselves in Chuta Nagpoor, some three hundred miles west of Calcutta. In 1846 a man and his wife went to Madras to take charge of an orphan school; of them nothing particular is known. During the same year Gossner was persuaded to send "a dismissed Basle missionary" and three others to West Africa, near Cape Coast. Quite recently three brethren have been sent to Java; and a like number have gone to the Tubuai Islands.

Gossner prepared his young friends for their future labors with little or no expense to himself. He also endeavored to make the missions undertaken by them as light a burden upon his treasury as possible. Indeed, the support of some of these missions was assumed by others. For the large company sent to Australia in 1837, he provided merely an outfit and the cost of the journey to Scotland. The expense of the passage to Australia was paid by the Irish Presbyterian church; and Dr. Lange agreed that the wants of the mission, after its arrival, should be supplied by the Scotch Presbyterian church of Australia, it being understood that the missionaries should connect themselves with that body. The two who went to Madras in 1846, were supported by others. How far the Bengal mission, commenced at the instance of Rev. Mr. Start, was to be a charge upon Gossner, does not appear; and the same is true of the Middle India mission; though it is presumed that both were expected to receive important assistance, if not all which they should require from other sources. The Java mission is to be supported, in part at least, by the Dutch.

The remaining missions looked originally to Berlin for all the aid they should need; but it was a part of Gossner's plan that, as far as possible, they should be cheap and self-supporting. This was one argument, indeed, for sending forth such a number of mechanics, though their qualifications in some respects must have been of a very ordinary character.

It is to be regretted that we have no full and accurate history of Gossner's experiments; for the facts elicited thereby would doubtless throw much light upon the expediency of attempting to conduct missions upon plans different from those which are generally adopted. Certain points, however, appear to have been pretty well settled. 1. It is not always safe to rely upon the promises of individuals for a support. This has been proved, according to the author of Das Missionswesen der Evangelischen Kirche, by the history of the missions to Australia, Bengal and Middle India; inasmuch as they were soon left unprovided for, and were obliged to rely upon their own labor, or look to Gossner for help; and they had, for this reason, but a sickly existence, even if they escaped annihilation. The last of the three, indeed, lived only a short time. 2. The attempt to carry out the self-supporting plan, as far as possible, has occasioned the loss of many lives, particularly in India. 3. A number have abandoned the missions with which they were at first connected, and gone into the service of other societies. 4. And it is even claimed by the author of the Missionswesen, that the greater economy of Gossner's missions, as compared with other German missions, is rather apparent than real.

If definite information is asked in regard to the present state of the missions, the commencement of which has been already described, it is not easy to give it. Gossner publishes no annual reports; and his Biene auf dem Missionsfelde is deficient in statistics.

Prior to 1842 Gossner had the sole management of his various operations. In that year it was deemed expedient that a society should be organized; and on the 19th of September the "Evangelical Union for the Spread of Christianity among the Natives of Heathen Lands" obtained a legal existence. There has been but little change, however, in the mode of conducting the business. Gossner may be regarded as the embodiment of the society. In an humble dwelling outside of the walls of Berlin, far back in a garden, where no one would think of looking for him without a special direction, he receives those who are candidates for the missionary work; and there he transacts the business of his society. Though quite aged, he is exceedingly active, full of vivacity, simple, benevolent, a Lutheran, yet very catholic; and a transient visitor will have no difficulty in believing that he may have a strong hold upon the confidence and affections of a portion of the good people of Germany.
